Introduction

After a financial and political crisis that developed in December 2001, Argentina enacted a complex and radical monetary change during 2002 that included abandoning the Convertibility Regime (A $1 = US $1) which had prevailed during 1990 to move into an exchange control scheme. Investors were required to structure their business to fit them to the new rules.[1]

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Argentine securities market continued the transformation in the 1990s. The Executive Branch issued Executive Order Number 677/01, regarding Transparency in the Public Offering for Securities. The Executive Order introduced changes to the former legal framework, including Public Offering Act Number 17,811 and the regulatory framework passed by the National Securities Commission (Comisión Nacional de Valores), ie, the New Rules and Regulations Amended Text 2001,[2] adding innovative proceedings and legal institutions to those formerly in existence.

Despite the deep crisis mentioned above, the Argentine Gross Domestic Product experienced an outstanding increase during the 2003–2006 period at an average rate of 8.875 per cent due to certain political and economical decisions taken by the Argentine Government and a favourable international environment for the export of Argentine agro-industrial products and commodities. This re-emerge of the Argentine industry was reflected in its securities market activity, with an increasing amount of new debt securities notes and securitisations.

However, in addition to the Global Financial Crisis in 2008, a deep change in the Argentine Retirement and Pension System seriously affected Argentine capital markets. Pension funds, the major institutional investors in the Argentine market, ceased to exist.

On 20 November 2008, the Argentine Congress posed Law Number 26,425 by which the formerly existing dual Retirement Pension System formed by the private pension funds and the State Administrative Authority (Administración Nacional de Seguridad Social, ANSES) has changed into a new single system (the Integrated Argentine Retirement System, SIPA), that eliminates the system of capitalisation. Since their creation, the private pension funds had become the largest institutional investor in the financial and capital markets of Argentina. As of October 2008, the total value of investments made by them amounted to AR $84,816,769,760, of which approximately 56 per cent was invested in transactions of credit for the Argentine state and public bonds. AFJP also was a strong investor in private companies.

Law Number 26,425 provides the terms for the resources which integrate the individual capitalisation accounts of the members of the private capitalisation system of the SIJP, to the traditional administration for social security (ANSES), in order to contribute such amount to the guarantee funds of the Public Pension Regime (Fondo de Garantía de sustentabilidad del Régimen Previsional Público de Reparto, FGS). The FGS has the aim of investing surplus in the Public Pension Regime, is managed by the ANSES, and is authorised to make a wide variety of investments. The amendments to the Pension System caused a reduction of the volumes of the transactions made in the capital markets, affecting the value of assets traded thereon and the future issuing of new securities, and a decrease in the demand for securitisation instruments traded in the capital markets, causing a negative impact in the consumer and mortgage credit market.

Regulatory System — Legal Sources

The Argentine legal framework for securities basically consists of Public Offering Act Number 17,811, the National Securities Commission Rules and other regulations passed by the National Securities Commission, the stock exchange rules and regulations mainly based on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange's (Bolsa de Comercio de Buenos Aires) circulars issued by the securities markets (Mercado de Valores) adhering to stock exchanges, resolutions of the official registration entity, the Caja de Valores SA, and regulations from the Mercado Abierto Electrónico SA, the electronic reporting system for trading securities.

From time to time, the Argentine Congress, through the amendment of the Public Offering Act, as well as the enactment of a new Bill, or the Executive Branch by means of an Executive Order, may introduce changes to the Argentine legal framework for securities.

The Executive Branch issued Executive Order Number 677/01, dealing with Transparency in the Securities Market, on 22 May 2001. The goal pursued by Executive Order Number 677/01 is to protect investors as consumers of financial products. Executive Order Number 677/01 sets forth changes to the Public Offering Act as from 1 June 2001. However, two groups of stipulations included in Executive Order Number 677/01 must be distinguished. The first includes self-executive provisions, and the second consists of certain sections requiring the issuance of regulations by the National Securities Commission.

The National Securities Commission issued General Resolution Number 400 and General Resolution Number 401/02 on 5 April 2002, regulating Executive Order Number 677/01. The latter (the 'Public Offer Resolution') specifically deals with public cash offers and public exchange offers describing and regulating public offer bids and procedures. In addition to these regulations, there are certain laws that govern the securities market, directly or indirectly. These include:

- The Commercial Companies Act,[3] governing corporations and other legal entities;

3 Act Number 19,550, as amended.

- The Registered Corporate Securities Act, Act Number 20,643, as amended by Act Number 23,299, which provides that securities issued by private entities in the form of a series must be registered, non-endorsable instruments and that bearer securities must be converted into registered securities;
- The Foreign Investments Act,[4] which establishes the framework for investments made in Argentina by foreign capital or persons;
- The National Securities Commission's Duties and Powers Act,[5] assigning duties to the National Securities Commission for controlling compliance with corporate government requirements by public companies;
- The Bonds Act,[6] providing the requisites for issuing bonds in Argentina;
- The Mutual Funds Act,[7] establishing the legal framework for mutual funds;
- The Integrated Retirement Pension System,[8] establishing requirements for pension funds to invest in the securities market;
- The Trust Act,[9] regulating the creation of trusts;
- The Legislative Powers Delegated to the Executive Branch on Certain Administrative Matters Act,[10] which granted certain powers to the Executive Branch on certain matters originally delegated to Congress by the Constitution;
- The Money Laundering Act;[11] and
- The Leasing Act.[12]

Authorities

National Securities Commission

The National Securities Commission is the principal authority in the securities market. The Public Offering Act provides for the National Securities Commission's authority, duties, and obligations as the controller of the securities market in Argentina. The National Securities Commission is a self-regulated public entity with jurisdiction throughout the country. Currently, the relationship of the National Securities Commission with the Executive Branch is held through the Secretariat of Finance (Secretaría de Finanzas) and the Sub-Secretariat of Financial Services (Subsecretaría de Servicios Financieros).

The National Securities Commission's functions are carried out by a Board of Directors currently consisting of three members appointed by the Executive Branch, which also appoints the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Board and two assistant members. Staff members are appointed, suspended, and removed by the Board. Any expenses required for the operation of the National Securities Commission are obtained from allowances provided for in the National Budget.

As a result of the enactment of the National Securities Commission's Duties and Powers Act, the National Securities Commission is in charge of controlling compliance with corporate governance requirements of public companies. Closed companies continue to be controlled by the Public Registry of Commerce in Argentina. The National Securities Commission's principal activities consist of:

- Authorising public offerings of securities;
- Advising the Executive Branch on applications for registration submitted by both stock exchanges and securities markets;
- Keeping a record of all issuers authorised to publicly offer their securities and of stockbrokers registered with the securities markets;
- Approving the rules and regulations of stock exchanges and those of securities markets;
- Supervising compliance with applicable laws, rules, and regulations in all matters within the scope of the Public Offering Act;
- Requesting the Executive Branch to revoke the authorisation to function of stock exchanges and securities markets when such institutions have failed to comply with the functions assigned to them and according to the provisions of Executive Order Number 677/01; and
- Declaring irregular and ineffective, for administrative purposes, the acts subject to the National Securities Commission's control when they are against the law, regulations passed by the National Securities Commission, or by-laws.

The National Securities Commission is in charge of issuing the rules to be complied with by natural persons or legal entities when making a public offering of their securities. In exercising these functions, the National Securities Commission may:

- Require reports and carry out inspections and investigations;
- Request the assistance of law enforcement agents; and
- Report crimes or prosecute in court.

In addition, the National Securities Commission is in charge of determining the application of penalties set forth in the Public Offering Act. According to amendments introduced by Executive Order Number 677/01, individuals and legal entities violating the provisions of the Public Offering Act and the regulations thereof will be subject to the following penalties, without prejudice to the applicable civil or criminal actions:

- Warning;
- Fines, ranging from A $1,000 to A $1.5 million, which may be increased up to five times the amount of the obtained benefit or the damage suffered as a consequence of the illegal action, should any of them be higher than the established fine;

- Suspension of up to five years to act as directors, managers, auditors, members of the supervisory council, members of the qualification council, public accountants that have given their professional opinion, external auditors, or managers of issuers authorised to publicly offer their securities, or to act as such in investment or depository companies of mutual funds and in rating agencies or in companies developing the activity of financial trustees, or to act as intermediaries in the public offering or in any other manner which may be under the control of the National Securities Commission;
- Suspension of up to two years from publicly offering securities or of the authorisation to act in the public offering;[13] and
- Prohibition from publicly offering securities or to act in the public offering of securities, forward contracts, futures, or options of whatsoever nature.

In the case of legal entities, the following individuals shall be deemed jointly and severally liable:

- The directors;
- The administrators;
- The auditors;
- The members of the supervisory board; and
- The managers and members of the qualification board.

When a systematic risk practice, or any other serious financial threat, is identified, the National Securities Commission, or the respective self-regulated entity, may suspend the public offering or the negotiation of securities. When the suspension affects self-regulated entities, stock exchanges, or securities markets, the National Securities Commission decision may be extended for a maximum of 30 days, except when the suspension is extended by the Executive Branch.

Sections 14 and 15 of the Public Offering Act, as amended by Executive Order Number 677/01, set forth the proceedings for appealing the National Securities Commission's final decisions imposing any penalty cited above. Any penalty other than fines, the statute of limitations of which is three years, will be extinguished six years as from the prohibited act.

Stock Exchanges

According to the Public Offering Act, stock exchanges must be incorporated as non-profit organisations or as corporations. Stock exchange regulations must stipulate the cases and the conditions under which such institutions secure that performance of their transactions is carried out. Stock exchanges may organise clearinghouses to settle transactions.

Stock exchanges intending to list securities for public trading must obtain prior authorisation to act as such from the Executive Branch through the National Securities 13 In the case of mutual funds, they may only perform administration acts and act, on request, for purposes of repurchasing quotas, being able to sell for that purpose the assets in the portfolio controlled by the National Securities Commission.

Commission, notwithstanding any other requirement set forth by other national or provincial bodies. Stock exchange rules and regulations must provide, for the purpose of listing securities, for matters concerning:

- Authorisation, suspension, and cancellation of the listing of securities;
- Requirements to list securities while the relevant authorisation remains in effect;
- Compliance with existing laws and regulations by listed corporations;
- Rules and measures necessary to ensure the accuracy of the financial statements and other reporting documentation that listed corporations are to file or publish; and
- Issuance of regulations ensuring the accuracy of recorded listings and the publication of such listings and their current prices.

Any security to be listed for public offering and traded on a stock exchange must be previously authorised by the National Securities Commission. The stock exchanges quoting securities for trading are authorised by the Public Offering Act to collect listing fees from the issuing corporation, as well as trading fees from the parties to any transaction. Appeal of a stock exchange resolution rejecting, suspending, or cancelling a listing of securities on the ground of violation of regulations may be made, within 15 days of issue, to the Ordinary Appellate Courts of the pertinent jurisdiction.

Securities Markets

Trading in securities listed on a stock exchange is conducted through a securities market (mercado de valores) affiliated with a stock exchange.

As with the stock exchanges, the securities markets must obtain authorisation to act as such from the Executive Branch through the National Securities Commission, notwithstanding any other requirement set forth by other national or provincial bodies. Securities markets must be organised as corporations. Securities markets may allow trading only of those securities the listing of which has been authorised by the stock exchange to which they belong and those transactions ordered by a court. Securities markets are authorised by the Public Offering Act to collect the trading fees payable by the parties to a transaction.

The internal rules of each stock exchange for its affiliated securities market establish conditions for listing securities, admitting brokers, conducting trades, and controlling the truthfulness of any information required to be reported in connection therewith.

Securities markets are in charge of keeping a registry of stockbrokers and controlling stockbrokers' activities, books, and records. No natural or legal persons may trade on a securities market, use the designation stockbroker, or carry out stockbroker activities unless they are registered with the relevant securities market. Securities markets must report to the National Securities Commission any information concerning new stockbrokers entered in their registry, any cancellation of such registrations, and any changes in connection therewith. Any violation of the Public Offering Act and its regulations by a stockbroker is subject to the disciplinary powers of the securities markets.

Market Participants

Domestic Exchanges. As of 30 October 2009, there were six stock exchanges in Argentina, with affiliated securities markets authorised to quote securities, ie, Buenos Aires, Rosario, Córdoba, Santa Fe, Mendoza, and La Rioja. La Rioja Stock Exchange has the authorisation, but it is not operating.

Buenos Aires Stock Exchange. The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange (Bolsa de Comercio de Buenos Aires) is the oldest and largest Argentine stock exchange, having been founded in 1854. Approximately 90 per cent of all the securities in Argentina are traded on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange. As of 31 December 2008, there were approximately 95 companies trading equity on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange, five of which are foreign companies (ie, Telefónica, SA; Banco Santander Central Hispano, SA; Repsol, SA; Tenaris SA; and Petrobras (Petroleo Brasileiro SA)).

The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange operates through various mechanisms, these being floor trading (en el piso) and the Integrated Computer-Assisted Trading System (Sistema Integrado de Negociación Asistida por Computador, SINAC*)* which, when coinciding in trading time, form what is known as the 'concurrent method', and the continuous trading session.

The securities admitted for trading on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange are corporate stocks, bonds, convertible bonds, small business bonds, trust certificates, Argentine Depositary Shares (Certificados de Depósito Argentino, CEDEARs), government bonds, and investment funds. The trades conducted on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange may be divided into cash and forward transactions. Forward transactions include forward, repos, carryovers, options, securities loans, futures, and short sales. At present, cash trades are settled in 72 hours. Trades may be executed to be settled in pesos, dollars, or transfer dollars between accounts located abroad.

Buenos Aires Securities Market. There are six securities market authorised by the National Securities Commission to participate in the Argentine market for securities. The Buenos Aires Securities Market (Mercado de Valores de Buenos Aires SA, Merval) is the largest and most important.

The Buenos Aires Securities Market regulates, coordinates, and implements stock exchange trading, types of securities and trading mechanisms, and terms and conditions of payment. It also has implemented a stock-watch facility to monitor all transactions in real time.

Transborder Electronic Trading Systems. The Caja de Valores is a private corporation owned by the national stock exchanges and securities markets. Its principal shareholders are the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange and the Buenos Aires Securities Market.

Caja de Valores acts as depository/custodian of government and corporate securities under Act Number 20,643 and its regulatory decrees and as registrar and transfer agent for corporations and governmental entities.

Caja de Valores has entered into agreements with international clearing and settlement organisations such as Clearstream (formerly CEDEL), Euroclear Operations Centre, and the Depositary Trust Company (DTC) to act in transborder transactions in securities. Caja de Valores also has executed an agreement with the Sociedad Compensadora y Liquidadora de Valores, SA, of Spain, mainly as a result of the trading of Spanish company securities on the Argentine stock exchanges and securities markets.

Off-Market Transactions. Securities also may be traded in Argentina through over-the-counter market brokers who must be linked to an electronic reporting system. The activities of such brokers are controlled and regulated by Mercado Abierto Electrónico SA.

The Mercado Abierto Electrónico is an electronic exchange where both government securities and corporate bonds are traded through cash and forward contracts. Securities to be traded must be registered with the pertinent supervising authorities and may be traded on the Mercado Abierto Electrónico, on other exchanges, or concurrently. The types of securities traded on the Mercado Abierto Electrónico are government securities, corporate bonds, treasury bonds, Treasury bills, and provincial bonds. Due to an agreement with the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange, corporate shares are not traded on the Mercado Abierto Electrónico. Mercado Abierto Electrónico members include national banks, provincial banks, municipal banks, private national banks, foreign banks, cooperative banks, financial institutions, foreign exchange entities, and brokers/dealers.

National Treatment and Reciprocity. Argentine law accords reciprocal treatment to foreigners who invest capital promoting, supplementing, or developing economic activity in Argentina.[14] 'Economic activity' includes all industrial, mining, agricultural, commercial, financial, and other activities related to the productions or trade of goods and services.

Act Number 21,382 considers 'foreign investors' to be any person, either an individual or a legal entity, domiciled outside Argentina who owns a foreign capital investment, any foreign capital domestic company with investments in other domestic companies, and Argentine individuals or legal entities domiciled outside Argentina. A 'foreign capital domestic company' is any company domiciled in Argentina in which individuals or companies domiciled abroad own, directly or indirectly, more than 49 per cent of the capital stock or control a number of shares whose voting rights are sufficient to prevail at shareholders' meetings.

Emergency and Exchange Regulations Reform Law Number 25,561 of 6 January 2002 and Executive Order Number 214/02 terminated the Convertibility Regime established in 1991 by which the value of the Argentine peso was pegged to the United States dollar. An exchange control regime has been introduced.

14 Act Number 21,382, as amended by Executive Order Number 1853/93.

Currently, a single, free currency exchange market is in force. However, the Central Bank of Argentina may intervene in the market by selling and buying United States dollars to influence the currency price. Additionally, there are limits on purchasing United States dollars per individual or corporation per month.

Transfers of United States dollars abroad are restricted by Executive Order Number 1570/2001, as amended, allowing only such transfers expressly included in its exceptions and by certain limitations imposed by the Central Bank of the Republic of Argentina on the purchase of foreign currency.

For purposes of avoiding the influence of volatile capital in the market, and to create the necessary instruments to follow and control the remittance of funds in and out of Argentina, on 10 June 2005, the Executive Branch issued Executive Order Number 616/2005, imposing certain limitations on the repatriation of funds transferred into Argentina for investment purposes as from such date. Limitations imposed by Executive Order 616/2005 are basically the following:

- Non-residents cannot repatriate their funds before 365 days counted as from their transfer into Argentina; and
- On entry of funds into Argentina, non-residents must deposit with a local financial entity an amount in United States dollars equal to 30 per cent of the funds that have been remitted into Argentina.[15]

Securities Requirements. Formal requisites on securities vary, depending on the type of securities. Shares may be represented by certificates or be registered in accounts kept by either the issuer, the Caja de Valores (the Securities Depositary and Clearance Agent), or a commercial or investment bank. Most issuers tend to use book-entry securities.

As regards securities certificates issued in a physical form, the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange requires that issuers meet strict security standards concerning paper quality, printing process, and controls over preparation for certificates by the printing company. Ultraviolet ink and magnetic recognition bands or other similarly effective safeguards are required.

Prior to printing, a model of the certificate and a description of the proposed security procedures should be submitted to the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange. Printing of certificates with facsimile signatures requires approval by the National Securities Commission. If the company chooses to issue book-entry securities through a computer-based registration system, the requirements provided in the Rules should be complied with, except where maintenance of the register is assigned under a contract to the Caja de Valores.

The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange requires issuers to provide a detailed description of the system they intend to use for book-entry registration of shares. Such system should afford reasonably safe conditions for certification, exercise, and transfer of rights on the shares.

15 This mandatory deposit may neither accrue interest nor be used as guarantee or collateral of credit transactions of any kind. Such deposit should be made for one year. After such one-year term, it can be either repatriated or exchanged for local currency. Certain exceptions to this regime have been gradually introduced.

Section 4 of Executive Order Number 677/01 requires that, notwithstanding special provisions applicable to each security or those established in the issuance documents, the following legal system be applied to registered or book-entry recorded securities:

- The creation, issuance, or transmission of interests, liens, provisional remedies, or any other assessment on the rights granted by the security must be filed in special registries kept by the issuer or, on behalf of the issuer, by an authorised securities depository or commercial or investment banks, or appointed registration agents, and must have legal effects enforceable to third parties as from the date of said registration;
- The authorised entity keeping book-entry registry of the securities must give the holder a certificate of the account opening and of any movement therein. Holders must have the right to have been delivered, at any time, a certificate of the account balance, at their own expense. Certificates must specify the date, time, type, number, and issuer of the securities, and any other information that may identify the issue; the holder's complete identification, interests, and provisional remedies levied on the securities; and evidence of the issue of the account balance certificates and type, specifying the date of issuance and their maturity dates;
- The issuance of an account balance certificate for the purposes of transferring securities or creating interests on them will cause the account to be blocked for 10 days;
- The issuance of account balance certificates for attending shareholders' meetings or exercising voting rights will cause the account to be blocked until the day immediately following the one when the corresponding meeting was held. If the shareholders' meeting is adjourned or is held on a different date or time, new certificates must be issued in the name of the same persons who have been authorised by the issuance of the original certificates; and
- Account balance certificates may be issued to authorise the holder to file legal claims or file arbitration proceedings, as the case may be, including summary proceedings if applicable, to submit credit verification applications, or to participate in universal actions, for which purpose the certificate will be considered as conclusive evidence, without further authentication or requirement. Its issuance will cause the respective account to be blocked, except for recording acts of disposition by the holder, for 30 days, unless the holder returns the certificate or receives within the term an order to extend the time during which the account should be frozen, issued by a judge or arbitration court. Certificates must indicate such circumstances.

A third party purchasing book-entry registered or recorded securities for a valuable consideration from a person that, pursuant to the corresponding registry, is legally capable of transferring them will not be subject to repossession unless such person, when purchasing the securities, has acted in bad faith or fraudulently.

Global certificates representing securities may be issued in favour of the persons having a stake in them. The account blocking will only affect those securities mentioned in the certificate. Certificates must be issued by the domestic or foreign entity in charge of the administration of the collective deposit system where the global certificates are registered. When the entities in charge of administering the collective deposit system participate in global certificates registered in collective deposit systems administered by another entity, the former can directly issue certificates. In the case of global debt certificates, the trustee, if any, must obtain the authorisation mentioned above by proving the respective appointment.

Corporate Governance. The Commercial Companies Act provides for the basis of corporate governance of all legal commercial entities. The National Securities Commission Rules supplement the regulations for public companies. A legal entity making a public offering of its securities must have an administrative body (board of directors), a supervisory body (statutory auditors or supervisory council), and an audit committee (Comité de Auditoría).[16] In addition, the issuer is required to retain external independent auditors for preparing and filing required periodic documentation.

The National Securities Commission has approved the 'Suggested Ethic Code for Corporate Governance and Good Practices'. The purpose of the Code is to assure that issuers incorporate certain principles to their day-to-day operations, such as full disclosure, transparency, efficiency, protection of investors, and equal treatment among investors. The Code is mandatory and issuers must include in their financial statement an explanation of the reasons why they have decided not to adopt a code for corporate governance and good practices if the board of directors takes such decision.

Shareholders' Meeting. An ordinary shareholders' meeting must be held annually to approve the financial statements (which should, in turn, be filed with the National Securities Commission and the stock exchange where the securities of the company are traded), appoint directors and consider their performance and fees, and authorise a capital increase. An extraordinary shareholders' meeting can be held at any time, provided that prior publications and notices are rewarded in accordance with the applicable regulations.

The holding of the ordinary annual shareholders' meeting at the first summons requires the presence of shareholders representing the majority of the voting shares of the company. At the second summons, the shareholders' meeting must be considered held when the requisite number of shares is present. Resolutions in both cases are to be taken by the absolute majority of votes present, except when the by-laws require a greater number.

Pursuant to Executive Order Number 677/01, shareholders representing at least two per cent of the corporate capital may deliver comments or proposals related to the company's business corresponding to the fiscal year up to five days before the date established for the ordinary meeting. The board of directors must inform the shareholders that such comments or proposals are at the main office or that they may be consulted through electronic means.

To those matters that the ordinary shareholders' meetings of public companies must decide, Executive Order Number 677/01 added the following:

- The disposition or encumbrance of all or a substantial part of the corporate assets of the company when not carried out in the ordinary course of the company's business; and 16 Executive Order Number 677/01.

- The execution of management agreements or any other agreement in which the goods or services received by the company are totally or partially paid with a percentage of the company's income, results, or profits if the amount is substantial, taking into account the business and the shareholders' equity.

In principle, an extraordinary shareholders' meeting at the first summons requires the presence of shareholders representing at least 60 per cent of the shares with the right to vote, if the articles do not require a higher quorum. At the second summons, the attendance of shareholders representing 30 per cent of the voting shares is required, unless the by-laws provide for a higher or lower quorum. Resolutions in both cases are to be taken by the majority of votes present at the meeting, except when the by-laws require a greater number.

In the event of dealing with conversions into another legal entity, premature winding up of the company, transfer of the company's domicile abroad, fundamental change of the purpose, and the total or partial reimbursement of capital, both in the first and in the second summons, the resolutions are to be taken by vote of the majority of voting shares of the company, without applying the plurality of votes. This stipulation is to be applied to decide on mergers or splits, except with respect to the company being taken over which is governed by stipulations on the increase of capital.

Board of Directors. Directors of an Argentine corporation are appointed by the shareholders at the incorporation process and, subsequently, by ordinary shareholders' meetings. Public companies must have at least three directors. Alternate directors may be appointed in accordance with the company's by-laws. Alternate directors replace principal directors in case of vacancy.

The term for directorships must be provided for in the company by-laws. The term cannot exceed three years, but directors may serve subsequent terms. If nothing is provided for in the by-laws, the Commercial Companies Act considers that the maximum term has been chosen. Except otherwise provided by the company's by-laws, a board of directors must meet at least once every three months, and a majority of its members must be present to form a quorum.

The directors and the president of a corporation may be foreigners; however, a majority of the members of the board of directors must be resident in Argentina. All directors have a right to compensation pursuant to the Commercial Companies Act. Compensation may be set in the by-laws of the company or by the shareholders at a shareholders' meetings and cannot exceed 25 per cent of the profits of the corporation, or five per cent if no dividends have been declared. All directors of a corporation are subject to a standard duty of loyalty and diligence. Non-compliance results in an unlimited joint and several liability for damages arising therefrom. Directors of a corporation have a duty to:

- Disclose any conflict of interest to the board of directors and statutory auditors;
- Abstain from voting in any deliberation related to such conflict; and
- Refrain from competing with the company.

Directors are jointly and severally liable for the negligent performance of their duties, or for violations of the law or of the by-laws or regulations of the company. Directors who file written objections promptly and give notice to the statutory auditors before the proceedings are initiated against acts of the board of directors are exempt from any consequences arising therefrom.

Directors may be exonerated from liability with respect to the company by a subsequent approval of the shareholders' meeting, provided that they have not violated the law or the by-laws, and shareholders representing five per cent or more of the company's capital do not object to such exoneration.

Statutory Auditors. The shareholders' meeting must appoint statutory auditors in odd numbers (a minimum of three) to act as the internal controlling body of the company (comisión fiscalizadora). Statutory auditors must be attorneys or public accountants, or civil organisations thereof, and live in Argentina. Directors, managers, or employees of the company or a subsidiary or the company's controlling company cannot be appointed as statutory auditors.

Statutory auditors are jointly and severally liable for non-complying with their duties and obligations, as provided for in the by-laws and by law. In addition, statutory auditors are jointly and severally liable for directors' violations of the law or the by-laws or regulations of the company when the damage caused would not otherwise have occurred.

Audit Committee. Executive Order Number 677/01 creates a new body for public companies, the audit committee (Comité de Auditoría). Those companies making a public offering of their shares must establish an audit committee formed by three or more members of the board of directors, the majority of whom must be independent pursuant to the criteria established by the National Securities Commission. The audit committee must submit an annual plan for the fiscal year to the board of directors and the supervisory council.

Registration of Public Offering. Under an agreement between the National Securities Commission and the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange, effective 10 July 1992, applications for registration with the National Securities Commission also must be filed with the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange. The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange must submit its preliminary opinion as to whether the issuer complies with the requirements established in the Public Offering Act within 20 business days. The 20-day term is interrupted should the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange require additional information to the issuer. The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange submits its findings and a preliminary opinion to the National Securities Commission for a final decision once the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange has completed all necessary investigations and reviews.

Thereafter, the National Securities Commission has 10 business days for analysing the issuer's request. If the National Securities Commission does not require additional information or no observations are made on the issue's petition, the issuer is deemed to be registered to make a public offering of its securities. Companies intending to make a public offering are required to submit an application signed by the chairman of the board of directors to the National Securities Commission. In addition, the following documentation must be filed:

- Name of the issuer, main business, registered office, administrative headquarters, telephone and telefax number, and e-mail address;

- Particulars regarding incorporation, registration, and amendments to the by-laws;
- Number of shareholders and names and addresses of shareholders owning more than five per cent of the corporate capital stock;
- Composition of the capital stock (classes and number of shares and a description of their different rights, if any);
- Statement of irrevocable capital contributions, with a detailed list of contributors, relationship with the company, kind of contributions made, capitalisation conditions, and date of approval by the company;
- Description of the issuer, closing date of the fiscal year, a description of the economic group to which it belongs, if any, affiliates, controlling and controlled companies, and stock exchanges on which the company must list its securities;
- Financial statements for the three most-recent fiscal years;[17] and
- Information as to any material events influencing the development of the company or likely to have an effect on its economic or financial performance and condition, other than those disclosed in the financial statements.

The application also must include:

- A copy of the special shareholders' resolution to apply for registration of the company with the National Securities Commission;
- A copy of the by-laws and a statement of amendments thereto, if any, pending approval;
- An independent public accountant's report, evidencing that the corporation is an ongoing concern and that it has an administrative structure capable of meeting the requirements established for companies going public;
- A listing of the members of the board of directors and statutory auditors (regular and alternate) and top managers, stating in detail their personal and special domiciles and positions held in other companies or entities;
- A prospectus complying with the requirements of chapter VIII of the National Securities Commission Rules; and
- Any other information or documents required under stock exchange rules and regulations.

Section 36 of Executive Order Number 677/01 prohibits taking part in a public offering without authorisation. All individuals or corporations taking part in a public offering of securities, forward contracts, futures, and options without the authorisation of the National Securities Commission or in violation of Executive Order Number 677/01 and the Public Offering Act will be subject to the penalties established in section 10 of the Public Offering Act, as amended by Executive Order Number 677/01.

Foreign Companies. The National Securities Commission General Rule (chapter VII1a) provides that companies incorporated in foreign countries may offer shares to the public 17 If the latest financial statement is older than five months as of the application date, special financial statements as of a date not later than three months prior to the application date must be submitted.

in Argentina under the same conditions and requirements as those applicable to Argentine issuers. The issuers must establish a permanent representation and a domicile in Argentina and file data with the Public Registry of Commerce, complying with requirements of section 118 of the Commercial Companies Act. They must specify whether they make public offerings of securities in foreign countries and, if so, detail all initial and ongoing disclosure requirements to which they are subject.

The National Securities Commission Special Rule (chapter VII1 b) allows the National Securities Commission to establish less extensive requirements for companies authorised to make public offerings of shares in countries with which cooperation agreements have been executed or where, failing such agreement, the National Securities Commission deems that existing regulations provide reasonable protection for domestic investors and ensure an adequate disclosure system.

Argentine Depositary Receipts Issuance Programmes. Argentine Depositary Receipts Programmes (CEDEARs) are the second mechanism provided for in the Argentine securities market regulations allowing foreign investors to access the Argentine market. The National Securities Commission Rules (chapter VII3) provide for the authorisation of CEDEARs. CEDEARs represent deposited securities of foreign companies not authorised to make public offering of them within the territory of Argentina. Underlying securities must be listed within a Mercosur market or other foreign markets whose regulatory authorities have executed an agreement with the National Securities Commission.

CEDEARs may be issued by the Caja de Valores, commercial or investment banks, and finance companies authorised by the Central Bank. CEDEAR issuers must meet an A $30 million minimum capital requirement. Authorised depositaries may be:

- The CEDEAR issuer;
- The Caja de Valores;
- The central depositary in the country of issue of the securities represented by CEDEARs; or
- A custodian bank in the country of issuance of the underlying securities with an A $200 million minimum shareholders' equity.

International clearing houses, such as Clearstream or DTC, also may act as depositaries. A depositary may not acquire ownership or use of the underlying securities represented by CEDEARs, which are held under a regular deposit agreement. The depositary may not be changed unless a majority of CEDEAR owners so decides. Neither an advanced nor a general consent to change the depositary may be admitted.

CEDEAR issuers must maintain an amount equivalent to the underlying securities. On a case-by-case provisional basis, the National Securities Commission may authorise issuance of CEDEARs without underlying securities, in so far as prior guarantee is furnished. CEDEARs are freely exchangeable, at the owner's request, for the underlying securities at any time and/or at the programme's expiration. CEDEARs must be cancelled and destroyed against delivery of underlying securities. As of 30 October 2009, there were 22 authorised CEDEARs trading on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange.

Prospectus Requirements. Chapter VIII of the National Securities Commission Rules establishes rules that issuers must follow in preparing and filing prospectuses, depending on the characteristics of the proceedings being followed with the National Securities Commission. Foreign issuers also must include additional information already filed with foreign markets authorities.

The National Securities Commission Rules state that a prospectus constitutes the basic document of the offer and, therefore, it must be an easy-reading document which may allow unsophisticated investors to understand its terms and conditions. The prospectus must be signed by persons capable of binding the issuer.

Executive Order Number 677/01 establishes that issuers of securities, jointly with members of the board, statutory auditors as to matters for which they are competent, the offeror of securities as regards information related to them, and persons signing the prospectus for the issue of securities will be liable for all information included in the prospectus registered with the National Securities Commission. The intermediary entities and agents in the market taking part as arrangers or underwriters of a public offering for the sale or purchase of securities must review the information contained in the offering prospectus. Experts or third parties giving an opinion on certain sections of the prospectus, as attorneys or public accountants, will be liable only for the information on which they have given an opinion.

While the issuance of securities is being analysed by the National Securities Commission for approval, the issuer may distribute a preliminary prospectus. The issuer must complete any modification to the filed prospectus required by the National Securities Commission within 10 business days following notification. The prospectus must contain:

- Information on the directors, managers, legal and financial counsel, and statutory auditors;
- Statistical data (number of securities to be offered, price or method to determine it, amount expected to be received, percentage that the new issuance must represent in the capital stock, and ratio price/book value of the securities);
- The programme for the offer (period of the offer and the right of the offeror to extend or to reduce the period, underwriters, places where the purchase or subscription forms must be received, deadline and way to pay-in the securities by the acceptant of the offer and to deliver the securities by the offeror, including proceedings to exercise pre-emptive rights, if any, and date and means of publication of the outcome of the offer);
- Issuer financial information (consolidated financial data; for the last three fiscal years, or as from the incorporation of the issuer, whichever occurs first; ratios and principal ratios for the last three fiscal years, or as from the incorporation of the issuer, whichever occurs first, describing liquidity, creditworthiness, locked-up capital, and profitability; and capitalisation and incurred indebtedness, purposes of the offer and uses of the amounts to be raised, and risk factors);
- Information on the issuer (history and development of the issuer, structure and organisation of the issuer's business group, corporate information, operating and financial review and prospects, operating results, liquidity and capital resources, research, trade mark and licence development, and business trends);

- Information as to directors, senior management, and employees (director and senior management compensation, shareholding and stock option plans, statutory auditors and special committees, number of employees of the last three fiscal years, significant change in number, and agreements granting participation in the capital stock);
- Information as to major shareholders and related-party transactions (list of shareholders owning at least five per cent of every class of shares with voting rights of the capital stock, or less if so required by the foreign law should the issuer be a foreign company, and information as to any significant change in the capital stock and related-party transactions for the last three fiscal years);
- Financial information; and
- Offer and listing information (listing details, describing the class of securities being offered, par value, rights thereon, restrictions on free conveyance of title to securities and credit rating, distribution plan, markets where the securities will be offered, difference in the price of offered securities and prices paid by directors and senior managers in the last five years, and costs and expenses incurred by the issuer in the offer).

Periodic Disclosure

Official Trade

Chapter XXI, section 22, of the National Securities Commission's Rules establishes obligations for stock exchanges and securities markets where securities are traded regarding information to be made available to investors.

Stock exchanges and securities markets must adopt measures to secure free access to information, accuracy, and diffusion, without prejudice to the powers of the National Securities Commission. They must publish on a daily basis the details of all the transactions carried out, specifying their nature, price, and the hour, minute, and second of completion.

Foreign Issuers with Primary Admission

According to Chapter VII of the National Securities Commission Rules, foreign corporations must comply with the disclosure and reporting requirements applicable to domestic issuers whose shares are listed on the special section. The National Securities Commission may authorise the applicant to make only the required ongoing disclosure under the counterpart authority in the issuer's home country, but the issuers and persons falling within the scope of the applicable stipulation must comply with chapter XXI, 'Transparency in the Public Offering', of the National Securities Commission Rules. Historically, the National Securities Commission has authorised applicants to disclose only the financial data required in the foreign issuer's country, provided that such data is consistent with the Argentine GAAP.

Foreign corporations must report their share market prices and trading volume in foreign markets on a daily basis to the Argentine stock exchanges from which they have requested authorisation to trade their securities. The National Securities Commission may change the reporting frequency based on the mode of operation of the foreign market places where such securities are traded.

Issuers of Registered Securities

In General

Under the National Securities Commission Rules and the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange regulations, listed companies must file their financial statements within 70 calendar days after the end of their fiscal years or after the term of two days following the board of directors' approval, whichever occurs first, and no later than 10 days prior to the date on which the general shareholders' meeting is to be held to consider them. Additionally, the companies must submit the following information:

- Board of directors' report to shareholders;
- Balance sheet;
- Statement of income;
- Statement of cash flow;
- Consolidated financial statements;
- Management discussion and analysis of financial position, containing a summary of financial information;
- Report of the statutory auditors on the company's financial conditions and results of operations, board report, and financial statements;
- Auditors' report; and
- Minutes of the board of directors' meeting where the above documentation was considered and approved.

In addition, the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange requires that, within 48 hours after the board of directors' meeting that approved the above documentation, the company submit it for shareholder approval in a letter, stating the results for the period/year, amount of unappropriated earnings, stock and cash dividends as proposed at the board of directors' meeting, and capitalisation of adjustments and surplus.

Foreign investors may file the information stated above translated into English and with figures stated in United States dollars. Those companies whose shares are traded on foreign markets must file with the National Securities Commission all the information required by their foreign markets.

Within 42 calendar days after the end of each quarter during the year or within two days after the board of directors' approval, whichever occurs first, the company must submit to shareholders the same financial information as that specified for the fiscal year, excepting the board of directors' report. Members of corporate bodies, principal and alternate, must submit to the National Securities Commission:

- Within 10 business days after taking office, an affidavit detailing the shares and other publicly traded securities issued by the company directly or indirectly held or managed by them;
- Prior to 1 March of each year, another affidavit updating that indicated above; and

- On a monthly basis, on the fifteenth day of each month, an affidavit in respect of changes in the holding or management of securities, if such charges have occurred.[18]

Individuals or legal entities controlling or belonging to the group controlling the company must submit an affidavit within five business days after execution of any transaction entailing the acquisition of five per cent of the voting rights on any issuer's capital stock.

The directors of a registered and listed company, or its statutory auditors, must report to the National Securities Commission any material favourably or adversely potentially affecting the company's operation or trading of its securities on the market. The information must be forwarded immediately after occurrence of the event or after the above officials have become apprised thereof, if such event is the result of third-party action, and it must be published in the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange daily bulletin.

Executive Order Number 677/01 requires any person entering into any shareholder agreement or any other agreement that restricts the free transfer of shares of any issuer, the voting rights, or the corporate governance or that grants preferred rights to disclose such agreement to the National Securities Commission and exchanges where the issuer's securities are traded.

Argentine Depositary Receipts Disclosure Requirements

For sponsored CEDEARs, issuers of the underlying securities must provide financial statements consistent with effective regulations in Argentina. Information must be submitted and published in Spanish. Information on issuers also must be published.

Information on non-sponsored CEDEAR issuers must, within 10 days, submit any information that issuers of the underlying securities have disclosed or submitted to their regulatory authority. They also must submit any relevant information within 24 hours after receipt or disclosure thereof, as well as accounting information within 10 days. Furthermore, CEDEAR issuers must comply with chapter XXI of the National Securities Commission Rules.

CEDEAR issuers also must provide annual and quarterly financial statements and disclose any material change in their own fee schedule or that of the depositary. CEDEAR issuers must report quarterly on the number of outstanding depositary receipts as of the first day of the financial year, exchanged certificates, newly issued certificates within a CEDEAR programme, and outstanding certificates at quarter-end, as well as the amount of securities represented by CEDEARs within each programme.

Proxy Disclosure

Executive Order Number 677/01 introduces new proxy disclosure rules. The rules will not be operative until the National Securities Commission issues the required regulation.

18 This requirement also is applicable to persons no longer in office, for a period of six months after the date on which they ceased to hold office.

Shareholders intending to publicly request the granting of proxies in their favour must do so according to the rules to be established by the National Securities Commission for that purpose. Such shareholders must hold a minimum of two per cent of the capital stock represented by voting shares and a shareholder seniority of at least one year. The representation must be irrevocable and for a specific meeting.

The shareholders will be liable for the information included in the proxy form registered with the National Securities Commission. In addition, the proxy solicitors must be responsible for distributed information. The information must allow shareholders to make a decision with full knowledge on the issue subject to solicitation. Solicitors will be subject to the penalties established in the Public Offering Act, as amended by Executive Order Number 677/01.

Corporate governance regulations are fully addressed in the Commercial Companies Act and regulations passed by the Public Registry of Commerce. However, public companies also are governed by the specific provisions of the Public Offering Act.

It is not usual that the National Securities Commission varies the legal general corporate framework governed by the Commercial Companies Act. However, due to the nature and mechanics of public companies, certain differences between both kinds of companies exist.

Participation of foreign shareholders (ie, either individuals or foreign corporate shareholders) in public companies has never been a major issue. However, due to certain changes in corporate governance policies, the Public Registry of Commerce imposed certain requirements that should be complied with by foreign companies in order to participate as foreign corporate shareholders of local corporations.

The National Securities Commission modified the formal requirements applicable to be present and vote at shareholders' meetings of public companies. In that regard, section 25 of chapter II of the Rules has been amended, providing for evidence of the corporate shareholder's incorporation and requesting 'express individualisation of the Registry and its jurisdiction'.

Unfortunately, this definition is not clear and raised the issue of whether or not the registration that the National Securities Commission is requiring is the one required for the foreign corporate shareholder's place of incorporation or the local registration required by the Commercial Companies Act and Public Registry of Commerce. Notwithstanding the above uncertainty, according to current criteria, it is not required for foreign companies to be registered with the Public Registry of Commerce to be a nominal and 'passive' shareholder of a public company.

However, a foreign company will be required to provide evidence of its registration if it wants to attend a shareholders' meeting of the public company (registration in its home country should be, in principle, sufficient). Registration with the Public Registry of Commerce will be required if the foreign company wishes to cast votes in the meeting and its voting contributed to form the shareholders' meeting decision.

Electronic Submission of Information

All entities supervised or monitored by the National Securities Commission, local or foreign, must provide the information expressly required by the National Securities Commission

Rules through the Internet, by using the electronic means provided by the Financing Information Highway (Autopista de la Información Financiera, AIF).[19] Information filed with the National Security Commission also must be filed with the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange and the Mercado Abierto Electrónico SA.

Trading Rules

Securities Offerings

Offer. The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange regulations provide for certain conditions generally applicable to any securities offering. The purpose of the corporation and its capital stock, financial condition, and operating performance must justify access to the stock market. It must have an administrative organisation capable of meeting the requirements of the listing rules and supplemental regulations.

In addition, companies applying for original listings of shares on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange must submit the following documents and information with the application:

- Certification of public offering approval by the National Securities Commission, or simultaneous filing of application for such approval;
- Minutes of the special shareholders' meeting, containing the corporate decision to apply for registration and a statement of the reasons for such decision;
- A statement as to whether the company has any mortgaged assets;[20]
- A statement as to whether the corporation holds any concessions from a government, national or provincial;[21]
- A statement as to whether the company pays any royalties, specifying the beneficiaries thereof and the items for which said royalties are payable;
- A statement as to whether the company has any exclusive sales agreements within or outside Argentina, for the whole or part of its production;[22]
- A statement as to whether the company has any agreements in place for assistance or advice of any kind, payable on the basis of production, sales, or profits;[23]
- A sworn statement by the members of the board of directors, statutory auditors, or supervisory committee, and reporting certified public accountant on a Buenos Aires Stock Exchange form, including personal address, special domicile, identification document number, and positions held in other companies;

19 National Securities Commission Rules, ch XXVI; see http://www.cnv.gov.ar.

20 If so, the issuer must state the book value of the mortgaged assets as per the most recent balance sheet, the original amount of the mortgage, the term of the loan secured thereby, the balance outstanding as of the listing application date, and all such other information as the corporation may deem appropriate to provide.

21 If so, the concession contract should be submitted, as well as a reference to the legal provision governing it.

22 If so, specify the scope of such agreements and identify the counterparties thereto and any direct or indirect relationships with such counterparties.

23 If so, specify the scope of such agreements and identify the counterparties thereto and any direct or indirect relationships with such counterparties.

- A statement as to whether the corporation has any subsidiaries under section 33, subsection 1, of the Commercial Companies Act;[24]
- Facsimiles and numbering of shares and bonds and a schedule showing the number of shares represented by each certificate in accordance with existing regulations;[25]
- Any other documentation required by the National Securities Commission's Rules; and
- Whether the applicant company already lists its shares on other stock exchanges, national or foreign.

The listing application should be signed by the corporation's legal representative on a form supplied by the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange. Applicants are to provide all such clarifications as the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange may require. If the application for listing is approved, the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange will prepare a summary description of the company's background and activities based on the documentation and information provided by it, publish that description and the listing authorisation, and communicate such authorisation to the company.

Listing Sections. The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange has two listing sections for shares of stock:

- The special section for shares of issuers having a capital of over A $60 million, or sales or service revenues in excess of A $100 million, or 1,000 shareholders or 30 per cent of the voting capital stock (1,200 shareholders and 40 per cent of the capital stock if the shares are non-voting stock) not related as among themselves by agreements concerning the governance or management of the company, or listed securities for a par value higher than A $60 million; and
- The general section for companies which have 150 shareholders or 20 per cent of the voting capital stock (200 shareholders or 30 per cent of the capital stock if the shares are non-voting stock) not related among themselves by agreements concerning governance and management of the corporation or not complying with the requirements provided in the special section.

Without prejudice to the ownership distribution criteria established by the National Securities Commission, companies not meeting the required minimum number of shareholders will have the following options:

- Submit a commitment signed by the shareholders to offer to the public trading market any amount of the capital stock, in one or more offerings within the six months after listing until reaching the capital requirements;

24 If so, the corporation must furnish the following data: (a) two copies of the financial statements for the last three fiscal years, (b) a list of directors, statutory auditors, or supervisory committee members and partners if such subsidiaries are business organisations other than corporations, (c) a detailed description of the business, and (d) a breakdown of receivables from and payables to such subsidiaries if such receivables or payables are subject to fair market value terms, and the reasons for such a treatment.

25 If applicable, a description of the system used for book-entry shares, with certification of approval by the National Securities Commission or relevant provincial agency, except for Mendoza, if a computerised record is kept.

- Resolve to issue shares for subscription, for a par value;[26] or
- Place the shares through the underwriters within six months as from the listing authorisation.

Once the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange's minimum ownership distribution requirement (5 per cent) has been met, the company should demonstrate compliance with the higher percentages required by the National Securities Commission within one year after listing. Companies already admitted to trading seeking to list subsequent issues of shares must provide the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange with a copy of the company's decision within the following 10 days and with the following information:

- Characteristics of the securities;
- Pre-emptive rights;
- Placement method, date and form of payment, and date as from which the shares are entitled to dividends;
- Once the issuance has been completed, a reporting on the results thereof; and
- Prospectus for the public offer.

Indices. The Board of Directors of the Buenos Aires Securities Market (Merval) has approved the creation of the 'MERVAL 25', a new stock-exchange index including a fixed number of companies, designed to reflect the performance of the 25 most-important shares measuring their liquidity, conserving the basic structure of the traditional Merval Index. The MERVAL 25 index measures the 25 stocks traded in the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange with the largest negotiated volume and number of transactions, excluding those stocks that have not been traded for a determined number of days.

The MERVAL ARGENTINA Index is based on the trades made on the six-month period previous to each updating. Trades of foreign companies and CEDEARs are excluded. The criteria applied for the selection is to decrease the participation in the cash segment of the concurrent market and to exclude all the companies the shares of which have not been traded in a significant number of trading sessions.

By updating the portfolios from that date onwards, in accordance with the new index methodology, the situation may be deemed as a bifurcation of the MERVAL Index, as from 1 March 2000, into two indexes:

- MERVAL, the traditional index, conceived as an indicator of the profitability of stocks traded at the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange; and
- MERVAL ARGENTINA, the new index, reflecting the profitability of an Argentine company's stocks portfolio.[27]

26 The company should provide to the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange certification of the shareholders' individual waivers of their pre-emptive rights for the amount needed to release the above percentage. The issue should be completed within six months after listing.

27 The portfolio, which limits each company's share to a maximum 20 per cent, acts as an average indicator of their behaviour in the Concurrent Market.

The MERVAL Index is the market value of an equity portfolio, selected according to market share, number of transactions, and quotation price on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange. The MERVAL Index is reckoned on a continuous basis during any trading day, and it is screened across the Market Data System terminals. Listed corporations and weighted prices are updated quarterly, consistently with market share for the last three months.

The BURCAP Index represents the value of an equity portfolio composed of those securities included in the MERVAL Index. The contribution of each share of stock is in proportion to its market value as of the base date. Every time the MERVAL Index is structured, the same procedure is applicable to the BURCAP Index. Notwithstanding the significance of the MARVAL Index, the VALUE Index appears to be the more complete as long as it represents the evolution of the whole listed common shares. The Index is adjusted in case of the beginning or withdrawal of quotation, equity reduction, or subscription of new shares. In this case, the base value is multiplied for the adjustment factor.

Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings

Shareholder Duties. Individuals or corporations, directly or through other individuals or corporations, or any group of individuals acting on a concerted basis, by any means and for a specific purpose, who acquire or sell holdings granting five per cent or more of the votes of a trading company must report such transactions to the National Securities Commission.

Individuals or corporations, directly or indirectly owning substantial share-holdings, also must notify the stock exchange and securities market with which such securities are registered.

Company Duties. Pursuant to chapter XXI, section 2, of the Public Offering Act, companies must give notice of the acquisition by third parties of five per cent of the voting shares of stock of the company.

Insider Trading and Fraud

Insider Trading. The National Securities Commission Rules determine which acts are deemed to have been performed against the transparency within the scope of the public offering. Directors, managers, statutory auditors, supervisory council, controlling shareholder, and professional counsels of the issuer; any person having access to the information; rating agency personnel; private entity personnel involved in the public offering, including the Caja de Valores; public entity personnel involved in the public offering, including the National Securities Commission; and any persons who accidentally or by their temporary relationship may have access to privileged information for their own benefit or for the benefit of third parties are prohibited from:

- Using the privileged information therein mentioned to obtain any kind of advantages for their own benefit or for third-party benefit, whether resulting from the purchase or sale of marketable securities futures, options, or any other kind of transaction related to the public offering regime; and

- On their own account or on behalf of third parties, directly or indirectly, preparing, facilitating, participating in, or performing any kind of transaction on the market, regarding the marketable securities, futures, or options referred to in the information, communicating such information to third parties, unless in the ordinary course of its employment, profession, office, or craft, and advising a third party to acquire, or assign marketable securities, futures, or options or causing third parties to purchase or assign them, based on such information.

Manipulation and Fraud on the Market. Chapter XXI, section 7, of the National Securities Commission Rules provides that issuers, intermediaries, investors, and any other party intervening in the securities, futures, and/or options market must:

- Refrain from performing any act or engaging in conduct seeking or allowing mishandling of prices or volumes of marketable securities, futures, or options traded on such markets; and
- Refrain from performing any other act or conduct capable of defrauding any individual or corporation participating in the above-mentioned markets.

The above-mentioned acts or conduct include, but are not limited to, any act, practice, or course of action intended to artificially affect the formation of prices, liquidity, or the traded volume of one or more than one marketable securities, futures, or options[28] or induce a party to err in intervening in the market. These acts include any misrepresentation made knowing that it was inaccurate or deceitful or which should be reasonably considered as such and any omission of essential information capable of inducing error by those obliged to provide it.

The National Securities Commission may impose on any market participant mentioned above the penalties provided in the Public Offering Act, as amended by Executive Order Number 677/01.

Public Take-Over Bids

In General. The Public Offer Resolution establishes the proceedings, rules, and regulations on public takeover bids, either for cash or through an exchange of shares. It also provides that any person or entity intending to launch a public offer bid or a securities exchange bid must previously obtain government approval. Any public offer bid or shares exchange bid for shares of companies admitted to the public offering regime must be addressed to all registered shareholders, including those whose shares lack voting rights.

28 Such transactions include those not effectively causing the transfer of the marketable securities, futures, or options and those carried out for the purpose of creating the false pretence of the existence of the supply and demand or an active market, even when the marketable securities, futures, or options are effectively transferred.

If it is a mandatory public take-over bid, according to the terms of the Public Offer Resolution, the offer also must be directed to holders of subscription rights or stock options, convertible debt securities, or other similar securities which, directly or indirectly, may grant a right to subscribe for, acquire, or convert them into shares with voting rights.

Procedure. If a public offer bid is launched, either for cash or through a shares exchange, there is a duty for the offeror to file:

- A declaration of the offer, which must include (a) the main conditions, (b) all the minimum and maximum amounts to be acquired, including the procedure for solving the disputes in case of offers below or above the minimum amounts and priorities among the received offers, (c) data relating to the offeror, including information as to the offeror and related parties' participation in the voting capital stock of the target company, and (d) the offeror's board of directors' statement as to the financial solvency to guarantee full payment of the offer;
- A prospectus containing a description of the offer;[29]
- Additional information, including (a) documents evidencing the guarantee required by the National Securities Commission (Comisión Nacional de Valores, CNV) regarding the full compliance of the offer, (b) the administrative body's authorisation if it is necessary or legally required, (c) a copy of the minutes of the board of directors' decision to launch the offer, (d) financial statements corresponding to the offeror's last two fiscal years, (e) information on the target company having not yet been disclosed, and (f) an irrevocable purchase commitment, except as to the offered price, which may be increased by not less than 5 per cent; and
- The term of the offer, which may not be less than 20 days nor longer than 30 days, as from the authorisation date.

In all cases, the principle of equal treatment of shareholders must be observed and an additional term of not less than five days and not longer than 10 days as from the general closing date of the term of the offering must be given to those shareholders who had not accepted the offer within the general term.

Types of Offers. The Public Offer Resolution defines the various kinds of public offers created by Executive Order Number 677/01, these being:

- Mandatory public take-over offers;
- Withdrawal from the public offering regime and delisting of securities;
- Simplified mandatory public take-over offers; and
- Competitive bids.

29 The prospectus must contain minimum information requirements set forth in the government's rules and must be filed in a number sufficient to be delivered to the interested shareholders.

Introduction

Regulatory System

From an Australian perspective, the term 'securities' has a diverse and broad meaning. Within a corporate context, the regulatory system through legislation, regulations and judicial decisions, has sought to define the term 'securities'. This chapter is limited to the definition context of a 'security' in a corporate sense rather than the broader definition of 'securities' under Australian Common Law. Securities regulation in Australia comprises three main areas, namely:

- The law;
- The administration of that law; and
- The resolution of disputes under that law.

The law is mainly found in the Corporations Act 1989 (Cth),[1] the Australian Securities Commission Act 1989, Regulations made under those Acts, and the Corporations Act of each state of Australia, the Australian Capital Territory, and the Northern Territory of Australia. This body of law is colloquially referred to as the 'Corporations Law'. The administration of this federal and state legislation is the responsibility of the Commonwealth Attorney-General and the Australian Securities Commission (soon to be converted into the Australian Corporations and Investment Commission). The resolution of disputes is handled by the Federal Court of Australia (Cth) and the Supreme Courts of each state of Australia, the Australian Capital Territory and the Northern Territory, with other courts having some powers to apply the securities legislation.

In addition, publicly listed companies in Australia must adhere to and comply with the rules and regulations set out in the Listing and Business Rules of the Australian Stock Exchange Limited.

1 The Corporations Law is in the process of being reformed through the Federal Corporate Law and Economic Reform Program. The reforms are to take effect from 1 July 1998.

Legal Sources

Legislation and Common Law

The substantive law regarding securities in Australia is contained in the Corporations Law. A full understanding of securities law in Australia calls for acquaintance with not only the Corporations Law and judicial decisions interpreting it, but also the general law in Australia governing companies, contracts, trusts, torts and the interpretation of statutes. This chapter will focus on the Corporations Law, with occasional reference to the general law where required.

The Corporations Law came into effect on 1 January 1991, and it is the culmination of eight separately legislated Corporation Acts in force in Australia in the Australian Capital Territory, the Northern Territory, and each of the six states of Australia. The Corporations Law, among other things, deals with the registration of foreign companies, dealings between or by companies, officers of companies, prospectus requirements, raising of capital, and take-overs.

Listing Rules

Certain rules and regulations have been formulated for companies publicly listed on the Australian Stock Exchange Limited. The Listing Rules of Australian Stock Exchange Limited govern:

- Admission of entities to the Official Lists;
- Quotation of securities;
- Suspension of securities from quotation;
- Removal of entities from the Official List;
- Ongoing requirements for listed companies, including disclosure requirements; and
- Dealings by listed companies.

They also govern disclosure and some aspects of the conduct of unlisted entities. Compliance with the Listing Rules is a contractual requirement for admission to the Official List of the Australian Stock Exchange Limited under the contract that an entity enters into with the Australian Stock Exchange Limited on admission.

Enforcement of the Listing Rules of the Australian Stock Exchange Limited is not limited to a contractual context. The Listing Rules are given statutory recognition under the Corporations Law, and they are enforceable against listed entities and their associates. The Corporations Law provides that the Australian Stock Exchange, Australian Securities Commission, or a third party may apply to the court to seek judicial enforcement of the Listing Rules. The Listing Rules create obligations that are additional and complementary to Common Law and statutory obligations.

The articles of association of the Australian Stock Exchange Limited give the Board of the Australian Stock Exchange the power to make Listing Rules. Under the Corporations Law, Listing Rule amendments must be lodged with the Australian Securities Commission and are subject to disallowance by the Minister. The Company's division of the Australian Stock Exchange Limited makes the day-to-day decisions on the application of the Listing Rules. The principles on which the Listing Rules are based are as follows:

- Minimum standards of quality, size, operations, and disclosure must be satisfied;
- Sufficient investor interest must be demonstrated to warrant an entity's participation in the market by having its securities quoted;
- Securities must be issued in circumstances which are fair to new and existing security holders;
- Securities must have rights and obligations attaching to them that are fair to new and existing security holders;
- Timely disclosure must be made of information which may affect security values or influence investment decisions and information on which security holders, investors and the Australian Stock Exchange Limited have a legitimate interest;
- Information must be produced according to the highest standards and, where appropriate, enable ready comparison with similar information;
- The highest standards of integrity, accountability and responsibility of entities and their officers must be maintained;
- Practices must be adopted and pursued which protect the interests of security holders, including ownership interest and the right to vote;
- Security holders must be consulted on matters of significance; and
- Market transactions must be commercially certain.

Other than these fundamental principles, the Listing Rules also expressly state that an entity must comply with certain general notions of interpretation, such that the Listing Rules must be interpreted:

- In accordance with their spirit, intention, and purpose;
- By looking beyond form to substance; and
- In a way that best promotes the principles on which the Listing Rules are based.

Authorities

Australian Securities Commission

The responsibility for the day-to-day administration of the Corporations Law is vested in the Australian Securities Commission and a number of ancillary bodies. The Australian Securities Commission is a federal government body which administers and ensures compliance with the Corporations Law. The Australian Securities Commission was established by the Australian Securities Commission Act 1989. The Australian Securities Commission is soon to be merged into the Australian Securities and Investment Commission, which will merely extend the Australian Securities Commission's current corporate responsibilities. The Australian Securities and Investment Commission will remain responsible for the administration of the Corporations Law.

The Australian Securities Commission regularly issues practice notes and policy statements which outline the Australian Securities Commission's view on the requirements of certain provisions of the Corporations Law. These act as helpful interpretative documents. The Australian Securities Commission is given a wide range of discretion under the Corporations Law. In an effort to provide guidance to practitioners on how it exercises this discretion, the Commission issues practice notes and policy statements. Those practice notes and policy statements include the policy on both specific discretions and the Australian Securities Commission's approach to its discretions in general.

The Australian Securities Commission is a body corporate with perpetual succession. It must have at least three members who are appointed by the Governor-General of Australia. The fact that the Australian Securities Commission is a body corporate means that the decisions of its members (sometimes referred to as 'Commissioners') when acting as the Commission cannot be made the subject of administrative review under the Administrative Decisions (Judicial Review) Act 1997 (Cth).

The Australian Securities Commission may delegate its powers or functions to other people. Delegates, however, may find their decisions subject to review. The Australian Securities Commission has general powers of investigation. They are listed in the Corporations Law, and they include circumstances where there is reason to suspect:

- Contravention of law;
- Unacceptable circumstances; and
- Contravention of a relevant previous law.

Australian Stock Exchange Limited

The Australian Stock Exchange was incorporated on 1 April 1987, and each of the separate exchanges from each of the states and territories of Australia became subsidiaries or members. Therefore, the Australian Stock Exchange is a national body. On 18 October 1996, the Australian Stock Exchange demutualised and converted into a public company, the Australian Stock Exchange Limited. Plans also are in progress through the Corporations Law (Australian Stock Exchange Demutualisation) Bill 1997 to convert the Australian Stock Exchange Limited from a company limited by guarantee (a 'co-operative' or 'mutual') to a company limited by shares.

The Australian Stock Exchange Limited offers a market for trading in securities which takes place through its member organisations. The constitution of the Australian Stock Exchange Limited and Business Rules govern stockbroker relationships with the Australian Stock Exchange, with each other and with clients. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited supervises the market for securities issued by publicly listed entities. One way it does this is by setting standards for the behaviour of publicly listed entities through its Listing Rules. The objectives of the Australian Stock Exchange Limited include providing:

- A fair and well-informed market for financial securities; and
- An internationally competitive market.

The Australian Stock Exchange's principal activities include providing a trading system, a clearing and settlement system, and regulation of the securities market. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited has an absolute discretion concerning the admission of an entity to the Official List (and its removal) and quotation of its securities (and their suspension). It also has discretion whether to require compliance with the Listing Rules in a particular case, and it may take into account the principles on which the Listing Rules are based when making a decision. It also may waive compliance with a Listing Rule unless the Listing Rule expressly prohibits such a waiver. If it grants a waiver it may do so on conditions.

Sydney Futures Exchange

The Sydney Futures Exchange is the only exchange in Australia on which futures contracts are actively traded. The other futures exchange is the Australian Financial Futures Market, a subsidiary of the Australian Stock Exchange, but trading on this is currently inactive. Chapter 8 of the Corporations Law provides, among other things, that approval is required to operate a futures exchange and clearing house and sets out provisions for the licensing and conduct of brokers and other participants in the futures industry and the conduct of futures business.

It is possible that a declaration be obtained under section 1127 of the Corporations Law that the futures market is an 'exempt futures market'. Generally, applicants for section 1127 declarations are persons who deal in futures contracts in such a way that their activities constitute the conduct of a futures market. An exempt futures market declaration results in the futures market being exempt from various regulations applying to ordinary futures exchanges. The circumstances surrounding each facility provider's business will decide if it is necessary to obtain a futures adviser's licence.

The Corporations Law requires that futures exchanges incorporate certain regulations into their Business Rules. These include rules relating to the admission of members and their training and conduct and accounting practices. Exchanges are required to liaise with the Australian Securities Commission on changes to these rules. The Corporations Law also provides for the protection of clients of futures brokers by a variety of means. These include segregation of clients and broker funds, the provision of information to clients, rules about the conduct of trading, and requiring exchanges to establish a fidelity fund to protect clients against fraud by a futures broker.

The Australian Securities Commission has responsibility for ensuring that all persons licensed as futures brokers or futures advisers and all holders of proper authorities comply with the Corporations Law and licence conditions. These regulations have been set down with a view to ensuring that futures markets in Australia are efficient and well informed and serviced by honest and competent brokers and brokers that are financially sound. As an approved futures exchange pursuant to section 1126 of the Corporations Law, the Sydney Futures Exchange is responsible for ensuring that its members are of good character and high business integrity, conduct their dealings efficiently, honestly and fairly, and ensure that there is an orderly and fair market for dealings in futures contracts. Similar regulations exist for licensed security dealers, proper authority holders, and investment advisors of ordinary securities.

Procedures

Registration to Carry on Business in Australia

In General. A foreign company may not carry on business in Australia unless it is registered under the Corporations Law or it has applied to be so registered and the application has not been dealt with by the Australian Securities Commission. Even if a foreign company does not wish to carry on business in Australia, it may still need to be registered. If the company wishes to issue, sign, or publish public documents, or issue or sign eligible negotiable instruments within Australia, it will be required to specify its Australian Registered Body Number. This number is only allotted to foreign companies that are registered. Registration is obtained through the Australian Securities Commission. In practice, registering a company in Australia as a foreign company is a four-step process. The steps are:

- Reserving the name;
- Completing relevant application form;
- Assembling company documents; and
- Lodging the form and associated documents, with the prescribed fee.

Reserving Name. Reservation of a distinct company name is achieved through application to the Australian Securities Commission. If it is decided not to reserve a name, the Australian Securities Commission will only register the company if the name specified on the application form is available. The form requires general details about the body corporate to be registered.

Accompanying Documents. Any documentation that is not in English must be accompanied by a certified translation. There are specific requirements relating to the translation of documents. The following documents are required to be lodged with the application for registration:

- Certified copy of the corporation's current certificate of incorporation or registration or the equivalent document;[2]
- Certified copy of the corporation's constitution (memorandum and articles of association, or their equivalent);[3]

2 The certificate must be certified as a true copy by the corporate authority in the company's place of incorporation which exercises functions similar to those of the Australian Securities Commission. The certification should be dated no earlier than three months before the copy is lodged with the Australian Securities Commission, unless an extension has been granted.

3 The document can either be an up-to-date copy embodying all alterations or a copy of the original document, together with copies of all resolutions altering or affecting the memorandum or articles. The document must be certified by the appropriate authority as a true copy.

- If there are registerable charges over assets of the company, for each charge, a notification of details of the charge and, where applicable, certification of compliance with stamp duties law (and associated documents);[4]
- If the list of directors on the application form includes directors who are resident in Australia and members of a 'local board' of directors, a memorandum executed by or on behalf of the foreign company, stating the powers of those directors; and
- Memorandum of appointment of local agent or power of attorney in favour of such local agent.[5]

If the memorandum of appointment of a local agent or power of attorney is executed on behalf of the foreign company, a copy of the document authorising the execution of the document appointing the local agent verified as a true copy also must be lodged.

Lodging Form and Documents with Prescribed Fee. The application for registration as a foreign company must be signed by a local director or agent, a director, or secretary of the company acting as an agent and lodged with the prescribed fees.

Post-Registration Obligations

Displaying Registered Name. A foreign company must display its name in a conspicuous position and in legible characters outside every office and place of business. It also must display in a like manner its place of origin, the expression 'registered office' at its registered office and, if the liability of the members is limited and the last word of its name is either 'Limited' or 'Ltd', notice of that fact.

Australian Registered Body Number. Every foreign company will receive on registration a unique nine-digit identification number, known as the 'Australian Registered Body Number'. The name of the company, in legible characters, followed by the expression 'Australian Registered Body Number' (or a permitted abbreviation such as 'ARBN'), and the number itself must appear on:

- Every public document issued, signed, or published by, or on behalf of, the company;
- Every eligible negotiable instrument signed or issued by, or on behalf of, the company; and
- All documents required to be lodged with the Australian Securities Commission.

In addition, every public document issued, signed, or published by, or on behalf of, the company must include in legible characters its place of origin and, if applicable, that the liability of the members is limited. The Australian Securities Commission, however, does allow some abbreviations to be used in relation to this (eg, 'Aust', 'Co', and 'No').

4 The documents required to be lodged must meet specific statutory requirements.

5 This document must be executed by or on behalf of the foreign company (usually under common seal) and state the name and address of the local agent, who is a natural person or company, a resident in Australia, and is authorised to accept, on behalf of the foreign company, service of process, and notices.

Financial Statements. A registered foreign company is required to lodge with the Australian Securities Commission at least once every calendar year and, at intervals of no more than 15 months, a copy of its balance sheet and profit-and-loss account. These must be made up to the end of the last financial year, together with any other documents that the company is required to prepare by laws applicable in the foreign company's place of origin and, where the company is listed, any documents required by the Australian Stock Exchange Limited.

Exempt Foreign Companies. If a registered foreign company falls within the specific types of foreign companies that have been declared by the Australian Securities Commission to be exempt foreign companies and has appointed an auditor, it may be eligible to lodge an annual return and a copy of an auditor's report in lieu of financial accounts. Australian Securities Commission Policy Statement 58 outlines circumstances in which the Australian Securities Commission:

- Exercises its discretionary powers to declare that the lodgement of annual accounts does not apply to specified registered foreign companies;
- Will give large proprietary companies in which a foreign company has a direct or indirect interest relief in the requirement to lodge financial statements; and
- Provide relief to small proprietary companies which are controlled by foreign companies.

Generally, the Australian Securities Commission may not give relief to a registered foreign company carrying on business in Australia if the relief means that the registered foreign company would lodge less information than equivalent Australian companies.

Notice of Changes. A registered foreign company must lodge a written notice with the Australian Securities Commission within one month of a change of:

- Its name;
- Its constitution;
- Its directors;
- Its local agent (or the name or address of a local agent);
- The powers of any directors who are resident in Australia and members of an Australian board of directors; and
- The address of its registered office in its place of origin (if any) or principal place of business in its place of origin.

Furthermore, a registered foreign company must lodge with the Australian Securities Commission written notice within seven days of:

- A change in the situation of its registered office address in Australia; and
- Its ceasing to carry on business.

It also must lodge notice with the Australian Securities Commission within one month if it is wound up or dissolved in its place of incorporation or origin. Charges on property or assets of a registered foreign company also may must be registered.

Legal Order and Regulatory Interests

Admission

Market Participants

Domestic Exchanges. The domestic exchanges that are actively trading in the securities of listed public companies in Australia are the Australian Stock Exchange Limited and, in relation to futures contracts, the Sydney Futures Exchange. These two bodies have been previously mentioned.

Transborder Electronic Trading Systems. Most on-market transactions in Australia by participants and investors are undertaken by a broker by placing an order to buy securities for a buying client with the buying broker. A market order requires the buying broker to execute the order promptly at the best available price. A limit order requires the broker to buy at or below or sell at or above a stated limit price. The buying broker makes a contract with the selling broker by means of the Stock Exchange Automated Trading System (SEATS) without either broker disclosing the identity of its client.

Under the SEATS system, bids and offers are entered, transactions are executed, and off-market trades are reported at SEATS terminals. Orders are automatically executed against bids or offers within parameters defined by the highest bid and lowest offer. Trading occurs according to predetermined rules as to priority. If the buying broker holds orders to purchase a particular security from several clients, the broker will generally seek to make purchases and allocate securities to the clients in the sequence in which the orders were received. However, the broker may need to exercise a discretion in allocation if some orders were subject to price limits which restricted their execution. That allocation will be made on the day on which the transaction occurred on SEATS.

The buying broker will then send a contract note to the buying client which contains details of the securities purchased, the price, and brokerage charges that apply to the purchase, and which requests payment by the client. The buying broker is obliged to pay the purchase price for the securities within the time limits set under the Australian Stock Exchange Business Rules, whether or not the buying broker has received payment from the buying client. If payment has not been received from the buying client at that point, the buying broker will make payment for the securities from its general account.

In Australia, the Clearing House Electronic Sub-Register System (CHESS) provides an electronic sub-register for uncertified holdings of a number of classes of CHESS-approved securities. Each CHESS sub-register is administered by the Securities Clearing House (Securities Clearing House) and forms part of the issuer's relevant securities register for the purpose of the Corporations Law.

This electronic sub-register facilitates the registration of transfers of securities. In the paper environment, transfers are registered by the issuers securities registry on delivery of paper transfer and (except where the securities are held in uncertified form) the relevant security certificate. This obviously results in a delay between settlement of a transaction and registration of a transfer to reflect the transaction. The CHESS sub-register, however, is electronically linked to the issuer and CHESS participants, with the consequence that, for all practical purposes, delay between settlement and registration is eliminated. Information regarding CHESS subscription is obtained through the Australian Securities Commission.

Role and Legal Position of the Securities Clearing House. Part 7.2A of the Corporations Law deals with the approval of a body corporate known as the Securities Clearing House. The Corporations Law sets out a procedure for application and authorises the Minister to approve the applicant as the Securities Clearing House if the Minister is satisfied with certain matters.[6]

The Minister must be satisfied that the applicant's business rules have satisfactory provisions about facilities for settlement and transfer and any other facilities which the applicant proposes. The business rules also must include satisfactory provisions about the disciplining of Securities Clearing House participants or members.

Every foreign entity listed on the Australian Stock Exchange Limited, whether as an exempt foreign entity or through general admission, must establish and maintain in Australia an Australian securities register (or sub-register), a register of depositary receipts, or other appropriate facilities for the registration of transfers. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited operates a fully computerised system for the electronic transfer of uncertificated securities. This system is called CHESS, as described above. Every entity must comply with CHESS requirements unless it is precluded from participating by the jurisdiction in which it is established.

The Australian Stock Exchange Limited encourages foreign entities established in jurisdictions that preclude direct participation in CHESS to use other means to facilitate electronic clearing and settlement of transactions in their securities. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited can provide depositary instruments that allow transactions in the securities of exempt foreign entities to be cleared and settled through CHESS. These instruments are called CHESS Units of Foreign Securities (CUFS). Depositary instruments issued by third parties also may be used to allow transactions to clear and settle through CHESS.

Off-Market Transactions. Due to restrictive provisions in the Corporations Law and Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rules with respect to the trading of securities in listed companies and requirements placed on brokers and securities advisors, off-market transactions dealing with securities of a listed company that are insignificant. As such, this chapter does not address this issue. However, set out below is a summary of a new innovation by the Australian Stock Exchange Limited for the raising of capital by smaller non-listed companies which has the potential to have a significant impact in the future if embraced by the market.

Australian businesses have historically had problems raising equity capital. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited has developed an innovative solution to this problem which was expected to be implemented in the first quarter of 1998 and called the Enterprise Market. The Enterprise Market is an Internet-based capital market available to any non-listed entity wishing to raise capital. It may be a proprietary company, unlisted public company, partnership, joint venture, trust, or co-operative. Under certain circumstances, it also may be a proprietary subsidiary of a publicly listed company.

The Enterprise Market will utilise the very latest in Internet technology to deliver capital market for non-listed businesses which will hopefully become a model for future markets throughout the world.

There are approximately 10,000 non-listed businesses in Australia which have between one and 250 employees (small and medium-sized enterprises), and there has been a reluctance by these businesses to make the move from debt to equity capital. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited has determined that these small and medium-sized enterprises are looking to raise approximately Aus $500,000 each, representing an Aus $5 billion market. The Enterprise Market will have subscribers who will pay access fees. Subscribers will principally comprise:

- Companies that are looking for equity capital;
- Existing investors in non-listed companies who want to sell their shares;
- Investors who are looking for venture capital investors;
- Those who are acting for one of these parties; and
- Experts prepared to certify information provided by sellers.

An important aspect of the market is that both buyers and sellers have the choice to be anonymous. Using the Enterprise Market as a mechanism for capital-raising provides a general exemption from the prospectus requirements of the Corporations Law during that phase of the capital-raising process when investors are being identified. The Enterprise Market will provide a way of providing detailed information about a business to a wide variety of potential investors and advisers without requiring a formal prospectus.

Securities

National Treatment and Reciprocity. The Corporations Law defines 'securities' to mean:

- Debentures, stocks, or bonds issued or proposed to be issued by government;
- Shares in, or debentures of, a body; and
- Prescribed interests.[7]

Units of shares or prescribed interests also fall within the definition. The term 'unit' is defined in section 9 of the Corporations Law as including the right of interest, whether legal or equitable, in a share and option to acquire such a right or interest. It is arguable that the concept of a unit of shares in a body corporate is limited to options to acquire a right or interest in an issued share at a future time and does not include actions over unissued shares. Finally, the term 'securities' includes an option contract, but it does not include futures contracts and 'excluded securities'. The term 'excluded security' is defined in section 9 as:

- A share or debenture or a unit in a share or debenture where a right to participate in a retirement village is attached to the share debenture and where each of the other rights and any interest attached to the share or debenture is merely incidental to the right to participate in the retirement village scheme; or
- A prescribed interest constituted by a right to participate in a retirement village scheme.

In effect, the exclusion of 'excluded securities' from the definition of the term 'securities' in section 92 removes interest in retirement villages from the scope of regulation under chapter 7 of the Corporations Law. It is important to note that the inclusion of prescribed interests within the definition of 'securities' in section 92(1) extends the scope of the definition significantly, and it includes items which would not traditionally be characterised as securities. In particular, the term 'prescribed interest', operating through the definition of a 'participation interest', includes interest in a unit trust.

'Prescribed Interest' is defined in section 9 as a 'participation interest' or 'a right, whether enforceable or not, whether actual, prospective or contingent and whether or not evidence by a formal document, to participate in a time sharing scheme'. A major feature of the Corporations Law requiring use of a prospectus is the offer to the public criterion. Whenever an offer or invitation to subscribe for securities is made, a prospectus is required unless that offer or invitation is expressly exempt. In the event that the prospectus is required, it generally must be:

- Prepared in accordance with the content requirements of the Corporations Law;
- Lodged with the Australian Securities Commission;
- Registered by the Australian Securities Commission except in certain circumstances; and
- Issued, in the case of debenture and prescribed interest prospectuses, only in compliance with certain additional requirements.

The Corporations Law seeks to strike a balance between the need of potential investors for access to material information about an investment opportunity and the need to ensure that transactional costs in raising investment capital are not unreasonably disproportionate to the public benefits achieved by a mandatory disclosure document. Listed below are the broad prohibitions.

Issuer Requirements. A foreign issuer of securities would be required to be registered with the Australian Securities Commission as a foreign body prior to issuing any securities. Registration in Australia as a foreign body has been dealt with earlier. In addition, where the issuer requires its securities to be publicly traded, such foreign entity will be required to list on the Australian Stock Exchange Limited. This also will require the use of a prospectus and its lodgement with both the Australian Securities Commission and Australian Stock Exchange Limited.

An issue of securities in Australia not leading to listing on the Australian Stock Exchange Limited or a further issue of securities in Australia by a foreign entity also may require the lodgement of a prospectus with the Australian Securities Commission and Australian Stock Exchange and possibly the registration of that prospectus. This will be dealt with later in this chapter.

Listing on Australian Stock Exchange. There are two ways in which a foreign entity may list on the Australian Stock Exchange Limited. The first is a primary or secondary listing under the usual or general entry requirements (ie, general admission) of the Australian Stock Exchange Limited; the second is as an exempt foreign entity, which would involve a secondary listing on the Australian Stock Exchange Limited.

General Listing. A company wishing to be generally listed on the Australian Stock Exchange must demonstrate financial strength by satisfying either the profit test or the net-tangible-assets test. Under the profit test, there must have been:

- Aggregate profit for last three years of at least Aus $1 million;
- Consolidated profit for the last 12 months of more than Aus $400,000; and
- No change in main business activity in the last three years.

The applicant must provide audited financial statements for the last three years prepared in accordance with Australian Accounting Standards and a pro forma balance sheet post-listing, reviewed by an auditor or independent accountant.

Under the net-tangible-assets test, net tangible assets of at least Aus $2 million are required; there must be sufficient working capital and the likelihood to generate profit within three years from listing. The applicant must provide financial statements (not necessarily audited) for three years before listing[8] and a pro forma balance sheet post-listing, reviewed by an auditor or independent accountant.

Where the company to be listed is a mining exploration company, investment company, or scientific research company, the net-tangible-assets test is varied to take into account the different nature of those companies.

There must be at least 500 shareholders, each with at least Aus $2,000 worth of shares. This requirement ensures that there is sufficient interest in the entity to justify listing and aids liquidity. There is no requirement for a minimum number of Australian resident security holders. However, the Australian Stock Exchange Limited encourages foreign entities seeking primary listing to obtain and maintain a sizeable and diverse security holding base in Australia. The Australian Stock Exchange therefore encourages entities seeking a primary listing to have at least 300 Australian resident security holders, each holding a parcel of securities with a value at the time of listing of at least Aus $2,000.

It is important to note that the Australian Stock Exchange will not accept security holdings obtained by artificial means when assessing an entity spread of an entity's security holdings. For example, the Australian Stock Exchange Limited regards as 8 If the financial statements have not been audited an audit report for the most recent balance sheet.

s artificial the giving away of securities, offering non-recourse loans to prospective purchasers to acquire them, or using combinations of nominee companies as shareholders. The securities issued by the company must:

- Be ordinary shares, unless the Australian Stock Exchange otherwise approves;
- Have a par value of at least Aus $0.20; and
- Have equal voting rights.

The following general requirements also apply:

- In the view of the Australian Stock Exchange, the company must be suitable for listing;
- The foreign company is required to be registered as a foreign company with the Australian Securities Commission;
- The Australian Stock Exchange Limited must approve the memorandum and articles of association of the company, as the constitution of the foreign entity seeking a general admission listing must be consistent with the Corporations Law and with the Australian Stock Exchange Limited Listing Rules;[9]
- The company must have lodged a prospectus with the Australian Securities Commission, the Australian Stock Exchange Limited then reviewing it to see if it complies with the Listing Rules and that there is enough information available to allow trading of the securities;
- While the Australian Stock Exchange Limited does not review draft prospectuses, it does consider information of a more general nature before a prospectus is registered with the Australian Securities Commission;[10]
- Any shares issued in relation to the formation of the company, in return for selling assets to the company or the company's listing, must be held in escrow for at least two years;
- The company must have a share registry in Australia; and
- Just as with Australian companies, the Australian Stock Exchange Limited may require some securities of a foreign entity seeking a general admission to be 'restricted securities'.[11]

By way of general comment, a foreign entity seeking a primary listing on the Australian Stock Exchange Limited often benefits by having directors in offices resident in Australia. The Australian Stock Exchange encourages at least one Australian resident director, and 9 As part of the entity's application, it must complete a checklist to indicate compliance of its constitution with Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rules. It must identify any differences between a requirement and its jurisdiction for its constitution and Australian requirements when it applies to listing.

10 The Corporations Law sets out requirements for prospectuses. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited does not stipulate what information should be included in a prospectus and expert reports. That decision must be made by the entity and others involved in the preparation of the prospectus. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited, however, does require that a foreign entity seeking primary listing has an Australian resident among those accepting responsibility for the prospectus. This is usually satisfied by having an Australian resident director. The Australian Stock Exchange Limited may require that additional information is disclosed to the market before quoting the securities of the newly admitted entity to secure an informed secondary market.

11 Restricted securities are held in escrow for a specified period. This prevents the transfer of effective ownership or control of them. There are specific guidelines and Listing Rules applying to restricted securities.

an Australian resident company secretary or assistant company secretary. Even if a foreign entity seeking a general admission listing on the Australian Stock Exchange does not need to appoint an Australian agent to lodge documents and reports, the Australian Stock Exchange encourages it to do so as it is important for an entity to be seen to be close to the primary market for its securities and an Australian representative helps achieve this.

Exempt Foreign Entities. A secondary listing will occur if the entity is to be classified as an exempt foreign entity. Entities already listed on another stock exchange with a significant profit history or significant net tangible assets, and entities already listed on the New Zealand Stock Exchange may be eligible to apply in this category. Many of the Australian Stock Exchange's ongoing Listing Rules do not usually apply to exempt foreign entities. Specific admission requirements include:

- The entity must be a member of the Fèdèration International des Bourses de Valeurs at its overseas home exchange and be subject to and comply with the Listing Rules (or their equivalent) of that home exchange;
- The entity must have at least Aus $10 million operating profit before tax for each of the last three years or have net tangible assets of at least Aus $50 million;[12]
- There must be at least 1,000 holders, each having a parcel of securities (in the class for which the entity) with a value of at least Aus $500;[13]
- If the entity is a foreign company under the Corporations Law (as discussed above), the entity must be registered as a foreign entity;
- The entity must apply for and be granted 'securities in a class for which it seeks';[14] and
- An application form must be completed, and the Australian Stock Exchange must be given a copy of the entity's last annual report and any subsequent interim report.[15]

There also are a number of continuing requirements for an exempt foreign entity after it is listed on the Australian Stock Exchange. An exempt foreign entity, however, is not subject to a large portion of the Australian Stock Exchange's Listing Rules. The continuing requirements include providing to the Australian Stock Exchange in English all information it provides to its overseas home exchange that is, or is to be, made public; and continuing to comply with:

- The listing rules of its overseas home exchange;

12 Entities whose home exchange is the New Zealand Stock Exchange do not need to meet this requirement.

13 Entities whose home exchange is the New Zealand Stock Exchange do not need to meet this requirement.

14 The entity may apply for 'all securities in the class'. Entities with the New Zealand Stock Exchange as their home exchange must apply for and be granted 'of all securities in the class for which' on the Australian Stock Exchange Limited is sought.

15 The application form requires the entity to provide detailed information about itself (including a copy of its constitution, ie, memorandum and articles of association, or equivalent), a brief history, and a brief description of the regulatory regimes to which it is subject on its overseas home exchange and in its jurisdiction of incorporation or establishment.

- The Listing Rules relating to transfers and registers of securities, ie, no interference with transfers,[16] maintaining registers in Australia,[17] accepting transfer markings by persons approved by the Australian Stock Exchange,[18] and time limits;[19] and
- The Listing Rules relating to procedural and administrative matters, including the way announcements are lodged; trading halts, suspension, and removal; the application of the Listing Rules; and the interpretation and definitions.

The Exemption: New Zealand Companies. If a New Zealand company listed on the New Zealand Stock Exchange wishes to list on the Australian Stock Exchange, it is not required to comply with either the profit or net-tangible-assets test. The only requirements for listing such a company are:

- The company must be subject to the Listing Rules of New Zealand Stock Exchange and have a history of compliance with those rules;
- The company must give the Australian Stock Exchange a copy of its latest annual report, together with other information regarding the company's history;
- The company must establish an Australian share registry; and
- The company must quote all of the shares which are listed on the New Zealand Stock Exchange on the Australian Stock Exchange.

If the New Zealand company is not listed on the New Zealand Stock Exchange, it will need to comply with either the profit or the net-tangible-assets test and all the other requirements listed above. A New Zealand company which is listed on the New Zealand Stock Exchange and the Australian Stock Exchange Limited is not required to comply with all Australian Stock Exchange Limited Listing Rules. The New Zealand company would be required to comply with certain Listing Rules, such as giving the Australian Stock Exchange a copy of all documentation given to the New Zealand Stock Exchange. The company would not be required to lodge with the Australian Stock Exchange half-yearly and annual reports. It also would need to prepare its accounts in accordance with Australian or International Accounting Standards. Finally, a New Zealand company, whether listed on the New Zealand Stock Exchange or not, will be required to be registered in Australia as a foreign company under the Corporations Law.

Other Provisions of Note. If a foreign entity with a general admission listing on the Australian Stock Exchange is considering a significant change to the nature of scale of its activities, it must consult the Australian Stock Exchange, and it may be required to meet the admission and quotation Listing Rules in its restructured form as if it were seeking admission to the Official List again. A meeting of the entities security holders to approve the change to activities also may be required.

Some foreign jurisdictions restrict the listing of their domestic entities on foreign exchanges. An entity incorporated or registered in one of these jurisdictions seeking to list on the Australian Stock Exchange should obtain any necessary approvals before applying to be listed on the Australian Stock Exchange and provide the Australian Stock Exchange with evidence of the approval in making its application.

Prospectus Requirements. Pursuant to section 1018 of the Corporations Law, a company is prohibited from offering for subscription, or issuing invitations written or oral to subscribe for, securities of a corporation (in due form) unless a prospectus is lodged with the Australian Securities Commission and, where required, registered with the Australian Securities Commission. It is important to realise that this prohibition applies to all offers or invitations to subscribe for securities, irrespective of how the offer or invitation is conveyed.

The Australian Securities Commission has indicated that section 1018 of the Corporations Law applies to offers or invitations made in Australia only. An offer or invitation is made in Australia if it is received by the offeree or invitee in Australia. Section 1018 does not have extraterritorial effect. The following can be said of offers or invitations made by a foreign company or an offer or invitation made outside of Australia:

- A primary offering solely made outside Australia by an Australian or foreign company will not require a prospectus in relation to the offering or invitation for the purposes of Australian law. However, if these securities (the subject of the offer or invitation) are to be listed on Australian Stock Exchange then a prospectus is required to be lodged and registered before listing is sought.
- A primary offering solely or partly made in Australia by a foreign company will require a prospectus to be lodged with the Australian Securities Commission unless the offer or invitation is excluded under the Corporations Law.

Offers or Invitations in Secondary Trading. Until 4 September 1994, section 1018 applied to offers and invitations to buy securities already issued. On 4 September 1994, amendments to division 2, part 7.12, of the Corporations Law came into effect so that now secondary trading in quoted securities (ie, those already listed on the Australian Stock Exchange) do not need any disclosure through a prospectus or similar document other than that required of the corporation by the continuous disclosure regime of the Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rules.

Different rules will apply for secondary trading of unquoted securities, depending on whether the sale is less or greater than 30 per cent of the issued capital of the entity.[20]

Specific Exemptions. The Corporations Law provides a number of specific exemptions from the requirement to use a prospectus when issuing securities. The exemptions are intended to ensure that the efficient operation of the securities markets in Australia is not unreasonably impeded by onerous requirements. These exemptions generally relate to small-scale securities sales, campaigns, transactions in issued stock exchange quoted securities, and offers which are confined to persons who may reasonably be thought to be able to make an investment decision without the aid of a prospectus.

In essence, if the issue is an 'excluded issue' or 'excluded offer or invitation', as defined under section 66 of the Corporations Law, a company including a foreign company is not required to issue a prospectus. Some of the issues, offers, or invitations of securities which are regarded as an 'excluded issue' or 'excluded offer or invitation' are as follows:

- The amount subscribed for the securities by each person to whom the securities are issued or allotted is at least Aus $500,000, or offers or invitations to subscribe for at least Aus $500,000 by each person to whom the offer is made or invitation is issued;
- The securities are issued or allotted to an underwriter under an underwriting agreement;
- No consideration is paid or provided in respect of the issue or allotment;
- Securities of the same class are issued or allotted to no more than 20 persons in any consecutive 12-month period as a result of each of those persons accepting an offer or invitation which had been issued or made personally to them;
- The securities are issued or allotted to an executive officer of the issuing corporation, or any of its related bodies corporate; any close relative of such an executive officer; or body corporate in which such executive officers, or their close relatives, have a controlling interest;
- The securities are rights or interests in a superannuation fund constituted by or under a local or foreign law or are debentures of an excluded corporation;
- The securities are issued or allotted by a listed corporation pursuant to the exercise of an option grant pursuant to a prospectus;
- Shares are issued to a person by a listed corporation under a provision contained in a convertible note, whether the note was issued by that corporation or by another body corporate;
- Debentures, other than convertibles notes, of a corporation are issued to the holders of existing debentures (other than convertible notes) of that corporation;
- Convertible notes are issued by a corporation to existing holders of convertible notes issued by that corporation; and
- It is specifically declared by regulation to be an excluded issue.

Contents of Prospectus. In addition to a limited number of other specified matters which must be included in a prospectus, section 1022 of the Corporations Law provides that a prospectus must contain all such information as investors and their professional advisors would reasonably require and reasonably expect to find in the prospectus for the purpose of making an informed assessment of:

- The assets and liabilities, financial position, profits and losses, and the prospects of the company; and
- The rights attaching to the securities being offered.

In determining the information to be included in the prospectus, regard also must be given to issues such as the nature of the securities, the kind of person likely to consider investing in the securities, the fact that certain matters are already known by professional advisers and investors, and whether investors have previously been supplied with information. As a basis, the following information would typically be included in a prospectus:

- The company's capital structure, directors, and management;
- The proposed use of the funds;
- The company's material contracts;
- The risks, including any particular credit risks associated with investing in the company;
- An investigating accountants report, including historical audited financial results, pro forma balance sheet reflecting the financial position of the company following the issue, and justification of any profit forecasts; and
- The economic, political, and legal environment in which the company operates.

Registration of Prospectus. Once a prospectus has been completed and signed by the directors of the issuing company, the prospectus must be registered with the Australian Securities Commission, together with an application for it to be registered under section 1020A of the Corporations Law. The application should request registration under the Corporations Law rather than under the Corporations Law of a particular jurisdiction. This ensures that, once registered, it will be treated as a valid prospectus throughout Australia.

Although after a prospectus is lodged the Australian Securities Commission has 14 days to consider whether to register or refuse to register it, as a matter of practice, the Australian Securities Commission aims to confirm registration of prospectus within three days of lodgement. Once a prospectus has been registered, a company is free to offer securities for a period of up to 12 months after the date of issue of the prospectus.

Multinational Offerings. A number of foreign companies will require multinational securities offerings. It is vital that a thorough due diligence program is implemented with the effect of minimising the potential criminal and civil liability that could arise if the prospectus is deficient. The main liability provisions arising under the Corporations Law are section 995, which prohibits a person from engaging in conduct that is misleading and deceptive are likely to mislead or deceive, and section 996, which provides that a person must not authorise or cause the issue of a prospectus in which there is a material statement that is false and misleading or from which there is a material omission.

Criminal liability extends to persons who authorise or cause the issue of a deficient prospectus. To establish a due diligence defence against such liability, a party must establish a due diligence committee, create checklists, and verify statements. Section 1030 of the Corporations Law deems any document issued by a corporation to be a prospectus that allots, or agrees to allot or issue, its securities for the purpose of being offered for on-sale by any person. The prospectus liability provisions attach to such documents.

Applying for Listing. If a prospectus refers to the company seeking listing on the Australian Stock Exchange, an application for listing must be made within three days of the date of issue of the prospectus. If permission for the listing is not granted within six weeks of the date of issue (or such longer period, not exceeding 12 weeks, as is notified with the Australian Stock Exchange), any allotment of securities pursuant to the prospectus is void, and the company must repay any subscription monies received.

Corporate Governance. Corporate governance is the system by which companies are controlled. The Australian Stock Exchange requires listed entities to adopt appropriate corporate governance practices. At the same time, the Australian Stock Exchange recognises that certain governance practices may be appropriate for particular types of listed entities but not for others.

The Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rules require entities to provide details of their corporate governance practices in their annual report. To assist entities, an indicative list of corporate governance matters has been included as an appendix to the Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rules. Examples of such matters include the main procedures for establishing and reviewing the compensation arrangements for board members and senior executives and the main procedures for the nomination of external auditors in reviewing the adequacy of existing external audit arrangements.

There are a number of corporate publications that may assist listed entities that are examining their corporate governance practices. These include Corporate Practices and Conduct (November 1995), produced by the working group on corporate practices and conduct and Corporate Governance — A Guide for Investment Managers and Statement of Recommended Corporate Practice (June 1995), produced by the Australian Investment Managers Association. The Australian Institute of Company Directors has recently published a code of conduct for company directors. The Australian Stock Exchange expressly supports the activities of the Institute in enhancing the awareness of professional knowledge of directors.

Periodic Disclosure

Official and Regulated Market

In General. The Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rules provide for continuous disclosure by all listed entities. Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rule 3.1 states:

> Once an entity is or becomes aware of any information concerning it that a reasonable person would expect to have a material effect on the price or value of the entity's securities, the entity must immediately tell Australian Stock Exchange that information. This rule does not apply to particular information while each of the following applies:
> 3.1.1 A reasonable person would not expect the information to be disclosed.
> 3.1.2 The information is confidential.

> 3.1.3 One or more of the following applies:
> (a) It would be a breach of a law to disclose the information.
> (b) The information concerns an incomplete proposal or negotiation.
> (c) The information comprises matters of supposition or is insufficiently definite to warrant disclosure.
> (d) The information is generated for the internal management purposes of the entity.
> (e) The information is a trade secret.

The Rule applies to all listed entities except exempt foreign entities. Exempt foreign entities were discussed earlier. The word 'aware' is defined in the Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rules as follows:

> An entity becomes aware of information if a director or executive officer (in the case of a trust, a director or executive officer of the management company) has, or ought reasonably to have, come into possession of the information in the course of the performance of their duties as a director or executive officer of that entity.

The definition of 'aware' in the Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rules is based on a similar provision in the Corporations Law; however, it is narrower in that the test is limited to directors and executive officers and does not extend to employees generally. An executive officer is a person concerned in, or taking part in, the management of the company. Compliance with the Australian Stock Exchange Listing Rule 3.1 is the responsibility of the entity and, for this reason, appropriate systems should be considered to identify material information and decide about disclosure of that information. The Australian Stock Exchange's continuous disclosure regime is supported by the following principal:

> Timely disclosure of information must be made which may affect security values or influence investment decisions, and information in which security holders and investors in Australian Stock Exchange have a legitimate interest.

The continuous disclosure rules are particularly important and apply to all listed entities except exempt foreign entities. Debt issuers must comply with the continuous disclosure rules in relation to their debt securities.

Obligation to Disclose. The language of the obligation to disclose under Listing Rule 3.1 is similar to the language used in section 1001A of the Corporations Law. An entity must disclose information if a reasonable person would expect that information to have a material effect on the price or value of the securities. A reasonable person is taken to expect information to have a material effect on the price or value of securities if it would, or would be likely to, influence persons who commonly invest in securities in deciding whether or not to subscribe for, buy or sell the securities. In Flavel v Roget,[22] O'Loughlin J said:

> Much will depend on the identity of the particular company; what one company should advise the Stock Exchange might not need to be advised > by a second company; what should be advised by a company at one stage in its career might not need to be advised at another stage of its career because of changed circumstances.

Other Requirements. Entities must disclose information needed to prevent a false market, ie, they may be required to confirm or correct rumours. The fact that information is generally available is not an excuse for failing to disclose. An entity may not release information which is for release to the market to any person (including the media, even on an embargoed basis) until it has given the information to the Australian Stock Exchange Limited and received an acknowledgement that the Australian Stock Exchange Limited has released it to the market. There are 'out-of-hours' exceptions to this.

The entity must disclose material information of which it is aware has come from any source and must take into account its interests in other entities. The information to be disclosed is information concerning the entity, however, if general information has a particular effect on the entity (eg, a lower gold price means that the entity can no longer economically operate a mine) that should be disclosed.

Exceptions. Under Listing Rule 3.1.1, a reasonable person would not expect information to be disclosed if the result would be an unreasonable prejudice to the entity; the Australian Stock Exchange Limited will balance the needs of the market and the interests of the entity. For this reason, an inordinate amount of detail is not expected.

Under Listing Rule 3.1.2, the second requirement of the exception is that the information is confidential. 'Confidential' in this context has the sense of secret, and it generally implies control by the entity of the use that can be made of the information, ie, it means that no one in possession of the information is entitled to trade in the entity's securities. Entities are not entitled to rely on the exception just by entering into confidentiality arrangements if the other two requirements are not satisfied.

The Australian Stock Exchange Limited accepts that confidentiality is not breached if information is given to an entity's advisers, a person the entity is negotiating with, or other regulatory authorities, if it is be given on a basis that restricts its use to the stated purpose.

Other Announcements. Other announcements that may be necessary include:

- Interim announcements in the event of delays to the possibility of detailed disclosure;[23]

22 Flavel v Roget (1990) 1 Australian Company and Securities Reports 595, at pp 602 and 603.
23 An insufficient announcement may result in a trading halt.

- Speculation responses;
- Shortfall or over-subscription information regarding underwriting;
- Analysts reports;
- Provision of information to the Australian Stock Exchange Limited no later than the time that it is given to the overseas market; and
- Additional accounting information or accounting forms, as may be necessary for the market to be properly informed.

Enforcement of Listing Rule Disclosure Requirements

Section 1001A of the Corporations Law imposes statutory liability for certain breaches of Listing Rule 3.1. Furthermore, the credibility of the market is enhanced if continuous disclosure is carried out in the 'spirit' of the Listing Rules and, for this reason, the continuous disclosure Listing Rules relating to publicly listed companies are not interpreted in a restrictive or legalistic fashion.

Post-Listing Requirements

Financial Reports. Periodic disclosure of financial information is required. This is in the form of:

- Half-yearly reports, within 75 days of the end of any accounting period;
- End-of-year or annual report, within 75 days of the end of year accounting period; and
- Copies of all annual financial statements which are required to be lodged with the Australian Securities Commission.

One sanction imposed by the Australian Stock Exchange on an entity that fails to meet reporting deadlines is that the quotation of its securities will be suspended until the required reports have been given to the Australian Stock Exchange. It is therefore important that foreign entities with a general admission listing on the Australian Stock Exchange have staff with the accounting skills (including expertise in the Australian accounting standards used) necessary to ensure that the Australian Stock Exchange's ongoing reporting requirements are met. Generally, the Australian Stock Exchange will accept international accounting and auditing standards.

For historical financial statements provided in relation to an application by a foreign company for a primary listing, an Australian accounting firm must confirm that the audit methodologies used closely conform to Australian, international, or other standards acceptable to the Australian Stock Exchange.

General Compliance. The foundation for the Listing Rules is to ensure that the market for shares is fully informed of the company's operations. The Listing Rules regulate such matters as:

- Share issues of more than 10 per cent of the total capital in any one year without obtaining prior shareholder approval;
- Share buy-backs;

- Employee share incentive schemes;
- Related party transactions; and
- Significant changes to the nature or scale of activities.

Additionally, the Australian Stock Exchange must be notified of and, in some cases, approve:

- Proposed constitution of the company and amendments;
- Documents sent to a person to participate in a new issue of shares;
- Documents sent to shareholders seeking their approval under the Listing Rules; and
- Issues of shares and changes to the registered office or auditor.

To maintain the company's listing, a company must:

- Comply with the Listing Rules;
- Maintain a strong financial position;
- Not allow half or more than half of the company's total assets to be in cash or in a form readily convertible to cash; and
- Maintain a sufficient spread of shareholders to ensure that there is an orderly and liquid market.

Trading Rules

Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings

Shareholder Duties. Under part 6.7 of the Corporations Law, any person with a substantial shareholding in the voting shares of a listed company is required to give notice of that shareholding to the company and the Australian Stock Exchange within two days of reaching that limit.

In general terms, a person is a substantial shareholder by virtue of being entitled to more than five per cent of the voting shares of a company.[24] Shares to which a person is entitled include shares in which the person or an associate (widely defined) has a relevant interest.[25] 'Associates' include related bodies corporate, directors, and persons acting with a common interest. A person has a relevant interest in a voting share in a company if that person has the power to:

- Exercise, or to control the exercise of, the right to vote attached to that share; or
- Dispose of, or exercise control over, the disposal of that share.

It is important to note that the power or control includes a reference to power or control that is direct or indirect or which is exercisable as a result of, or even in breach of, an arrangement or understanding, whether enforceable or not.

Furthermore, it is possible to have a deemed entitlement to shares. If an agreement is entered into between two parties relating to shares in which one of the parties holds a relevant interest, the other party will be deemed to be entitled to the shares that are the subject of the agreement. The effect of the substantial shareholder provision is that it is difficult for a predator to acquire a holding of between the five per cent and the 20 per cent take-over threshold without the target company's knowledge prior to a formal bid. Section 718 also enables a company or shareholder to require a nominee shareholder in the company to disclose for whom it is acting.

25 Corporations Law (Cth), s 609(1).

It is also important to note that the provisions of the Corporations Law dealing with notification of substantial shareholdings and take-overs do not apply to companies established outside of Australia. The Australian Stock Exchange has introduced measures to protect investors and ensure that the market is properly informed. For example, a foreign entity with its primary listing on the Australian Stock Exchange is required to include in each annual report a prominent statement about each of the following matters:

- Its place of incorporation or registration;
- That it is not subject to chapter 6 of the Corporations Law, which deals with the acquisition of shares (ie, substantial shareholdings and take-overs); and
- Any limitations on the acquisition of securities imposed by the jurisdiction in which it is incorporated or registered.

Entities should consider including similar statements in any prospectus or information memorandum may issue. The Australian Stock Exchange usually requires a foreign entity with a general admission listing to undertake to give adequate information to the Australian Stock Exchange about the ownership of its securities. The Australian Stock Exchange will then release that information to the market. The usual undertakings are to tell the market immediately the entity becomes aware of any person becoming a substantial shareholder and to disclose any details of this substantial shareholding of which the entity is aware.[26] A person has a substantial shareholding in a body corporate if, and only if, the person is entitled to not less than the prescribed percentage of:

- Where the voting shares in the body are not divided into two or more classes, those voting shares; or
- Where the voting shares in the body are divided into two or more classes, the shares in one of those classes.

Section 709 requires a person who is a substantial shareholder in a company to give the company notice in the prescribed form of:

- The person's name and address;
- Particulars relating to his or her relevant interest; and
- Particulars of any agreement or any other circumstances by reason of which he or she acquired the interest.

A person required to give a notice must do so within two business days after becoming aware of the circumstances by virtue of which he is a substantial shareholder. Furthermore, section 709(5) requires notice to be given even if the person has ceased to be a substantial shareholder before the expiry of the two-day period.

26 'Substantial Shareholder' is defined to include 'a person who has a substantial shareholding in a body corporate'.

A person who fails to comply with the substantial shareholder notice obligations is not guilty of a criminal offence but is liable for damages to any person who suffers loss or damage as a result of that failure. It is a defence if the failure is due to inadvertence, mistake, or to the person not being aware of a relevant fact or occurrence. Finally, where a contravention occurs the courts may make certain orders on the application of the Australian Securities Commission or the company. These include:

- Restraining the acquisition or disposal of an interest in the shares;
- Restraining the exercise of any voting or other rights attached to the shares;
- Directing a company not to pay dividends on the shares;
- Vesting the shares in the Australian Securities Commission;
- Directing the company not to register the transfer of specified shares;
- Cancelling a contract, arrangement, or offer relating to specified shares; and/or
- Directing the company or any other person to do or refrain from doing a specified act for the purposes of securing compliance with any order.

Company Duties. Once a substantial shareholder has notified the company or its holding, the company is to provide such notices to the Australian Stock Exchange. In addition, the Listing Rules expressly require companies to notify the Australian Securities Commission of statements received under the substantial shareholder provisions in the Corporations Law. Annual reports also must contain, inter alia, the names of substantial shareholders and the equity securities in which they are interested.

Insider Trading and Fraud

Basis of Territorial Link. 'Insider trading' may be characterised as trading by a trader who possesses information that is 'material' to the price of the securities which are traded, which is not already known to other traders in the market, and which is not the product of analysis of publicly available information by that trader. A trader may obtain access to information of that nature as a result of:

- A relationship with the issuer of the securities;
- A relationship with a prospective bidder for those securities;
- A professional relationship with the issuer or the bidder of the securities; or
- Receiving the information from a person who has such a relationship.

Section 1002G of the Corporations Law contains the primary prohibition against insider trading where:

- A person (the insider) possesses information that is not generally available but, if the information were generally available, a reasonable person would expect it to have a material effect on the price or value of the securities; and

- The person knows or ought reasonably to know that the information was not generally available and, if it were generally available, it might have a material effect on the price or the value of those securities.

Section 1002G of the Corporations Law does not require that there exist any connection or relationship between that person who is prohibited from trading and the body corporate which is the issuer of the securities. A person becomes an insider for the purposes of section 1002G simply by the possession of information having the relevant quality, if that person knows or ought reasonably to know that the information is not generally available and that, if it were generally available, might have a material effect on the price of the securities.

Section 1002G of the Corporations Law states that an insider is prohibited from subscribing for, purchasing, or selling securities, or entering into an agreement to do so, or procuring another person to subscribe for, purchase or sell securities or enter into an agreement to do so. Section 1002G(2) applies to trading in securities of all companies, whether listed or not. Section 1002G(3) prohibits a person from:

- Directly or indirectly communicating material non-public information within the scope of section 1002G to another person; or
- Causing that information to be communicated to the other person if trading on securities is permitted on the stock market of the securities exchange.

Extraterritorial Application. Section 1002G applies to acts and omissions within an Australian state or territory in relation to securities of a body corporate, whether or not the body corporate is formed in or carries on business in Australia. However, however, applies to acts and omissions outside Australia in relation to securities of a body corporate which is formed or carries on business in an Australian state or territory.[27] The prohibition on insider trading, therefore, applies to trading securities of an Australian corporation, even where the trading takes place outside Australia.

Public Take-Over Bids

Listing Rules. As stated earlier, the provisions of the Corporations Law dealing with notification of substantial shareholdings and take-overs do not apply per se to companies established outside of Australia. The Listing Rules, however, place obligations on these forms of companies that are listed on the Australian Stock Exchange.

A listed company is required by Listing Rule 3.1 to immediately notify the Australian Stock Exchange of any information which a reasonable person would expect to have a material effect on the price or value of its shares. Listing Rule 3.1.3 requires a listed company to immediately inform the Australian Stock Exchange when it gives or receives a notice of intention to make a take-over offer.

27 Corporations Law (Cth), s 1002(b).

Under Listing Rule 7.1, private placements of more than 10 per cent in nominal value of a company's issued shares (or securities with rights of conversion into ordinary shares) may not be made without prior ordinary shareholder approval, unless the shares are issued, inter alia:

- Pro rata to all ordinary shareholders;
- As a result of the conversion of convertible securities;
- Pursuant to a take-over offer made by the company complying with part 6.3, division 1, of the Corporations Law; or
- To persons participating in a shareholders' dividend plan or an employee incentive scheme as approved by ordinary shareholders.

In relation to take-overs, once a company has received written notice of an intention to bid for it, under Listing Rule 7.9, the company is restrained for a period of three months from issuing shares or other equity securities unless, inter alia:

- The proposed issue was notified to the Australian Stock Exchange before the company was informed of the bid;
- The issue is made pro rata to all ordinary shareholders;
- An issue is made on the exercise of rights of conversion; and
- An issue is made under a dividend or distribution that is in operation at the time the notice is received.

Listing Rule 10.1 imposes significant restraints on a company's ability to take action in respect of the purchase or disposition of significant assets or the subscription or allotment of shares from or to particular persons. The listing rule comes into effect where the assets and/or shares exceed five per cent of the total shareholders' funds of the company as at its last balance sheet date, without the prior approval of shareholders in general meeting if the vendor or disponer of the assets or securities is:

- A director or officer of the company or any entity with which it is associated;
- A substantial shareholder of the company who is entitled to at least 10 per cent of its voting securities;
- An associate of the company or its related corporations; or
- Any other person whose association with any such person or company is such that in the opinion of the exchange the proposed acquisition or disposal should be referred to shareholders in general meeting.

The notice of meeting of shareholders to approve any such acquisition or disposal must include a report sufficient to establish that the transaction is fair and reasonable to all other shareholders, other than those who cannot vote. This category includes the purchaser or vendor, any associate, and any other person whose vote the Australian Stock Exchange believes should be disregarded.

Corporations Law. Company take-overs in Australia are primarily regulated by chapter 6 of the Corporations Law.

Control of the Acquisition of Shares. The Corporations Law prohibits a person, including any form of foreign corporation, from acquiring shares in a company established in Australia if:

- Any person who is entitled to less than 20 per cent of the voting shares in the company, immediately after the acquisition, would be entitled to more than 20 per cent; or
- Any person who is entitled to between 20 per cent and 90 per cent of the voting shares in the company would, immediately after the acquisition, be entitled to a greater percentage, unless the acquisition is in accordance with one of the specific exceptions set out in the Corporations Law.

An acquisition is generally constituted by the purchase of existing shares or the issue of new shares. A voting share is an issued share that confers a right to vote not being a right to vote that is exercisable only in one or more of a number of limited circumstances. These limited circumstances are typically associated with the limited voting rights of preference shares.

The prohibition relates to the acquisition of any class of shares, even though the 20 per cent threshold relates to voting shares. Thus, an acquisition of non-voting shares could contravene the law if it increases the percentage entitlement to voting shares beyond the 20 per cent threshold. In addition, there is no restriction on an acquirer's percentage entitlement to non-voting shares or to other securities such as options over unissued shares or convertible notes. However, the Corporations Law restricts the circumstances in which those securities may be converted into voting shares.

An acquirer can contravene the law by an acquisition which leads to another person increasing its entitlement beyond the 20 per cent threshold. As alluded to and defined earlier in this chapter, the concept of entitlement is central to the prohibition and is defined in the Corporations Law. A person is entitled to shares in most cases if that person or an associate of that person has a relevant interest in the shares.

The Corporations Law relating to take-overs purports to have extraterritorial operation and Australian law may have force even though a transaction might comply with the laws of other countries. For example, the take-over of a United States company which holds more than 20 per cent of the voting shares in an Australian listed company would attract the provisions of chapter 6 of the Corporations Law. However, the Australian Securities Commission does have discretionary powers to exempt such acquisitions from the impact of the Corporations Law in certain circumstances.[28]

Objectives of Take-Over Provisions. Part 6.9 of chapter 6 of the Corporations Law deals with the powers of the Australian Securities Commission, the Corporations and Securities Panel, and the courts relating to unacceptable circumstances in acquisition and take-over situations. Section 731 of the Corporations Law sets out the objectives underlying the regulation of acquisitions and take-overs as embodied in chapter 6 of the Corporations Law. These objectives are:

- Shareholders and directors know the identity of any person who proposes to acquire a substantial interest in the company;

28 Corporations Law (Cth), s 728.

- Shareholders and directors have reasonable time to consider any proposals and make a decision;
- Shareholders and directors are supplied with sufficient information; and
- Shareholders have equal opportunity to participate in any benefits of the offer.

Section 732 provides that unacceptable circumstances have occurred if those objectives have not been present in an acquisition of shares or in relation to the conduct of a person. Where the Australian Securities Commission believes that one or more of these objectives may have been infringed, it may apply to the Panel for a declaration in relation to the acquisition or conduct of a person. The Panel simulates the Take-Overs Panel in the United Kingdom with the function to provide timely and expert decisions on issues arising in a take-over without the need to resort to the courts to avoid delays, technicalities and complications that legal actions can involve.

Although the powers of the Panel are extensive it has never functioned effectively as a result of questions raised about its legality which arose from the Panel's first matter. The Panel has been under review since 1992. In any event, the Australian Securities Commission has the right to institute legal actions should it determine that unacceptable circumstances have occurred.

Take-Over Techniques. Section 615 of the Corporations Law prohibits a person from acquiring voting shares in a company which would result in that person being entitled to more than 20 per cent of the voting shares in that company or increasing their existing holding if such holding is already between 20 per cent to 90 per cent of the company.

This prohibition does not apply to the acquisition of shares made under a take-over scheme[29] or a take-over announcement.[30] There also are other exceptions to this section 615 which will be discussed later in this chapter, such as a three per cent creeping take-over,[31] an acquisition approved by resolution of shareholders of the target company,[32] an acquisition under a scheme of arrangement approved by the court,[33] or an acquisition approved by the Australian Securities Commission.[34]

In situations where foreign companies intend to take over companies listed on the Australian Stock Exchange, the most practical and viable avenue for acquisition is a formal take-over scheme. In essence, this is because on-market take-over announcements must be unconditional, creeping take-overs are too slow, and Australian Securities Commission approval is not readily granted.

Foreign companies also must make thorough investigations into the effect of the Foreign Acquisitions and Take-Overs Act 1975 (Cth). The acquisition of an Australian company via a company controlled by persons who are not Australian residents would usually require the approval of the Federal Treasurer pursuant to this Act. In practice, it is usual for the take-over scheme to be made subject to receiving the Treasurer's approval, and an application for approval is immediately lodged after the announcement of the bid. The mechanics of the Foreign Acquisitions and Take-Overs Act 1975 (Cth) will be discussed below.

A take-over scheme is the most common method of acquisition chosen by an acquirer who wishes to hold more than 20 per cent of the voting shares in a listed company. The process will usually take a minimum of three months from announcement to completion, or substantially longer if the offer is contested or runs into regulatory hurdles.

An acquirer must proceed to make its offers within two months after announcing that it proposes to make the take-over offer. Limited exceptions to this rule allow an acquirer not to proceed in certain circumstances, but the exceptions are relied on at some risk (eg, compensating disgruntled shareholders).

The Corporations Law requires an offeror to make an offer to each shareholder holding shares in the class of shares being acquired. The offers must be for all of the shares in that class held by the shareholder or for a fixed proportion of each shareholder's shares.

The take-over scheme (offer) process begins with the preparation of an offer document and 'part A statement'. The offer document will detail the terms of the offer, including the length of the offer period, the consideration and the conditions, if any, to which the offer is subject. It will be accompanied by an acceptance form. The part A statement is a statutory disclosure document. The target company will then respond with a 'part B statement' which contains a recommendation in relation to the offer.

A take-over offer must remain open for at least one month and for not longer than six months from the date of the offer. It is possible to extend the offer period for a further six-month period.

The consideration offered to the shareholders of the target company may be cash, securities (which do not need to be listed securities) or a combination of both. The offer price, in the case of a cash offer, must not be less than the highest price per share paid by the offeror (or its associates) for any shares in the target company in the four months prior to the offer being made. The consideration offered to each shareholder must be the same. The offeror must pay the consideration to shareholders within 30 days after the offer is accepted or becomes unconditional, whichever is the later but, in any event, no later than 21 days after the end of the offer period.

A take-over offer may include conditions or it may be unconditional. A common condition is that the offeror receives acceptances in respect of a minimum percentage of shares. A minimum acceptance condition of 50.1 per cent of the voting shares will ensure outright control of the target company and, generally speaking, a minimum acceptance condition of 90 per cent of the voting shares will usually allow compulsory acquisition of minority shareholdings. A minimum acceptance condition cannot be varied, but it can be waived. Maximum acceptance conditions are not allowed.

Other conditions can be included, such as a condition that foreign investment approval be obtained is obviously very common in situations where foreign companies make take-over offers. Another common condition is that there not be any materially adverse change in the financial position of the target company. Such conditions must not offend provisions of the Corporations Law which prohibit conditions the fulfilment of which depends on an opinion, belief, or state of mind of the offeror or the occurrence of an event which is within the sole control of the offeror or its associates.

Contracts resulting from acceptances of offers will be void if, at the end of the offer period, any condition is not fulfilled. A take-over offer may be declared free from a condition if the declaration is made not less than seven days before the last day of the offer period.

A take-over offer cannot be withdrawn without the written consent of the Australian Securities Commission and that consent will not be readily forthcoming. It is possible for an offeror to vary a take-over offer by improving its terms (eg, increasing the offer consideration or adding a cash alternative to a share consideration) or extending the offer period. Other variations can be made with Australian Securities Commission consent. Any increase in consideration during the offer period must be paid to each person whose shares were acquired before the variation was made.

The Corporations Law requires the offeror to prepare and send a part A statement to shareholders. The part A statement is a document containing information material to a shareholder's decision whether or not to accept the offer. The document must comply with certain requirements set out in the Corporations Law, but it also may contain any information the offeror wishes to include so long as it is not false or misleading. The part A statement and offer must be registered by the Australian Securities Commission and then served on the target company. The part A statement also must be lodged with the Australian Stock Exchange. The part A statement and offer are then sent to target company shareholders at least two weeks (but not more than four weeks) after the part A statement has been served on the target company. The main disclosures in the part A statement will be:

- The offer period;
- Particulars of the offeror and its directors;
- The offeror's entitlement to shares in the target company;
- Particulars of share trading in the target company and in the offeror by the offeror and its associates in the previous four months;
- Particulars of the consideration being offered, including the source of any cash funding;
- Particulars of the offeror's intentions regarding the ongoing business of the target company and the target company's employees;
- Any material changes in the financial position of the target company since the date of its last balance sheet;
- Any other information material to a shareholder in making a decision whether or not to accept the offer; and
- In the case of an offer of securities, additional information of the type that would be included in a prospectus.

After the target company receives the offeror's part A statement, it will respond with a part B statement which must be sent to the offeror and to target company shareholders. If the part B statement is issued within 14 days of receipt of the part A statement, then it will be the offeror's responsibility to send copies to shareholders; otherwise, it will be the target company's responsibility. A copy of the part B statement must be lodged with the Australian Securities Commission and the Australian Stock Exchange. Where an offeror is entitled to more than 30 per cent of the voting shares in the target company or the offeror and the target company have a common director, the part B statement must be accompanied by an expert's opinion as to whether or not the offer is fair and reasonable.

The take-over announcement process begins with the offeror making an announcement to the Australian Stock Exchange of its intention to acquire target company shares at a specified price. The announcement binds the offeror to buy all shares offered at that specified price for a period of one month commencing two weeks after the announcement. The offeror also has the right to commence buying shares before the expiration of that two week period. A take-over announcement cannot be made if the offeror is entitled to 30 per cent or more of the shares in the target company at the time of the announcement.

In a take-over announcement, the offeror must issue a 'part C statement', and the target company must respond with a 'part D statement'. The information contained in those documents is similar to that contained in the part A and part B statements in respect of a take-over offer. A part C offer must be unconditional, and the offer price per share must be in cash and not be less than the highest price per share paid by the offeror (or its associates) in the four months prior to the take-over announcement. The offer price can be increased during the offer period.[35] The main disclosures in the part B statement will be:

- The recommendation of directors whether or not to accept the offer and the reasons for the recommendation;
- The directors' entitlements to shares in the target company;
- Whether the directors intend to accept the offer for their shares;
- The name of any director of the target company who voted against the resolution authorising the part B statement;
- Particulars of share trading in the offeror by the target company and its associates or in the target company by its associates in the previous four months;
- Material changes in the financial position of the target company since the date of its last balance sheet; and
- Any other information material to a shareholder in making a decision whether to accept the offer.

The offeror may acquire the shares held by remaining shareholders by compulsory acquisition where, under either a take-over scheme or a take-over announcement:

35 One of the main advantages of the part C offer over a part A offer is that any increased consideration does not need to be paid to former shareholders of the target company who have already accepted the offer.

- An offeror becomes entitled to not less than 90 per cent of all of the shares in the target company during the course of the offer; and
- If the offeror commenced the offer with an entitlement to more than 10 per cent of the target company's shares; either
- Seventy-five per cent of the offerees have disposed of their shares to the offeror; or
- Seventy-five per cent of the shareholders registered at the commencement of the offer are no longer registered one month after the end of the offer period.

Any person who has not accepted the offer may apply to the court for an order that their shares not be subject to compulsory acquisition, but such applications are rarely successful. If an offeror reaches the 90 per cent threshold and chooses not to proceed to compulsory acquisition, the remaining shareholders are entitled to require that the offeror acquires their shares. Similar rights are given to the holders of non-voting shares, renounceable options and convertible notes in the target company.

An offeror is not allowed to give, offer to give, or agree to give to a target company shareholder a benefit which is not provided for under the take-over offer or take-over announcement. The period during which this prohibition applies commences four months before a proposed take-over offer or take-over announcement, and it runs until the end of the offer period. Thus, an offeror cannot do a 'sweetheart' deal with a major shareholder to ensure its acceptance of the offer.

An offeror who has made a take-over offer or a take-over announcement may not dispose of any shares in the target company until the offer period has expired unless some other person not associated with the offeror makes a take-over offer or take-over announcement.

During a take-over offer or take-over announcement, the offeror must notify the Australian Stock Exchange of all changes in its entitlements to voting shares in the target company by 9.30 a.m. on the next day after shares are acquired.

An acquirer who becomes entitled to five per cent or more of the voting shares in a company (whether or not there is a take-over offer or take-over announcement in progress) must notify the company and the Australian Stock Exchange within two business days. Changes to that entitlement in excess of one per cent of the company's voting shares also must be notified, as must the fact that the acquirer has ceased to be entitled to five per cent of the shares.

Acquirers of shares cannot be guaranteed that their identity will remain anonymous, even if their shareholding is registered in the name of a nominee and is less than five per cent of the company's share capital. The Corporations Law allows the Australian Securities Commission or a listed company (whether or not there is a take-over offer or take-over announcement in progress) to serve a notice on a shareholder requiring information as to the beneficial ownership of the shares. Subsequent notices may be issued to persons who are identified by the shareholder as beneficial owners. Through this process it is possible to discover who is the ultimate controller of a parcel of shares.

Notwithstanding the fact that an acquisition of shares may be made in accordance with the strict requirements of the Corporations Law, the Australian Securities Commission has power to refer certain conduct in relation to shares to a body called the Corporations and Securities Panel. The Panel is given the power to declare that a particular acquisition is an unacceptable acquisition or that particular conduct in relation to shares is unacceptable conduct. In making a decision, the Panel must take into account the desirability of ensuring that the acquisition of shares takes place in an efficient, competitive, and informed market. The Panel is concerned to see that:

- Shareholders and directors know the identity of the acquirer of a substantial interest;
- Shareholders and directors have a reasonable time to consider a proposed acquisition of a substantial interest;
- Shareholders and directors are supplied with enough information to assess the merits of the proposed acquisition; and
- Shareholders have reasonable and equal opportunities to participate in any benefits accruing to any shareholder in connection with the acquisition.

The Panel must be satisfied that it is in the public interest to make such a declaration. The Panel also can rule on unacceptable conduct of a target company board of directors. The activities of the Panel are designed to ensure that companies comply with the spirit of the law, not just the letter of the law.

The Corporations Law contains extensive provisions relating to liability for false and misleading statements and misleading and deceptive conduct. There are provisions of general liability in addition to provisions which specifically relate to take-overs. The provisions generally apply to all of the parties involved in the take-over process. People who contravene these provisions may be subject to criminal, as well as civil liability.

An offeror may not obtain a formal or informal undertaking from a shareholder that the shareholder will accept an offer if the shares held by that shareholder, together with the shares held by the offeror, exceed the 20 per cent threshold. Any such understanding by the shareholder will amount to an acquisition by the offeror which can only occur legally by way of a take-over offer, take-over announcement, or one of the other permitted exceptions.

In a similar vein, an offeror cannot acquire a major shareholder's shareholding if it would breach the 20 per cent threshold and then follow up that acquisition with a general offer for all of the shares in the target company, even if the later offer is made at the same price as that paid to the major shareholder. Again, the original acquisition can only be made by way of a take-over offer, take-over announcement, or one of the other permitted exceptions. This is a major distinction to the law applying in some foreign jurisdictions.

The creeping take-over[36] allows an acquirer who is entitled to 19 per cent or more of the target company's voting shares to increase that entitlement by three per cent of the total number of voting shares every six months. The person must have been entitled to at least 19 per cent for a continuous period of six months for this exception to apply. This method enables the shareholdings to be increased but has little commercial appeal in terms of obtaining control of the target company due to the long period required to establish a significant shareholding and because the market will become aware of the creeping acquisitions and the market price of the target company's shares will usually rise in expectation of a take-over.

Under section 623 of the Corporations Law, an acquirer may increase its shareholding in a target company beyond the 20 per cent threshold by purchasing shares or taking an allotment of shares if the target company has agreed to the purchase or allotment by ordinary resolution of its shareholders. The acquirer and the seller and their associates may not vote on such a resolution. Shareholders should be given a full and proper disclosure of all the relevant facts and surrounding circumstances (including an independent expert's report on whether the proposal is fair and reasonable to the non-involved shareholders) so as to be able to make an informed decision.

Section 625 of the Corporations Law provides that the section 615 prohibition does not apply to the acquisition of shares under a scheme of arrangement. Section 411 of the Corporations Law allows for a scheme of arrangement that could result in the cancellation of some of the members' shares to be approved by the shareholders of a company. However, this can be more difficult to achieve than a reduction in capital for the following reasons:

- The special resolution must be approved by at least 50 per cent of those present representing 75 per cent of the value of the shares held by persons voting at the meeting;[37] and
- The scheme of arrangement will not be approved by the court (which must be approached at the beginning and end of the process) unless it is satisfied that the scheme was not proposed for the purpose of enabling any person to avoid the operation of the take-over provisions of the Corporations Law.[38]

Section 619 of the Corporations Law excludes from the operation of the section 615 prohibition the acquisition of shares in a company that has 15 members or less. This exception does not exempt an acquisition if the acquisition also has the effect of increasing the entitlement of the acquiring person in another company beyond the level permitted by section 615. The exemption in section 619 also applies to a proprietary company having more than 15 members where all of the members consent in writing to the provisions of chapter 6 of the Corporations Law not applying.

The exemption as specified in section 633(c) of the Corporations Law is used very sparingly. The Australian Securities Commission's policy appears to be that it prefers to grant written approval under sections 728–730 of the Corporations Law with attaching conditions to such approval rather than using its power under section 633(c).

Antitrust Law

Trade Practices Act 1974. Australia's Trade Practices Act 1974 prohibits any corporation from acquiring shares or assets of another corporation where the acquisition would have the effect, or be likely to have the effect of substantially lessening competition in an

37 Corporations Law (Cth), s 411(4).

Australian market. There is a non-exhaustive list of 'merger factors' that may be taken into account to determine whether an acquisition would result in a substantial lessening of competition in a market, namely:

- Actual and potential level of import competition in the market;
- Size of barriers to entry;
- Level of concentration in the market;
- Likelihood that the acquisition would result in the acquirer being able to significantly and substantially increase prices and profit margins;
- Extent to which substitutes are available or are likely to be available in the market;
- Degree of countervailing power in the market;
- Dynamic characteristics of the market, including growth, innovation, and product differentiation;
- Likelihood that the acquisition would remove from the market a vigorous and effective competitor; and
- Nature and extent of vertical integration in the market.

As a preliminary guide, if the merger results in the four largest firms having a market share of 75 per cent or more and the merged firm having a market share over 15 per cent or if the four largest firms have less than 75 per cent, and the merger would result in the merged firm having 40 per cent or more, the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission will desire to examine the potential competition effects of the merger by way of market investigations before deciding whether or not the merger is likely to result in a substantial lessening of competition. If the Commission concludes that the market is not a substantial one or that the acquisition will not substantially lessen competition, it will not oppose the acquisition.

At present, there is no pre-notification requirement for mergers and acquisitions in Australia. However, an acquirer may apply to the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission for authorisation in relation to its acquisition where there are negative anti-trust implications. An application will generally be determined within 30 days. The Commission will only authorise the acquisition when it is satisfied that the acquisition has resulted or would result in a benefit to the public and that benefit outweighs or would outweigh the detriment constituted by any lessening of competition that has resulted or would result from the acquisition. The Commission is to regard the following as benefits to the public when it determines what amounts to a benefit to the public:

- A significant increase in the real value of exports;
- A significant substitution of domestic products for imported goods; and
- All other relevant matters that relate to the international competitiveness of any Australian industry.

Substantial Lessening of Competition. Section 50 of the Trade Practices Act prohibits the acquisition of shares (or assets) if the acquisition would have the effect or be likely to have the effect of substantially lessening competition in a substantial market for goods or services. The acquisition may be authorised if it results in such a benefit to the public that it ought to be allowed to proceed. Section 50(3) lists the factors to be taken into account in determining whether an acquisition is likely to substantially lessen competition. These are:

- Actual and potential level of import competition in the market;
- Height of barriers to entry in the market;
- Level of concentration in the market;
- Degree of countervailing power in the market;
- Likelihood that the acquisition would result in the acquirer being able to significantly and substantially increase prices or profit margins;
- Extent to which substitutes are available in the market or are likely to be available in the market;
- Dynamic characteristics of the market, including growth, innovation, and product differentiation;
- Likelihood that the merger would result in the removal from the market of a vigorous and effective competitor; and
- Nature and extent of vertical integration in the market.

Foreign Investment Approval

Foreign Acquisitions and Take-Overs Act 1975 (Cth). Foreign investment in Australia is generally subject to the approval of the Federal Treasurer pursuant to the Foreign Acquisitions and Take-Overs Act 1975 (Cth). The Act usually requires compulsory notification of proposed acquisitions of shares in Australian listed companies and gives the Treasurer the power to prohibit, impose conditions on, or order divestiture in relation to certain proposed or completed acquisitions. The Federal Treasurer is advised on these matters by the Foreign Investment Review Board.

The Act makes it an offence for a foreign person proposing to acquire a 15 per cent shareholding, or two or more foreign persons proposing to acquire a 40 per cent shareholding, in an Australian company which has assets valued at Aus $5 million or more, to proceed without the consent of the Treasurer. These thresholds include shares held by associates (very broadly defined) of the acquirer. However, a take-over offer (but not a take-over announcement) could proceed if it were made conditional on receiving the Treasurer's consent. The Treasurer's consent will be forthcoming unless the acquisition is deemed to be contrary to the national interest. Consent can usually be obtained within 30 days. Some off-shore acquisitions also could be caught by the Act if Australian assets are involved.

Major Requirements of the Act. Essentially, sections 4-9A of the Act define a foreign interest as:

- A natural person not ordinarily resident in Australia; or
- Any corporation, business, or trust in which there is a substantial foreign interest.

'A substantial foreign interest' in a corporation, business, or trust occurs where there is a single holding of 15 per cent or more by a single foreign interest or an aggregate holding of 40 per cent or more by multiple foreign interests. There also are provisions designed to catch holdings engineered through associates. The Act provides the Federal Treasurer with power to examine four categories of foreign investment proposals. These are:

- Shareholdings in Australian corporations — Section 26 requires a foreign interest to notify the Foreign Investment Review Board (FIRB) of any proposal to acquire a shareholding of 15 per cent or more of an Australian corporation. Section 13A provides an exemption if total assets of the corporation being acquired are Aus $5 million or less (Aus $3 million or less if more than 50 per cent of this value is represented by rural land).
- Take-overs of Australian companies other than by acquisitions of shares — These provisions impose the same restrictions on acquisitions of assets or interests in assets, agreements in relation to control of companies or assets, and arrangements for participating in the profits of a business.

Take-Overs of Offshore Companies. Approval is required for the acquisition of an offshore company if the company has an Australian subsidiary with more than Aus $20 million of assets or if the Australian assets constitute more than 50 per cent of its total assets.

Urban Land. Section 26A compels a foreign interest to notify the Foreign Investment Review Board of a proposal to acquire an interest in urban land. Significant exemptions to section 26A, such as for an Australian citizen not currently resident in the country, are granted in the regulations to the Act. There are wide-ranging anti-avoidance provisions in section 38A.

Foreign Investment Policy. The current federal government, with its push towards a less regulated marketplace, has pursued a different philosophy as to what benefits the national interest. This change of philosophy has substantially increased the chances of a foreign investor obtaining a Foreign Investment Review Board clearance in many circumstances. However, as will be seen below, the Act's machinery remains in place, and there are a number of industries that are restricted for foreign investors.

The Treasurer has announced that, in particular sectors such as manufacturing, oil and gas, insurance, stockbroking, tourism, rural properties, agriculture, forestry, fishing, resource processing, non-bank financial intermediaries, mining (excluding uranium), and services (excluding urban real estate, banking, civil aviation, and the media), the government will normally automatically approve proposals to acquire 15 per cent or more of a company which has assets of less than Aus $50 million and where the consideration payable is also less than Aus $50 million. Special policies apply to the sectors of banking, civil aviation, media, insurance, mining (some uranium projects), and urban real estate. Industry specific legislation also may need to be considered in certain of these sectors.

Recognition of Foreign Take-Over Regulations

The provisions of chapter 6 of the Corporations Law do not apply to acquisitions of shares in foreign companies incorporated outside of Australia. Where a foreign company is listed on the Australian Stock Exchange and that foreign company is the subject of a take-over, the general view in Australia (as held by the Australian Stock Exchange) is that the law of the place of incorporation or the rules of its home exchange (where the foreign company holds a primary listing) apply and regulate the take-over bid made for that foreign company.

It should be noted that the provisions of chapter 6 of the Corporations Law may apply to an acquisition of shares in a foreign company where the acquisition increases the acquirer's entitlement to voting shares in an Australian company beyond the limits set in section 615 of the Corporations Law. The take-over provisions set out in chapter 6 of the Corporations Law do apply to foreign companies dealing in shares of Australian companies. However, there are difficulties in enforcing any determinations or court orders against a foreign company.

Jurisdictional Conflicts

Genuine and False Conflicts

Although, prima facie, there are currently genuine conflicts relating to the regulation of securities around the world, the key feature that underlies the concept of globalisation of financial markets is the erosion and irrelevance of national boundaries and the emergence of services and markets that can be truly described as global. The main areas of change in the international financial markets have been in the international financial system, advances in and the fusion of information technology in telecommunications, the rise of global business strategies, new political and economic structures, new political imperatives such as economic liquidisation, privatisation, and deregulation, and the rise of the institutional investor. The key drivers of change in the international financial markets have been technology and micro-economics.

Indeed, financial markets are now completely integrated and linked via technology, on a viable basis. The main implication is that regulators no longer have sovereignty over the movements of capital across the national boundaries. As money is fungible and will gravitate to those centres where the most attractive environment is maintained, the case of multinationals may cause problems. As the nationality of such corporations may be very hard to ascertain, questions relating to regulatory sovereignty may tend to arise in the future. This problem is magnified by the trend towards mergers and alliances between corporations from different geographical centres.

It is for this reason that many commentators now believe that those countries with an open-market approach to regulation (as distinct from attempts to preserve national boundaries) are more likely to prosper in the global economy as capital increasingly ignores national boundaries.

Multilateral Approaches

Harmonisation

Government polices affect the operating environment of financial services in two principal areas, ie, tax and regulation. Various taxes limit Australia's international competitiveness. These include:

- Capital gains tax with no threshold, imposing marginal rates of taxation with losses quarantined;
- A dividend imputation system that does not apply to foreign companies that pose Australian tax and have Australian shareholders;
- Interest withholding tax and fringe benefits tax anomalies in respect of foreign operations;
- State taxes on bank deposits and withdrawals; and
- A level of state stamp duty on share transactions that remains one of the highest in the world.

An example of where inefficiencies have been recognised and corrected can be seen in the Queensland government's initiative in halving the rate of stamp duty on share transactions in mid 1995. Detailed studies demonstrate that this reduction in duty resulted in the net economic benefit for Australia of Aus $4.6 billion on a present-value basis. Furthermore, increased market activity post the stamp duty reduction will result in state governments budgeting to collect almost as much revenue in any event. In addition, in March 1997, the Financial System Inquiry reported a number of recommendations. The recommendations include that:

- A single regulator called the Australian Securities and Investments Commission should combine the existing market integrity, corporations, and consumer protection roles of the Australian Securities Commission, the Insurance and Superannuation Commission, and the Australian Payments Council;
- There be a generic regulation of financial products instead of the artificial distinction between securities and futures contained in the present Corporations Law, therefore encouraging the creation of innovative financial products, particularly those that are not easily defined as either 'securities' or 'futures';
- A Financial Sector Advisory Council be established to advise the Treasurer on regulation (including its cost effectiveness and relevance, financial sector developments, and the international competitiveness of Australia's financial sector);
- Capital gains tax be reviewed as it presently significantly depresses risk-taking investment and reduces the pool of capital available for investment in venture capital and growth orientation but non-dividend paying enterprises; and
- The dividend imputation system be changed so that it applies to Australian taxpayers investing in foreign companies that pay company tax in Australia.[39]

39 Their exclusion at present is not only discriminatory but discourages foreign companies with Australian operations from listing on the Australian Stock Exchange.

The Australian Stock Exchange is responding to globalisation in the following ways:

- Through its demutualisation;[40]
- Providing new services for which there is demand;
- Developing the Australian market as an international centre for trading resource stocks;
- Developing a new primary market on which small and medium sized enterprises can raise equity capital at a stage in the development before they are ready to become listed companies;[41]
- Providing a new matching facility after the close of normal trading at 4 p.m., which is designed to reduce the market-impact costs of trading large parcels;
- Examining a proprietary electronic matching market system which will provide price discoveries;
- Creating a new trading platform will be created for the equities market (SEATS 1997);
- Establishing an automated trading system to be created to replace floor trading in the derivatives markets;
- Creating an automated settlement system for all eligible companies (CHESS); and
- Providing for secondary listing of exempt foreign entities for whom many of the Australian Stock Exchange's ongoing Listing Rules do not usually apply.

Recognition

As an example of the harmonisation process, the Australian Stock Exchange has approved a number of foreign exchanges. Basically, they are those exchanges which are members of the International Association of Securities Exchanges. By approving these exchanges, the Australian Stock Exchange recognises that such exchanges are internationally recognised and impose and enforce high listing and quotation standards and market information and regulatory requirements on the listed entities of those exchanges. These include:

- Argentina, Bolsa De Comerico De Buenos Aires (member);
- Australia, Australian Stock Exchange Ltd (member);
- Austria, Vienna Stock Exchange (member);
- Belgium, Bourse De Bruxelles SC (member);
- Brazil, Bolsa De Valores Do Rio De Janeiro (member) and Bolsa De Valores Do São Paulo (associate member);

40 In 1998, after federal parliament passes enabling legislation, the Australian Stock Exchange will become a company limited by shares. The aim of demutualisation is to achieve a more flexible and responsive corporate structure to cope with the competitive pressures of globalisation and emerging competition within Australia.

Unilateral Approaches

In General

At present, the centrepiece of the Australian approach for the reform of securities regulation is the Corporate Law Economic Reform Program. The objectives of the program are to ensure that business regulation is consistent with promoting a strong and vibrant economy and provides a package which will assist business in adapting to global change. Apart from seeking to improve market freedom and flexibility, the central factor of the Corporations Law Economic Reform Programme agenda is the reform of Australian accounting standards in an effort to harmonise them with international standards. These, and the other matters already mentioned as included on the reform agenda of the Corporate Law and Economic Reform Program are aimed at facilitating freer international involvement in the securities market in Australia.

Another indication of Australia's intention to reform the securities law and to keep pace with global change can be seen in the March 1997 financial system inquiry, also discussed above. The central objective of the inquiry was to make recommendations for the improvement of the efficiency and flexibility of the Australian securities market. These recommendations can be seen as an indication of the desire of the Australian regulators to reform the industry.

Corporate Law Economic Reform Program

Liberalisation of world capital markets, in combination with technological developments and information in telecommunication industries, has fundamentally altered the nature and operation of business in the financial system. In response, the Corporate Law and Economic Reform Program was announced by the Treasury in March 1997. It involves a fundamental review of key areas of regulation which affect business and investment activity. The objective of the program is to ensure that business regulation is consistent with promoting a strong and vibrant economy and provides a package which will assist business in adapting to global change.

In releasing the third paper in a series of six dealing with directors' duties and corporate governance, the Treasurer stated that:

> . . . [i]n striking this balance, close attention has been paid to the international environment in which our companies operate. An international best practice regulatory framework for directors' duties and corporate governance is essential for the Australian economy, which relies on both domestic and foreign capital.

This comment emphasises Australia's push towards taking on and adopting international standards and regulation in this areas. The key principles underlined in the Corporations Law Economic Reform Program review are as follows:

- Market freedom — Regulations needed to help markets whereby enhancing market integrity and capital market efficiency. At the same time the framework needs to be sufficiently flexible so that it does not impede market evolution in competition.

- Investor protection — All investors should have reasonable access to information regarding the risks of a particular investment opportunity.
- Information requirements — Disclosure of relevant information enables rational investment decision-making and facilitates the efficient use of resources by companies. Disclosure requirements increase the confidence of individual investors in the fairness and integrity of financial markets and, by fostering confidence, encourage investment.
- Cost effectiveness — A flexible and transparent regulatory framework will be more conducive to innovation and risk-taking, which are fundamental elements of a thriving market economy, while providing necessary investor and consumer protection.
- Regulatory neutrality and flexibility — The framework should be flexible enough to permit market participants to respond to future changes in an innovative, timely and efficient manner.
- Business ethics and compliance — It is necessary to foster an environment that encourages high standards of business practice and ethics.

Reform Agenda

At present, there are six reform programs. These include reform of:

- Accounting standards, with the goal of ensuring that standards reflect contemporary conditions with emphasis placed on harmonising Australian standards with international standards;
- Fund raising, removing impediments to fund raising and improving capital market efficiency;
- Directors' duties and corporate governance, with emphasis on the protection of sound business judgments and the introduction of a 'business judgment' rule in assessing directors' duties;
- Take-overs, with a goal of providing greater certainty for bidders while providing adequate protection for shareholders;
- Electronic commerce, to modernise the law and facilitate the use of emerging technologies; and
- Futures and securities market, with specific emphasis on the emergence of derivatives in world capital markets.

Introduction

Special Legislation for Hypo Alpe-Adria-Bank International AG

In 2007, Carinthia sold the Hypo Alpe-Adria-Bank International AG (HAA) to BayernLB and, in December 2009, the Republic of Austria nationalized HAA again due to severe financial problems. The courts are currently deciding whether the circumstances of the purchase by BayernLB and the nationalization are valid.[1]

After a long discussion, the Austrian parliament — with the votes of the governing parties — passed four new acts on a reorganization of HAA on 8 July 2014 (the 'HAA Legislation'). The acts are intended to become effective in August 2014. In addition, the Financial Market Authority Act and the Financial Market Stability Act were amended in order to comply with the above-mentioned drafts. In general, the HAA Legislation, in particular the Act on Restructuring Measures, provides for a basis to ensure the winding down of HAA's assets in an organized, active, most efficient, and quick way, thereby protecting public funds (ie, shifting the burden of saving HAA from the taxpayer to certain creditors). In order to achieve this objective, subordinated obligations (with a guarantee by Carinthia) and liabilities towards shareholders will be terminated.

The HAA legislation has been criticized heavily by rating agencies, market participants, and banking associations. Just recently, the IMF criticized the envisaged actions according to the HAA Legislation. The Austrian government itself expects the HAA Legislation to be attacked by investors. The HAA legislation also has been criticized by legal scholars, identifying that it might raise issues in connection with Constitutional and European law.

Alternative Investment Fund

On 17 December 2013, the Commission of the European Union (EU) adopted a Delegated Regulation supplementing Directive 2011/61/EU with regard to regulatory technical standards determining types of alternative investment fund managers.

The Delegated Regulation determines whether an Alternative Investment Fund Manager (AIFM) is an AIFM of open-ended AIF(s) and/or closed-ended AIF(s). Under the Alternative Investment Fund Managers Directive,[2] AIFMs must follow specific rules, depending on whether or not they are AIFMs of open-ended and/or closed-AIFs. Therefore, it is important to foresee detailed rules determining whether an AIFM is managing open-ended and/or closed-ended AIF(s). Austria implemented Directive 2011/61/EU with the Alternative Investment Fund Act (Alternative Investmentfonds Manager-Gesetz, AIFMG).

European Law

As a consequence of the European financial crisis, several new Regulations and Directives have been enacted by the EU. They include:

- Alternative Investment Fund Managers Directive (see text, above);
- Market Infrastructure Regulation (EMIR),[3] the new European regulation on over-the-counter (OTC) derivatives. The EMIR establishes a counterparty, requires financial institutions to clear standardized derivative contracts with the counterparty, and report transactions to the counterparty;
- Capital Requirements Regulations (CRR),[4] establishing new standards for capital requirements of financial institutions (Basel III agreement), which was enacted on 1 January 2014;[5]
- Capital Requirements Directive (CRD),[6] providing a legal framework for supervising credit institutions, investment firms, and their parent companies in all EU member states;[7]
- Bank Recovery and Resolution (BRRD),[8] providing authorities with more comprehensive and effective arrangements (eg, a bail-in tool) to deal with 2 Directive 2011/61/EU.

3 Regulation (EU) 648/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 July 2012 on OTC derivatives, central counterparties, and trade repositories.

4 Regulation (EU) 575/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 June 2013 on prudential requirements for credit institutions and investment firms and amending Regulation (EU) 648/2012.

5 The CRR requires financial institutions to keep sufficient capital reserves and liquidity in order to make EU banks more stable and reinforce their ability to properly manage the risks related to their activities, and absorb any losses they may incur.

6 Directive 2013/36/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 June 2013 on access to the activity of credit institutions and the prudential supervision of credit institutions and investment firms, amending Directive 2002/87/EC and repealing Directives 2006/48/EC and 2006/49/EC.

7 The CRD concerns general provisions regarding, inter alia, the supervised entities in scope of the CRD and CRR, the tasks and general competences of competent authorities, and market entry for credit institutions.

failing banks at national level, as well as cooperation arrangements to tackle cross-border banking failures;

- European Venture Capital Funds,[9] setting out a new 'European Venture Capital Fund' label (ie, category) and including new measures to allow venture capitalists to market their funds across the EU and grow while using a single set of rules;[10] and
- European Social Entrepreneurship Funds,[11] setting out a new 'European Social Entrepreneurship Fund' label, so that investors can easily identify funds that focus on investing in European social businesses.[12]

As necessary, the Austrian government implemented (or will implement) new legislation by enacting new acts or amending existing acts to incorporate the new EU policies.

Legal Sources

Regulations for securities and investment businesses can be found in a large number of federal laws and several ordinances enacted by the Financial Market Authority (FMA). The most important sources of federal law containing securities regulations referenced in this chapter are:

Authorities and Procedure

Stock Exchange

The Austrian Stock Exchange[35] (Börseunternehmen, Wiener Börse, leads and manages the regulated market 'Stock Exchange') is empowered to decide on the admission of market participants and securities. These competences are granted by public law. Additionally, the Stock Exchange carries out the market supervision, except for market manipulation and insider trading, which is conducted by the FMA.

The Stock Exchange supervises the trade electronically and is able to gather all necessary information from the market participants.[36] All members of the exchange have wide-ranging disclosure duties to the Stock Exchange. The Stock Exchange Commissioners and their Deputies must be appointed by the Minister of Finance; such appointees must report to the competent supervisory authority. Additionally, the Commissioners and their Deputies must be given due notice of and access to the following meetings:

- General meetings;

29 Securities Admission Directive, European Community Directives 79/279/EEC and 2001/34/EC.

31 Public Offer Prospectus Directive, European Community Directives 89/298/EEC and 2003/71/EC, amended by Directives 2008/11/EC and 2010/73/EU.

32 Insider Dealing Directive, European Community Directives 89/592/EEC and 2003/6/EC (amended by Directive 2010/78/EU; will be repealed by Directive 2014/57/EU).

33 Market in Financial Instruments Directive, European Community Directive 2004/39/EC (amended by Directive 2008/10/EC); will be repealed by Directive 2014/65/EU.

34 Directive 2011/61/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 8 June 2011 on Alternative Investment Fund Managers and amending Directives 2003/41/EC and 2009/65/EC and Regulations (EC) 1060/2009 and (EU) 1095/2010.

35 The term ‘stock exchange operating company’ also is used in official translations.

36 Stock Exchange Act, art 25 (Surveillance of Trading), paras 1 and 2.

- Supervisory board meetings;
- Supervisory board's decision-making;
- Managing initial admission meetings;
- Member suspension or expulsion meetings; and
- Negotiable instrument admission or rescinding of admission meeting.[37]

The Commissioners and their Deputies are entitled to speak at any time upon their request. In the event the Exchange Commissioners believe a resolution and/or decision conflicts with federal laws, Commissioners must raise an objection immediately.

Financial Market Authority

On 1 April 2002, the FMA was established through the Financial Market Supervision Act. All supervisory tasks and resources were transferred from the Federal Ministry of Finance to the new supervisory authority. The FMA is now the single, statutory supervisory body directly responsible for banking, insurance and pension funds, securities, and stock exchange supervision.

The FMA is vested with various powers, such as administrative penal power, power to enforce its supervisory rulings, and power to issue ordinances.[38] However, conflicting European Supervisory Authority decisions regarding financial institutions supersede prior decisions issued by the FMA.[39]

Within the FMA, an Executive Board and a Supervisory Board are established.[40] The Executive Board manages all of the FMA's operations and conducts the FMA's business. The Supervisory Board oversees the management and the conduct of business of the FMA.[41]

Takeover Commission

The Takeover Commission[42] decides on the lawfulness of voluntary takeover bids, as well as on the duty to make mandatory bids. Relevant information about the acquisition of controlling holdings must be transmitted to the Takeover Commission.[43]

Procedures

The Stock Exchange Act, the Securities Supervision Act 2007, and the Takeover Act state specific procedural rules for the competent authorities. Nevertheless, all the main procedures concerning securities are administrative procedures according to the General Administrative Procedures Act 1991.

Decisions issued by the Stock Exchange and the FMA can be appealed to the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht).[44] Decisions issued by the Takeover Commission can be appealed to the Supreme Court (Oberster Gerichtshof) and, if imposing penalties, to the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht).[45]

Capital Market

Issuer

Issuer Requirements

The Stock Corporations Act does not provide on-point guidance on the corporate action required for the issuance of securities. The management board may submit the listing admission application according to article 71 of the Stock Corporations Act. The supervisory board must at least be informed and, in most cases, its approval is necessary. An increase of share capital requires the consent of the shareholders at the general meeting and must be registered in the Commercial Register.

Stockholders have preemptive rights, meaning that when new shares are issued, each stockholder has the right to purchase the amount of shares necessary to maintain his ownership by percentage. All joint-stock companies with officially quoted shares must guarantee equal treatment of all their shareholders and inform them of their rights, the shareholders' meetings, and the dividend payments by publishing announcements or circulars. Registration of public offerings is not required by Austrian law. Issuers who intend to offer securities to the public must prepare a prospectus. The prospectus must be examined by a credit institution or any other entity specified in article 8 of the Capital Market Act. The examination must comply with the requirements stipulated in the Capital Market Act. The issuer and the examining entity are responsible for the content of the prospectus. The prospectus must be published at least one banking day prior to the offer.

Admission to Listing of Official Market. Before securities and issuing programs may be admitted to listing on the Official Market, the issuer must satisfy certain conditions. The issuer's establishment and its bylaws or articles of association must comply with the law of the country in which the issuer's registered office exists. [46]

A stock company with shares admitted for the first time must have existed for a period of at least three years and must have published annual accounts in accordance with applicable regulations for the three complete fiscal years preceding the application. If the joint-stock company is the universal successor to another company and the accounting is continuous, the period of existence of the previous company shall be credited to the successor. The requirement of the three-year period of existence may not apply if it is in the interests of the issuer and of the public, and documents are provided containing information equivalent to the annual accounts of the past three years, regarding the evaluation of the economic and legal status of the issuer. Additionally, the stock company must have published financial reports for at least one full fiscal year.[47] Companies participating in the capital market must publish their consolidated accounts in accordance with the accounting regulations IAS/IFRS.

Finally, the issuer must have abided by the applicable federal acts and laws governing the issuance of securities, along with decrees and official notices resulting from such legislation. This condition applies mutatis mutandis to foreign regulations of the country in which the security has been issued. If the securities need to be registered in a public register, this registration must have been completed.[48]

National Treatment

In general, foreign issuers' company shares may be admitted to listing on the Stock Exchange under national conditions. However, if shares of a company with its registered office outside of the European Union are unlisted in the company's home country and in the country where they are primarily traded, admission will only be granted if the company gives a plausible explanation which proves that the shares are not listed on the exchange in these countries for reasons other than investor protection.[49]

Investment Funds

Investment Funds Act 2011. The Investment Funds Act 2011 (InvFG) provides for the implementation of a uniform Key Investor-Information Document (Kundeninformationsdokument, KID)[50] to manage the extensive spectrum of

46 Stock Exchange Act, art 66a, para 1, no 1.
47 Stock Exchange Act, art 66a, para 1, no 3.
48 Stock Exchange Act, art 66a, para 1, no 4.
49 Stock Exchange Act, art 71.

tendered Undertakings for Collective Investment in Transferable Securities (OGAW or UCITS; UCITS-shares).[51]

Thus, in addition to supplying investors with a high degree of protection, the InvFG also enables consistent monitoring of management companies of UCITS-shares by extending compliance rules and creating uniform organizational requirements. A management company with its office in another member state is permitted to administer a UCITS in order to generate and increase synergies. Efficiencies are increased within the Inner-European Market by harmonizing deadlines to render decisions, and requires the FMA to approve cross-border and domestic UCITS-mergers.[52] Criteria for approval include the appropriate information, such as plans regarding unit-holders, compliance with regulations, and the updated prospectus.[53]

Master-Feeder Structures. In response to an EU Regulation and the developments on financial markets and the needs of the Funds industry, the InvFG encompasses Master Feeder-Structures.[54] A Feeder-UCITS is permitted to invest up to 85 per cent into a Master-UCITS without requiring the latter to raise funds from the public if at least two Feeder-UCITS are invested in the Master-UCITS.[55]

Corresponding References and Regulations. The terms provided in the InvFG are not completely defined; instead, it refers the reader to the Capital Market Act, the Banking Act, and various EU Directives and Regulations.[56] Hence, management companies or capital investment companies with their registered office in Austria are considered credit institutions that can conduct investment business pursuant to UCITS Directive 2009/65/EC and the Banking Act.[57]

Despite the frequent references to various acts and regulations, ie, the Banking Act, the InvFG is lex specialis regarding UCITS. Thus, in order to prevent confusion the InvFG explicitly states specific applicable provisions of the acts and regulations, such as references of the Banking Act in article 10.[58]

The Capital Market Act governs the prospectus requirements in conjunction with article 131 of the InvFG, which specifically regulates the UCITS prospectus.[59] For example, there are specific rules for illustrating categories of assets in which the UCITS is allowed to invest and other rules that require the UCITS to state whether it is allowed to invest in derivatives.

Article 142 of the InvFG details the requirements for an UCITS admitted in another member state of the EU. Such an UCITS distributing its shares in Austria is required to provide Austrian investors with all information, documents, and changes in the same manner as it is required in its origin member state:

- The client information document (Kundeninformationsdokument) of article 134 of the InvFG, and its changes, must be translated into the German language; and
- Irrespective of chapter IX of Directive 2009/65/EG, all information, documents, and changes must be provided for investors in accordance with articles 128, 132, 133, 136, and 138 of the InvFG.

Other information or documents must be in German, English, or another language pursuant to article 7, paragraph 1, of the Capital Market Act.[60] Translations under the second and third items, above, must be made under sole liability of the UCITS and must faithfully recite the content of the original information. The rate of publications of the issue, retail, or repurchase price of the UCITS-shares must be made pursuant to the provision of the origin member state of the UCITS.

Liability. The offeror of such a foreign UCITS is liable for complying with article 142 of the InvFG and can be penalized with an administrative penalty of up to €30,000.[61] In addition, the offeror can be sued for certain actions, such as suppressing unfavorable information or propagating fallacious facts on essential circumstances within a prospectus or a KID of a domestic or foreign investment fund.[62]

AIF. Concerning alternative investment funds (AIF),[63] the prospectus and its amendments must be approved by the representative of the foreign investment company. Thus, the representative is the controlling organ of the prospectus and held liable if it neglects to control with the adequate care of a proper and faithful general manager. Suits against a foreign investment company must be filed at the representative's local competent court of jurisdiction.

63 AIF are non-UCITS with approval for distribution in Austria.

Prospectus

Prospectus Requirements

In General. When securities are initially offered to the public or when the issuer first applies for admission to the Stock Exchange, a prospectus must be published at least one banking day prior to the offer or an announcement of the listing.[64] All prospectuses must be approved by the FMA prior to publication.[65]

Languages. For securities that are solely offered to the public in Austria or that seek admission only to the Austrian regulated market, the prospectus must be written and published in German, English, or another FMA-accepted language.[66]

However, a prospectus that has been reported to the FMA in compliance with article 18 of EU Directive 2003/71/EC is not required to be published in an FMA accepted language, and may be published in another language which is commonly used in international financial markets. Nevertheless, the FMA may require a summary of such prospectus to be translated and published in German.[67]

Content. The prospectus must contain all information that is necessary to enable investors to make sound judgments on the relevant securities, assets and liabilities, financial standing, costs and benefits, anticipated prospects of the issuer and every guarantor, and any rights that are derived therefrom. This information must be presented in a manner that is easy to dissect and understand.[68]

Furthermore, it must contain information regarding the issuer and the relevant securities, along with a summary. The summary must be published in the original language used in the prospectus, in the form of a brief statement and in simple terms that convey material information and potential risks affiliated with the issuer, any guarantor, and the securities. The summary must be organized to facilitate market research by the investors, with the key information clearly stated and formatted to allow for efficient comparison. The summary must include the following warnings:

- The summary serves merely as an introduction to the prospectus;
- The investors should rely on their own analysis of the complete listing prospectus when reaching an investment decision;

64 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 2, para 1 (Public Offerings Subject to the Obligation to Publish a Prospectus); Stock Exchange Act, art 74.
65 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 10, para 1 (Publication of the Prospectus).
66 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 7b.
67 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 7b, para 3.
68 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 7, para 1.

- Pursuant to EEA member state national legislation, the investor must bear and pay any translation costs of a disputed prospectus prior to the start of legal proceedings, where an investor files a claim arising from information contained in a listing prospectus with a court; and
- Those who provided the requested summary and its translation are only liable to the aggrieved party if the summary is misleading, false, or inconsistent when read conjointly with the complete listing prospectus.[69]

If the securities' final issuing price and volume have not been determined, the prospectus must contain either the criteria and/or conditions used to determine the price and volume and the market price respectively, or permission to withdraw the relevant purchase or subscription of the securities within no less than two banking days after the final issuing price and volume are filed with the FMA.[70]

Issuers with Registered Seat in Non-European Economic Area State. The FMA may permit a prospectus offered by a non-EEA member state provided that the prospectus has been completed in compliance with the third country's federal law, and the international standards established by the international securities commission organizations, including the International Organization of Securities Commission (IOSCO) standards for disclosure, and the key investment information duties are equivalent to the requirements provided by the Capital Market Act.[71]

Cooperation in European Economic Area. The issuers must refer to the information required by the current amended rules of Company Law Directives 2003/71/EC and 2004/109/EC and Regulations EU 1606/2002 and 809/2004 on the application of international accounting standards.

In the event of a third-country issuer, the home FMA must provide the host EEA member state and the European Securities and Markets Authority (ESMA) with a certificate of approval of the prospectus that confirms that the prospectus was in compliance with Directive 2003/71/EC.

The notification must be published either within three banking days of the approval of the prospectus if the issuer requested approval after the submission of such prospectus, or within one banking day of approval if the issuer submitted a request with the prospectus.

The FMA may notify the competent EEA state's listing authority and the ESMA about any violation of the relevant provisions by an issuer with its registered seat in this EEA member state or by its financial intermediaries. If the violation continues despite the measures exercised by the competent authority of the home country, the FMA is entitled to take all necessary measures to protect the investors' interests after informing the competent authority and the ESMA. The FMA is required to report such proceedings as soon as possible to the European Commission and the ESMA.[72]

69 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 7, para 2.
71 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 7c.

Exemptions from Obligation to Publish Prospectus. If the application for admission to listing on the exchange is made for certain securities as defined in article 75 of the Stock Exchange Act, ie, shares issued in substitution for others already listed on the same exchange without raising the company's capital, a prospectus is not required.[73] Additionally, article 3 of the InvFG stipulates additional exemptions from the obligation to publish a prospectus.

Omission of information. The FMA may issue an official notice to authorize the omission of certain information in the prospectus, which must be included pursuant to the Capital Market Act or the current version of EU Regulation 809/2004 provided that:

- The disclosure of such information would be adverse to the public interest;
- The disclosure of such information would be seriously detrimental to the issuer, so long as the public would not likely be misled regarding essential facts and circumstances necessary for reaching an educated judgment of the issuer, the offeror, or the guarantor and the rights related to the securities mentioned in the prospectus; or
- The information is irrelevant merely for the purpose of a special offer or admission to trade on a regulated market and does not influence one's judgment on the financial standing and future prospects of the issuer, the offeror, or the guarantor.[74]

Examination of Prospectus. To ensure accuracy and integrity, the required prospectus for public offerings must be scrutinized by one of the credit institutions or associations specified in article 8 of the Capital Market Act. The FMA is authorized to utilize services of such credit institutions or associations, when evaluating a prospectus for approval. The FMA must approve the prospectus provided that it is complete, intelligible, explicit, and in compliance with the requirements set forth in the Capital Market Act.

The FMA is entitled to delegate the approval of the prospectus to the competent authority of another EEA member state, provided that the ESMA is given notice in advance and such competent authority accepts such delegation.[75] Following admission to the listing on the exchange, the FMA is entitled to:

72 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 8c.
73 Stock Exchange Act, art 75, para 1, no 2.
74 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 7, para 6.

- Require full disclosure, by the issuer, of all relevant information which may influence the valuation of the securities, so that investors are protected;
- Suspend or request the relevant regulated market to suspend trading of the securities, if the FMA believes the issuer's status may cause trading to result in injuries to investors' interests;
- Certify that the issuer complies with the conditions pursuant to articles 102 and 103 of Directive 2001/34/EC and that the investors in every EEA member state, where the securities are offered, receive identical information and equal treatment by the issuer; and
- Perform on-site inspections to confirm compliance with the relevant capital market act provisions and the relevant Directive 2003/71/EC implementation measures.[76]

Publication of Prospectus. The prospectus is considered available to the public when:

- Published in the Amtsblatt zur Wiener Zeitung (Official Bulletin of the Republic of Austria) or in at least one newspaper which is circulated nationwide;
- Published in printed form made available to the public without charge, at the competent authorities of the relevant market, at the registered office of the issuer, or at the financial intermediaries, including the paying agents;
- Published electronically on the issuer's website and, if applicable, on the website of the financial intermediaries, including the paying agents;
- Published electronically on the website of the regulated market for which an application for the admission to listing is filed; or
- Published electronically on the FMA's website or on the website of an organization entrusted with this task, if the FMA opted to offer such service for an appropriate fee.[77]

In any case, the issuer must publish a public notice, provided that Austria is the home member state, in the Official Bulletin of the Republic of Austria or in at least one newspaper circulated nationwide. The notice must indicate how the prospectus was published for public access and where it may be obtained.[78] Any new material fact, crucial error, or inaccuracy relative to the information contained in the prospectus, which has the potential to influence the evaluation of the securities, and which emerges between the period of approval of the prospectus and the time either before the final closing of public offering or after trading on the regulated market has commenced, must be disclosed in an addendum published by the applicant. The rules concerning publication of the prospectus also govern the publication of an addendum; additionally, the latter must be forwarded to the FMA for examination and approval at the same time it is published.

Provided the supplement satisfies the necessary conditions, the FMA must approve it within seven banking days after the date it was received. The FMA must send a duplicate of the approval to the Notification Office.[79] If a change must be made to the addendum during the supplementary approval process, such change must be published, along with the already published rectification notice. If necessary, all summaries or translations must be modified to incorporate the information included in the addendum.[80] Investors are entitled to revoke their purchase order or subscriptions to securities within two business days after the supplement is published, if it is made prior to any newly emerged facts, and before the publication of the relevant addendum.[81]

Advertising. Advertisements of any kind mentioning a public offer of securities or the admission to listing on the exchange must be in compliance with the following provisions set forth in article 4 of the Capital Market Act:

- All advertisements must disclose that a prospectus, including any modified or appended information, has been published or will be published and must indicate where the prospectus is made publicly available.
- All advertisements must be freely advertised. The information communicated through advertisements must be accurate and may not be misleading. Additionally, such information must be consistent with the information provided by the prospectus or any supplementary information if already published, or with the required content for a prospectus, if is published after the advertisement.
- All information relative to the public offerings or the admission to listing to the exchange must be consistent with the information provided in the prospectus or any supplements, regardless of whether it is conveyed in writing or orally for purposes other than advertising.

If no prospectus is required, key information presented by an offeror to qualified investors or specific categories of investors must be disclosed to all relevant qualified investors or specific categories of investors. This condition is not applicable when the issuer or applicant is required to publish a prospectus. The FMA is authorized to monitor and enforce compliance with the above-mentioned advertising standards, especially when there are legitimate suspicions that these advertising standards are being violated.[82]

In addition, article 40 of the Securities Supervision Act sets forth provisions regarding the necessary information provided by a legal entity to actual and potential clients, regardless of whether the clients are classified as private, retail, or professional clients.

These provisions apply to all information concerning the relevant financial instruments or investment services, pertaining to an offer of investment services for commercial or non-commercial purposes. Such provisions also apply to a marketing announcement if its focus is on sales promotion, which can be derived from form and content, ie, business portfolios, product information, advertising information on websites, printed ads, customer magazine, newsletters, and the like. Marketing announcements must be:

- Clearly identifiable as such;
- Explicit;
- Accurate;
- Not misleading; and
- Parallel with other information of the announcing legal entity.

If the disseminated information or marketing tool may potentially reach private clients, such communication must include reference to the concomitant risk and the proportionality of advantages and risks must be obvious.[83]

Liability for Contents of Prospectus. Investors are entitled to claim damages arising out of their reliance on the accuracy and integrity of the relevant facts necessary for evaluating securities or investments and that are provided in the prospectus, including mandatory addendums, supplements, and amendments. The following scenarios may cause liability when:

- The issuers provide false or incomplete information for which they are responsible themselves, or their agents whose services were utilized to compose the prospectus are responsible. This also applies to foreign issuers of investments or securities that are required to publish a prospectus within Austria.
- The prospectus auditors provide false or insufficient audits for which they are responsible for themselves, or their agents whose services were utilized to conduct the audit of the prospectus are responsible.

83 Wertpapieraufsichtsgesetz, arts 40 et seq.

- The prospectus auditors approve investment prospectuses (Veranlagungen) which include any false or inadequate scrutiny because of gross negligence attributed to either the auditors or their agents whose services were utilized to perform the audit.
- The Wiener Börse AG approves prospectuses of securities admitted to listing on the Stock Exchange whose information fails to satisfy article 8, paragraph 2c, of the Capital Market Act, resulting in gross negligence attributed to either the entity or its agents whose services were utilized to draft the statements pursuant to article 8.
- Persons who, regardless of whether in their own name or on behalf of third parties, have accepted the investor's contract offer, and the contract broker, if the person acting as a mediator is professionally engaged in trading or mediating securities or investment dealings and these persons or their agents knew or were ignorant due to gross negligence of the inaccuracies or deficiency of the information or audit.
- The auditor of the annual accounts provided and confirmed an audit opinion for such accounts for the purpose of publication in the prospectus, while knowing of such inaccuracies and deficiency of the annual accounts.

Liability for the damages is not severable. Thus, liability is not reduced if more than one of the mentioned parties is found liable. Each party is liable for the full amount in damages. Such liability towards investors may not be waived, proscribed, or limited in advance to the detriment of the investors. Claims under the Capital Market Act must be filed with the court within 10 years after the end of the offering which requires publication of a prospectus; failure to file within the allocated time will result in the barring of the claim.[84]

The claim for damages will not be compensated if such damages derive merely from the fact that securities or investments were not obtained due to inaccurate or insufficient information published in the prospectus. In the absence of intentional acting on behalf of the wrongdoers, each individual investor is only entitled to damages totaling the purchase amount paid, including fees, and interest since the date of purchase. If such acquisition was not paid for, the damages are limited to the last amount paid, including fees, and interest since the date of receipt. These provisions are not applicable to claims for damages resulting from other legal violations or breaches of contract.

Penal Consequences. Violations of the Capital Market Act's prospectus provisions may result in penal consequences according to article 15. A person who, in connection with a public offering of securities or investments that are subject to the obligation to publish a prospectus pursuant to the Capital Market

Act, offers securities or investments for which no approved prospectus, modifications, or supplements to the information audited pursuant to article 6 have been published in a timely manner; gives incorrect commendatory information regarding material circumstances in the meaning of article 7 or conceals adverse facts in a published prospectus, in the changed or supplementary information pursuant to article 6 with a view to influencing the decision on the acquisition; in violation of the provisions of article 14, does not publish a statement of accounts, or financial statements published pursuant to article 14 gives incorrect commendatory information regarding material circumstances in the meaning of article 7 or conceal adverse facts, will be punished by law to a prison sentence of not more than two years or to a fine of not more than 360 times the daily fine rate as set by the court unless the violation is more severely punishable by other laws.

If a person commits either of the first two violations above, he may avoid the penalties if he voluntarily prevents the receipt of securities or investments prior to the submission of payment. The offender shall also not be punished if the payment is not made without any effort on his part, but the offender, though not knowing of this, has voluntarily and seriously made efforts to prevent the acquisition. The party liable for compensation may ward off such penalties by compensating the aggrieved party for the purchase price of the securities or investments, including additional fees and expenses.

Consumer Transactions. If an issuer offers securities or investments and fails to publish a mandatory prospectus or an addendum, respectively, the investors who are classified as consumers, as defined in the Consumer Protection Act, are entitled to revoke their bid or void the contract.[85]

This right to rescind the contract must be in writing within one week after the publication of the prospectus or the addendum. Any agreements contrary to the provisions of article 5 of the Capital Market Act to the detriment of the consumer are invalid.[86]

Takeover Law

Public Takeover Bids

In General. The Takeover Act sets out the rules, procedure, and supervision requirements of takeover bids according to the following principles:

- Equal treatment of all shareholders of the target company;
- Protection of shareholders in case of taking control of a company;
- Full information of the shareholders;

85 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 15.
86 Kapitalmarktgesetz, art 15, para 5.

- Protection of the interests of all shareholders, employees, and creditors of the target company and of public interests;
- Prevention of the creation of false markets by simulated influence on the stock price and by corruption of the markets' operation; and
- Fast takeover transactions.[87]

The Takeover Act established the Takeover Commission, an authority with the competence to supervise the application of the takeover rules, to draw up official statements, and to initiate proceedings on its own behalf.[88]

Territorial Application. The requirements stated by the Takeover Act apply to any takeover bid where the target company has its registered office in Austria and its shares are listed on a regulated market of the Stock Exchange. Part 4 of the Takeover Act provides requirements for foreign bidders.

The following rules of the Takeover Act also apply to public offers for the purchase of voting shares issued by a stock corporation registered in Austria, if the shares are not listed on a market of the Stock Exchange but on a regulated market of another member state of the EU or the EEA and the bid would be subject to the Takeover Act if the shares were listed on a regulated market[89] in Austria:

- General aspects;
- Procedure of the takeover commission,
- Sanctions that may be imposed;
- Information on the employees of the target company;
- Prohibition of prevention (V*erhinderungsverbot*);[90]
- Impartiality rule (O*bjektivitätsgebot*);
- Duty to make an offer and the exemption;
- Duty to notify a controlling interest;
- Infringement of the secured blocking minority (gesicherte s*perrminorität*);
- Declaratory proceedings (f*eststellungsverfahren*);
- Amendment of statutes; and
- Lifting of restrictions (Durchbrechung von Beschränkungen).[91]

Voluntary Bids. To avoid insider trading and the creation of false markets, the offeror has the duty to keep his intention to make a bid confidential. When the offeror is considering making or intending to make a bid or to act in such a way that it will be under an obligation to make a bid, it shall immediately disclose the matter and inform the administrative organs of the offeree company if there is a substantial movement in the price of the equities or rumors and speculations concerning the bid arise and there are reasonable grounds for concluding that these originate in the preparation of the bid, the plans of the offeror to make such a bid, or in the purchase of shares by the offeror.[92]

The offeror may inform the administrative bodies of the offeree company of its plans or its intention to make a bid before these are disclosed and may enter into negotiations with them.[93] During the negotiations, the offeree company and its shareholders also must ensure confidentiality, as well as immediate disclosure in the case of substantial price movements of the shares and takeover rumors.[94] The offeror must draw up the offer documents with the following information:

- The terms of the bid;
- Particulars of the offeror including, if the offeror is a company, its type, name, and registered office; in addition, particulars of direct or indirect holdings in the offeror company as defined in articles 91 et seq. of the Stock Exchange Act, and its affiliation to a group of companies;
- The equities which are the object of the bid;
- The consideration offered for each security and the method of valuation used for determining said consideration and, in the cases mentioned in article 26 of the Takeover Act, the base of the calculation; in addition, details on the conduct of the bid and, in particular, on the agents authorized to receive acceptances and pay out the consideration;
- Where applicable, the maximum and minimum percentages or quantities of equities which the offeror undertakes to acquire and a description of the rules of allocation as specified in article 20 of the Takeover Act;
- The offeror's shares in the offeree company and those already held by the parties acting in concert or the shares they are entitled to or obligated to acquire in the future;
- All conditions and rights of withdrawal to which the bid is subject;
- The offeror's intentions regarding the future business of the offeree company, and in so far as it is affected by the bid, the offeror company and with regard to the safeguarding of the jobs of their employees and management, including any material change to the conditions of employment, in particular, the offeror's strategic plans for the two companies and the likely repercussions on employment and the locations of the companies' place of business;

93 Takeover Act, art 6, para 1.
94 Takeover Act, art 6, para 2.

- The period for acceptance of the bid and for the delivery of the consideration;
- Where consideration is offered in the form of equities, the particulars thereof as specified in article 7 of the Capital Market Act and articles 74 et seq. of the Stock Exchange Act;
- The conditions under which the offeror is to finance its bid;
- Information on any parties acting in concert with the offeror, or if known to the offeror, with the offeree company and, in the case of companies, their types, names, and registered offices and relationships with the offeror and, where possible, with the offeree company; information on the legal entities controlled by the offeror (article 1, fig 6, second sentence, of the Takeover Act) may be omitted if the controlling entity is not of significance for the decision of the recipients of the bid;
- Information on the compensation offered for rights which might be removed as a result of the breakthrough rule[95] as well as details on the form of payment of the compensation and the method according to which it is determined; and
- Information on the national law that will govern contracts concluded between the offeror and the holders of the offeree company's securities as a result of the bid and the competent courts.[96]

A bid may be made subject to conditions or rights of withdrawal if these are objectively justified, in particular, if they result from legal obligations of the offeror, or if the application of the condition or the exercise of the right of withdrawal does not depend entirely on the offeror's discretion. [97]

The offer documents must be examined by an Austrian credit institution, a certified auditor, or by the domestic branch office of a credit or financial institution with its seat in another EEA member state and authorized to provide such services in its member state of origin. The examining person or entity (expert) must certify that the documents are complete and in compliance with the law and that the bidder has the means to finance the offer. The offeror may notify the offer documents and the expert's report to the Takeover Commission and make all the information public between 12 and 15 trading days after the Takeover Commission receives the offer.[98]

Foreign offerors must nominate an Austrian agent authorized to accept the necessary documents. The agent can be a person or legal entity permitted to examine takeover documents, a lawyer, or a public notary. Before publication,

96 Takeover Act, art 7.
97 Takeover Act, art 8.
98 Takeover Act, art 9.

the offer documents and the expert's report must be transmitted to the managing board and the chairman and vice chairman of the offeree company. The Takeover Commission may give an official statement on the documents or prohibit the public offer if it is unlawful.[99]

The offer and the expert finding must be published either in a newspaper distributed in Austria or in a brochure provided to the public for free at the seat of the company no earlier than the twelfth and not later than the fifteenth trading day after receipt by the Takeover Commission, unless the Takeover Commission has prohibited the publication of the bid. If the offer has not been published in its entirety in the Official Gazette, information on where to obtain the documents or where the offer has been published must be circulated in the Austrian market. Should the offeror or the offeree company have a website, the documents shall also be placed on the website without delay and in a manner that makes them easy to find.[100]

The management and supervisory board of the target company must guarantee the shareholders opportunity to make a free and informed decision on the offer. They are prohibited from taking measures to frustrate the bid, unless the general meeting has decided to do so after gaining knowledge about the bid. The management board of the offeree company must prepare a response to the offer containing a statement on whether the offer serves the interests of the shareholders, the employees, and the creditors of the target company.[101] An expert appointed with the consent of the supervisory board of the target company must examine the bid, the response, and any response of the supervisory board and must provide a report.[102]

The management board and the supervisory board of the offeree company shall publish a response stating reasons on the bid immediately after the publication of the offer documents. The response shall contain, in particular, an assessment of whether the consideration offered and the other terms of the bid take adequate account of the interests of all shareholders and other holders of equities, and what the probable effects of the bid would be on the offeree company based on the strategic planning of the offeror regarding the offeree company, especially with respect to employees (jobs, working conditions, and the fate of the locations), on creditors, and the public interest. Should the management board or supervisory board be unable to give a final recommendation, they must in any case outline the arguments for accepting or rejecting the bid, highlighting the most important features.[103]

During the bid period, the offeror may improve the consideration offered or otherwise change the bid to the benefit of holders of equities. An improvement is not permitted if the offeror has declared that it would by no means make an improvement; this may not apply if a competing bid exists or if the Takeover Commission has authorized an improvement on the bid.[104] From the date of disclosure of the intention to make a bid or of a notification, the offeror and any parties acting in concert shall refrain from making any declarations designed to achieve the acquisition of equities of the offeree company under more favorable conditions than those set out in the bid unless the offeror improves the bid or the Takeover Commission grants an exemption for significant reasons; in all cases, such declarations must be disclosed immediately.[105] Anyone having a specific interest in the outcome of the bid may notify the Takeover Commission of any acquisitions or sales of the securities of the target company.

When a competing bid is published, the holders of shares shall be entitled to withdraw from any previous declarations of acceptance of the original bid until at the latest four exchange trading days before the original acceptance period expires.[106] If several bids have been made and one of them has been improved on, the shareholders have the right to withdraw from previous declarations of acceptance for the other bids.[107]

The bidding period must last at least two weeks and may not end earlier than 10 weeks after the publication of the offer documents. The Takeover Commission may define a shorter bidding period, but only with the offeror's permission can the period be shorter than six weeks.[108] The offeror may extend the bidding period unless he pledged not to do so. In the case of competing offers, the bidding period must last at least two weeks and may not end before the ending of the primary offer's bidding period.[109] At the end of this period, the offeror must make the results of the bid public.[110]

If, in a partial bid involving the acquisition of a certain percentage or a certain number of the shares of the offeree company, the number of shares for which declarations of acceptance have been submitted is higher than the number of shares the offeror wishes to acquire, declarations of acceptance shall be allocated on a pro rata basis. The declaration of acceptance made by each shareholder shall be taken into account in the same proportion as the ratio of the partial bid to the total of acceptance declarations received. The offeror may in the offer documents specify exceptions in order to avoid odd numbers of shares.[111]

111 Takeover Act, art 20.

Should a bid to acquire shares fail, the offeror and parties acting in concert shall be excluded from making any further bids for the shares of the offeree company for a period of one year after the publication of the result of the bid. They shall also be banned from acquiring shares during the same period that could trigger an obligation to make a bid.[112]

Mandatory Bids. Anyone who directly or indirectly obtains a controlling interest in an offeree company shall immediately notify the Takeover Commission, and within 20 trading days of obtaining a controlling interest announce a bid for all of the equities of the offeree company in accordance with the Takeover Act. A direct controlling interest is a direct interest held in an offeree company that gives the holder more than 30 per cent of the shares with permanent voting rights.[113]

Should any person acquiring a controlling interest who is not entitled to the majority of the permanent voting shares acquire additional shares within a period of 12 months that give him at least two per cent additionally of the voting rights of the company, he must immediately report this to the Takeover Commission and announce to the offeree company a bid for all of the equities of the company in accordance with the Takeover Act. Acquiring a controlling interest is permissible only if the party making the bid has ensured in advance that he will be able to fulfill the cash consideration and if all appropriate measures have been taken to guarantee fulfillment of any other type of consideration.[114]

In the case of parties acting in concert, the mutually held shares in the other's company shall be added. A share shall be credited to a legal entity unilaterally if the legal entity or any party acting in concert with it can exercise influence over voting rights of third parties directly or indirectly. The adding of shares will apply to any interests held as follows:

- By a third party for the account of the legal entity;
- Over which the legal entity can exercise voting rights without being the owner;
- For which a legal entity has assigned to a third party as collateral if the legal entity can exercise the voting rights without requiring any explicit instructions by the transferee or if the legal entity can influence the exercise of the voting rights by the transferee;
- A legal entity has been assigned usus fructus, if the legal entity can exercise the voting rights without any explicit instructions of the shareholder or can influence the exercise of voting rights of the shareholder; and

113 Takeover Act, art 22, paras 1 and 2.
114 Takeover Act, art 22, paras 4 and 5.

- A legal entity can acquire by unilateral declaration if the legal entity can exercise the voting rights without any explicit instructions of the shareholder or can influence the exercise of voting rights of the shareholder.

In the above-mentioned cases, the legal entity must be treated equally with the parties acting in concert with it.[115] Voluntary bids that may result in acquiring a controlling interest depend on the offeror's receipt of acceptance agreements containing more than 50 per cent of the voting rights. In the case of an exclusive acquisition or the acquisition of voting rights with parties acting in concert during the ongoing offer period, the acquired voting rights must be added to the voting rights of the acceptance agreement.[116]

A person having acquired a controlling interest who has not caused this to occur by taking any action at a time close to the bid, in particular, by acquiring shares, is not under the obligation to make a bid if at the time of acquiring the shares he would not have had to expect the acquisition of a controlling interest. The acquisition of a controlling interest must be notified to the Takeover Commission immediately, but at the latest within 20 exchange trading days as of the acquisition of the controlling interest. In this case, it may not be possible to exercise more than 26 per cent of voting rights. An enlargement of the investment triggers an obligation to make a bid. After the settlement of such a bid transaction, the restriction on the voting rights no longer applies. The Takeover Commission has the right to suspend voting rights fully or in part upon application of the party involved and instead impose conditions and terms insofar as these guarantee equivalent protection to the other holders of equities. The suspension of voting rights exceeding 30 per cent cannot be rescinded.[117]

A mandatory bid is not allowed to be subject to a condition except this condition is imposed by law. Mandatory bids must provide for the purchase against cash. The payment must occur at the latest 10 trading days after the binding offer. The offeror also may make an offer to trade for other securities.[118]

The price of a mandatory bid or of a voluntary bid to acquire a controlling interest may not be less than the highest consideration in money paid or agreed on for those shares of the offeree company or any parties acting in concert with it within the preceding 12 months before the announcement of the bid. This also must apply to the consideration for shares which the offeror or any party acting in concert with it is entitled or obliged to acquire in the future. Moreover, the price must correspond at least to the average exchange price weighted by the respective trading volumes of the respective equities in the past six months before the day on which the intention to make a bid was announced.[119]

116 Takeover Act, art 25a, para 2.
117 Takeover Act, art 22b.
119 Takeover Act, art 26, para 1.

The offeror and all parties acting in concert must immediately disclose any facts relevant to the price determination to the expert examining the offer and to the Takeover Commission.[120] Within three months after the publication of the result of the bid, any shareholder can apply for the verification of the lawfulness of the price by the Takeover Commission.[121]

Exemptions. The mandatory bid obligation does not apply if the share in the offeree company does not give a controlling influence over it or if the legal entity does not change which could exercise a controlling influence when taking the principle of substance over form into account. In such cases, the rules on passive acquisition of a controlling interest do not apply. The facts of the matter must be notified to the Takeover Commission immediately, but at the latest within 20 exchange trading days as of the acquisition of the shares. The share in the offeree company does not transfer any controlling influence in the following cases:

- Another shareholder together with the parties acting in concert holds at least an equal amount of shares with voting rights in the offeree company as the offeror;
- The shares do not transfer a majority of voting rights due to the usual presence of the other shareholders at the general shareholders' meeting;
- The exercise of the voting rights is limited to 30 per cent under provisions limiting voting rights in the by-laws; and
- The legal entity that ultimately has the right to exercise the controlling interest under the aspect of substance over form does not change, especially when:
  - Shares are assigned to a legal entity in which the transferor has a direct or indirect controlling interest; if the shares were held up to now by a group of parties acting in concert, this must apply accordingly if the decision of the legal entity to whom the shares have been transferred cannot be controlled by another legal entity or other group of legal entities;
  - Shares are assigned to a legal entity which holds a direct or indirect controlling interest in the transferor; if the shares are transferred to several legal entities, this must apply accordingly if the decisions of the offeree company cannot be controlled by another legal entity or another group of parties acting in concert;
  - Shares are assigned to a private foundation with a management subject exclusively to the controlling influence of parties having had the controlling interest up to then; and

121 Takeover Act, art 26, para 5.

– Entering into or dissolving an agreement on the exercise of voting rights does not allow any controlling influence over the decisions of the offeree company by another legal entity or another group of legal entities.[122]

Although there is no duty to make an offer, the Takeover Commission must be notified within 20 trading days after obtaining controlling interests if:

- An indirect controlling interest is obtained and the holding's book value is less than 25 per cent of the book value of the net assets of the direct holdings held by the legal entity;
- The shares are purchased for restructuring purposes or as securities for outstanding debts;
- The number of voting rights required for generating a controlling interest is exceeded temporarily or accidentally, provided that the infringement is reversed immediately;
- The shares are obtained by donation between related persons, inheritance, or division of property on occasion of divorce, dissolution, or nullification of a marriage;
- The shares are transferred to another legal entity that is held indirectly or directly by affiliated shareholders; and
- The party excludes (squeezes out) the old shareholders within five months of obtaining the controlling interest if the indemnification is not less than the mandatory bidding price and complies with the highest price for the shares that has been paid or agreed on by the party until the registry with the Commercial Register.[123]

Companies also have the possibility to include restrictions on the transfer of shares in their articles of association. If provided for, the bidder holding 75 per cent or more of the voting rights in the target company is entitled to convoke a shareholders' meeting following the announcement of a takeover bid, and is free to remove supervisory board members delegated by shareholders and to appoint new members (lifting-rule).[124]

Stability Measures for Financial Institutions

Measures Addressing Need for Liquidity in Financial Sector. The Interbank Market Support Act (Interbankmarktstärkungsgesetz, IBSG), which came into force on 27 October 2008 in order to re-invigorate the interbank market, expired after a prolongation of its initial time limit of one year on 31 December 2010.

122 Takeover Act, art 24.
124 Takeover Act, art 27a.

The IBSG enabled the Minister of Finance to support the interbank market via a company (SPV) with the exclusive purpose of borrowing funds from credit institutions or insurance companies via the interbank market in its own name and for its own account. The SPV loaned these funds to other credit institutions or insurance companies via the interbank market in its own name and for its own account.

Ownership of the SPV is limited to credit institutions, insurance companies, or the statutory bodies of the professional associations' level for the representation of their interests. The SPV forwarded acquired funds to those banks that exhibited a need for liquidity and it received appropriate collateral. In order to create liquidity, the Federal Government could attach a guarantee to these loans to enable the SPV to issue bonds. The Federal Government also could issue guarantees on behalf of credit institutions to facilitate the issuing of securities.

After the ISBG expired, the Regulation of the Minister of Finance, which specifies in greater detail the conditions and requirements for measures pursuant to the Financial Market Stability Act (Finanzmarktstabilitätsgesetz) and the IBSG (Verordnung des Bundesministers für Finanzen zur Festlegung näherer Bestimmungen über die Bedingungen und Auflagen für Maßnahmen nach dem Finanzmarktstabilitätsgesetz und dem Interbankmarktstärkungsgesetz),[125] which came into force on 31 October 2008, remains in force, but its field of application is limited to measures pursuant to the Financial Market Stability Act, since the ISBG expired.

Equity-Strengthening Measures for Banks. The Financial Market Stability Act, which came into force on 27 October 2008, enables the Federal Minister of Finance to inject equity capital by way of capital increases. In principle, the regulation provides for the use of all forms of permissible equity capital measures for this purpose. The government can impose appropriate conditions for providing equity capital. In special cases and in the interests of the relevant institution, the Government can intervene in the ownership structure.

The flexibility of the legal framework makes it possible to include the individual measures of a state-owned organization. Furthermore, the provisions provide for the Federal Government to transfer holdings associated with the measures described above to private owners once the measures have achieved their objective and when the capital market situation allows it.

Stock Exchange

The Vienna Stock Exchange is the only domestic securities exchange. This is operated by a legal entity under private law (Vienna Stock Exchange AG/Wiener Börse AG) licensed by the Federal Minister of Finance.

125 Federal Law Gazette II, Number 382/2008.

Registration of Private Placements

Austrian law does not require registration of private placements, ie, offering securities to a relatively small number of private investors or financial institutions. Such placements relieve the issuer from obligations such as the publication of a prospectus. This type of placement differs from a public offer, as the latter makes securities available for the whole marketplace. Still, according to article 13 Capital Market Act, any offer must be notified to the Oesterreichische Kontrollbank Aktiengesellschaft (OeKB).

The EU Public Offer Prospectus Directive[126] stipulates that an offer of securities delivered to fewer than 100[127] persons per member state, not including qualified investors, does not qualify as a public offer. Additionally, an offer does not require a published prospectus if it is directed solely to qualified investors.[128] For the purpose of the Public Offer Prospectus Directive, the term 'qualified investors' means:

- Legal entities which are authorized or directed to participate in the relevant financial markets, including, but not limited to, pension funds and their management firms, investment firms, credit institutions, various authorized financial institutions, and insurance companies;
- Regional and national governments, central banks, international and supranational institutions, ie, the European Investment Bank, and an array of other similar international cooperatives;
- Designated natural persons who are residents of a member state, and the state authorizes such persons to be considered qualified investors, subject to mutual recognition and other prerequisites; and
- Designated SMEs, contingent upon certain requirements.[129]

Registration of Secondary Trade

In General. The Stock Exchange is required to supervise trading on the exchange with an electronic or technically adequate surveillance system that guarantees the systematic and exhaustive collecting and assessment of all transmitted data, which facilitates any necessary investigations.

The FMA is entitled to use the surveillance system when conducting investigations pursuant to article 25, paragraph 2, of the Securities Supervision Act 2007, especially in the case of insider trading and ensuring compliance with 126 Directive 2003/71/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 on the prospectus to be published when securities are offered to the public or admitted to trading and amending Directive 2001/34/EC.

127 150 persons according to art 3, para 1, no 14 of the Capital Market Act.

the relevant trading laws.[130] The Securities Supervision Act 2007 states the duty of credit institutions and other market participants to make relevant information available to the FMA.

Order Books. All intermediaries, including both Official Brokers and Non-Official Brokers acting as mediums for the negotiable securities traded on the Unlisted Securities Market, are required to maintain order books in which all orders and any cancellation of orders received are catalogued chronologically.[131] These books must be composed in German. Additionally, all regulations governing bookkeeping relative to registered merchants also apply mutatis mutandis.[132]

Contents of Order Books. The intermediaries are required to keep a daily log of the completed transactions in the order books, as well as records of the following information:

- The contracting parties' names;
- A description of the contract's purpose;
- The bargained price;
- The terms of the agreement and, specifically, the type and quantity of goods when goods are being sold;
- The time and place of delivery;
- The payment type;
- The time that the conditions of the contract are fulfilled;
- Whether a transaction was completed on or off the exchange; and
- If applicable, the rescinding of the contract prior to its completion.[133]

The order books may be transcribed or computerized. Transcribed books must be bound, stapled, and each page chronologically numbered, as to ensure that no page is removed or replaced. The intermediary must certify and sign these records daily. Computerized records may either be printed monthly and bound together, to be verified and certified with the intermediary's signature, or electronically stored on an external data device and delivered daily to the Stock Exchange along with a signed verification of the data's integrity.

All order books, including the books of intermediaries whose services or employment are terminated, must be retained for seven years from the date of the last entry recorded by the Stock Exchange and afterwards the books must be destroyed.[134] Furthermore, if the contracting parties request certified excerpts, the intermediaries are required to provide such excerpts, containing all things relative to the transaction completed by the requesting party. The requesting party is obliged to pay any costs incurred from retrieving the requested excerpts. In the event of an anonymous transaction, the name of the other party may be omitted pursuant to article 63 of the Stock Exchange Act.

Inspections of Intermediaries' Order Books. The Stock Exchange and the Exchange Commissioners, including any representative of the latter, are entitled to inspect the intermediaries' order books at any time. The contracting parties also are entitled to inspect such sections of the books that pertain to their affairs.

Thus, the inspection may only permit the party to access the information regarding its transactions. In the event of an anonymous transaction, the other party's name may be concealed pursuant to article 63 of the Stock Exchange Act. In the event of a legal dispute, the court may order the order book to be proffered, absent a request by a party. However, only entries which are relevant to the dispute may be exhibited at trial.[135]

Members

Membership in the Stock Exchange is, according to article 15 of the Stock Exchange Act, limited to:

- Credit institutions, according to article 1, paragraph 1, of the Banking Act, which are licensed to carry on any business specified in article 1, paragraph 1, number 7, of the Banking Act;
- Credit institutions in member states of the European Union (EU) other than Austria that (a) are licensed in their member state to provide services according to article A(1)–(3) of the Annex to Council Directive 2004/39/EC or authorized pursuant to article 3, paragraph 1, letter p, of Council Directive 2006/49/EC, with such authorization including the freedom of establishment and services, (b) are in compliance with the capital requirements according to Council Directive 2006/49/EC and, unless the respective company is a local firm, are, as far as the compliance with these regulations is concerned, subject to the supervision by the competent authorities of the member state, and (c) have given notice by the competent authority of the member state, pursuant to article 9, paragraphs 2 or 6, of the Banking Act or article 12 of the Securities Supervision Act 2007;
- Local firms merely require confirmation by the competent authority of the member state or any other evidence with respect to the compliance with the requirements pursuant to article 6 of Council Directive 2006/49/EC;[136]

134 Stock Exchange Act, art 60, para 6.
136 Stock Exchange Act, art 15, para 1, no 2, let c.

- Recognized investment firms registered outside the European Economic Area (EEA) member state, pursuant to article 2, paragraph 31(b), of the Banking Act;
- Admitted clearing agents with their registered office or admission in an EEA member state so long as they only participate in clearing/settlement pursuant to article 2, number 33, of the Banking Act;[137]
- Companies licensed to trade as a principal or as an agent for third parties in commodity derivative contracts pursuant to article 1, number 6(e)–(g) and (j), of the Securities Supervision Act 2007, even if their license is not based on the Banking Act;[138] and
- Organizations with their registered office in a third country (section 2, number 8, of the Banking Act) that are licensed to carry out at least one of the businesses pursuant to article 1, paragraph 1, number 7, letters b–f, of the Banking Act.

The Banking Act defines credit institutions as holders of an Austrian banking license, pursuant to article 4 of this Act, or pursuant to applicable provisions under Austrian federal law. For the purposes of the Act, banking business encompasses securities business, as most of the latter become members of the Stock Exchange.

Under the Investment Services Directive, credit institutions, investment firms, and local firms whose registered office is located outside of Austria in an EEA member state may be admitted as members to the Stock Exchange if they are allowed to conduct securities business in their member state and are subject to supervision by their competent authorities. Such competent authorities may notify the Stock Exchange of the relevant facts, which decides on the applicant's membership. Investment firms with a registered office in a non-EEA state may be admitted to the Stock Exchange if:

- They are licensed to conduct transactions;
- They are authorized in a third country that is a member of the Basel Committee of Banking Supervision; and
- They are subject to supervision requirements that are at least equal to the investment firm standards in the EU.

Undertakings with their registered office in a third country may be admitted to the Stock Exchange, provided that the applicant is licensed to carry out at least one of the specified businesses there and the applicant satisfies all legal duties. Membership in the exchange requires that:

- There are no facts known which indicate that the applicant might not be as reliable as necessary to be able to take part in trading on the exchange;[139]

137 Stock Exchange Act, art 15, para 1, no 5.
138 Stock Exchange Act, art 15, para 1, no 6.
139 Stock Exchange Act, art 14, para 1, no 1.

- The applicant is not restricted in its capacity to do business, in particular due to insolvency or because it has been put under receivership;[140]
- The applicant or one of its officers has not been convicted by law for an offence under article 13 of the Business Code (Gewerbeordnung, GewO), unless such violation is insignificant or the sentence has become expunged from the criminal record;[141]
- The applicant or one of its officers has not been sentenced finally and conclusively pursuant to article 48, 48b, and 48c of the Stock Exchange Act, unless the violation of article 48 or 48(c) is insignificant or the sentence has become expunged from the criminal record;[142] or
- There are no facts known that would be detrimental to the reputation of the domestic market or hinder the maintenance of orderly and fair trading;[143]
- The applicant joins an existing trading and settlement system or a suitable settlement and clearing system pursuant to article 15a of the Stock Exchange Act[144] and deposits the respective collateral;[145] and
- The applicant nominates at least one dealer who will either participate in the trading on the floor or has access to the automated trading system.[146]

Admitted firms, including investment firms, may retain their membership with a securities exchange so long as the following remain in place, even if their registered office is in a state which is neither an EEA member nor represented in the Basel Committee for Banking Supervision only as long as:

- At least one authorized clearing participant[147] is represented on the derivatives market; and
- At least one authorized credit institution is represented on the cash market that has its registered office in a member state and is licensed in said state; or
- A third country is represented in the Basel Committee for Banking Supervision and is a member of the domestic securities exchange and concludes deals on their behalf and guarantees vis-à-vis the exchange operating company the fulfillment of exchange transactions carried out by the recognized investment firm or the company that is a member of the domestic exchange.[148]

Market Segments

According to certain criteria, the financial instruments traded on the markets of the Wiener Börse AG are allocated to various market segments. The market segmentation does not take into account whether financial instruments are admitted to listing on a regulated market (ie, Official Market or Second Regulated Market) or traded on a Multilateral Trading System (ie, Third Market). In particular, the following criteria are relevant for the allocation to the different market segments:

- Markets (official market, second regulated market, or third market);
- Type of financial instruments (shares, participation certificates, bonds, or certificates);
- More stringent reporting, quality, and disclosure requirements;
- Liquidity provider (specialist or market maker);
- Trading system and type trading.

Listing and Delisting

Securities Requirements

Admission to Listing of Official Market. The securities must have a total nominal value of at least €2.9 million for shares and of €725,000 for other securities. For the admission of no-par value securities, the issuer must certify that the market value is predicted to reach at least €725,000 and the total number of such securities must be at least 20,000. For non-voting preferred shares issued by Austrian stock corporations whose ordinary shares are not admitted to listing on the Official Market, the nominal value of the preferred shares must exceed €1 million.[149] These conditions do not apply to the admission of subsequent listings of the same type of securities or for admission of debt securities that are issued continuously free from any restriction to a subscription period or a certain maximum amount.

Debt securities of an international organization that is an entity under public law must be tradable without any restrictions in order to be admitted to listing on the Official Market and the application for admission to listing must refer to all debt securities of an issue. Debt securities issued by the federal government, the provinces, and the member states of the EEA must be admitted to official listing on all securities exchanges.[150]

The denominations of the securities and the number of certificates must correspond to trading requirements and the needs of potential investors. The application for admission must refer to shares already issued or for all securities of the same offering. Shares that are legally restricted from trading for a certain period may be excluded from admission, provided that such exemption does not prejudice the bearers of the shares to be admitted, and the prospectus or the decree announcing the admission refers to this exception.[151]

Furthermore, the securities must have sufficient distribution among the general public. For publicly owned shares, the minimum requisite is a nominal value of €725,000. In the case of no-par value shares, there must be at least 10,000 publicly owned shares or they must be offered to the public for purchase.[152] These requirements are not applicable if the shares have already been admitted to the official listing of one or more foreign exchanges and an adequate distribution exists outside the country, or in the case of subsequent listing of further securities of the same type.

For securities that grant holders the right to convert or subscribe to other securities having a minimum denomination of less than €50,000, the securities to which the right of conversion or subscription refers must be admitted to listing on the exchange by the latest simultaneously; this requirements may be waived if the issuer furnishes proof that the bearers of the securities that grant them the right to conversion or subscription with a minimum denomination of less than €50,000 have all the information at their disposal that they need to reach an informed judgment of the value of the securities to which the right of conversion or subscription refers; this must be assumed, above all, if the securities to which the right to conversion or subscription refers are officially listed on an internationally recognized securities exchange and the prospectus for the admission to listing of the securities with conversion or subscription rights meets the requirements of article 7 of the Capital Market Act.[153] Certificates that represent shares may be admitted if:

- The issuer meets the requirements of article 66a, paragraph 1, numbers 1–3, of the Stock Exchange Act;
- The certificates meet the requirements of article 66a, paragraph 1, numbers 4–8, of the Stock Exchange Act; and
- The issuer guarantees the fulfillment of its obligations vis-à-vis the bearers of the certificate.[154]

Securities Admission Procedures

Applications for admission to listing of a security or of an issuing program on the Official Market and on the Second Regulated Market must be made in writing to the exchange operating company by the issuer and must be signed

151 Stock Exchange Act, art 66a, para 1, no 6.
152 Stock Exchange Act, art 66a, para 7.
153 Stock Exchange Act, art 66a, para 1, no 8.

by an exchange member if the issuer is not a member of the exchange concerned.[155]

The application must include the applicant's name and registered office, the type and designation of the securities, and the aggregate value of the issue requesting admission. The value should be listed in terms of the nominal value or, in the case of no-par value securities, the quantity of securities and their anticipated fair market value.[156] The following documents must be submitted simultaneously with the application:

- Valid copy of the articles of association or the issuer's partnership agreement;
- Excerpt not older than four weeks from the commercial register in which the issuer is registered;
- Official authorization certificates if such are required for the formation of the issuer's company, the objective of its business activities, or the issue of securities;
- Evidence of any other legal requirements for the issue of securities;
- Evidence of registration of the issue in a register, if such registration is required for the issue to be legitimate;
- Annual audited reports coupled with the auditor's assessment, along with the annual report for the last complete business year; however, in the event of the initial admission to listing on the official market for shares, the first two requirements are applicable in addition to the financial accounts for the past three complete business years;
- Two copies of the prospectus approved pursuant to article 74 of the Stock Exchange Act or Directive 2003/71/EC, together with the FMA confirmation of notification receipt (notifizierung);
- If securities are printed, two sample prints of each of the designations for which admission is applied; and
- If the relevant securities or certificates are to be secured by a global certificate, the issuer's declaration of which depository has dominion of such global certificate.[157]

The Stock Exchange must decide on the application within 10 weeks after submission. The issuer filing the application is required to provide the Stock Exchange with any information that might be necessary to determine whether the conditions for the admission to trading on the exchange exist. An appeal may be filed with the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht) to challenge the denial of admission to the listing or the revocation of the admittance of listing.[158]

Pursuant to article 47 of Directive 2004/39/EC, the FMA is required to maintain a register of all domestic regulated markets, ie, the Official Market and the Unlisted Securities Market. The FMA must deliver the register to the European Commission and the other member states.[159]

Admission to Unlisted Securities Market

In general, the rules determining admission to the Official Market also apply to the Unlisted Securities Market (the Second Regulated Market). However, the rules differ with regard to how old a stock company must be upon the admittance of its shares. On the Unlisted Securities Market, the stock company must have existed for a period of at least one year, whereas the Official Market requires at least three.

The securities must have a minimum total nominal value of €725,000. For the admission of no-par value securities, the issuer must certify that the anticipated market value is at least €362,500 and the total number of such securities must be at least 10,000.[160] This restriction does not apply to the admission of shares that have already been admitted to the official listing of one or more foreign exchanges and an adequate distribution exists outside the country and of debt securities issued constantly without being restricted to a subscription period or to a certain limited maximum amount.[161]

In order to have adequate amount of free float the necessary number of shares and other equity securities must be provided for trading on the exchange. To meet this requirement at least €181,250 nominal share capital, or in the case of no-par value shares at least 2,500 shares, must be in the possession of the public or must be offered to the public for sale.[162]

The denominations of the shares and other equity securities must meet trading requirements.[163] The application for admission must include all shares already issued of the same type or for all securities of the same subscription. Shares that are legally restricted from being traded for a certain period of time may be denied admission, provided this exception does not prejudice the bearers of the shares to be admitted, and the prospectus or the decree announcing the admission mentions this exception.[164]

In the case of securities that give the bearer conversion rights or subscription rights to other securities and whose minimum denomination is less than €50,000, those underlying securities must be admitted at the latest simultaneously with these to the exchange; exceptions may be made to this requirement if the issuer furnishes proof that the owners of the securities with conversion rights or subscription rights have all the information at their disposal that is necessary to make a judgment on the value of the underlying securities; this is to be assumed especially if the underlying securities are officially listed on a recognized exchange pursuant to article 4, paragraph 1, number 72, of Regulation 575/2013 and the prospectus for the admission of securities with conversion or subscription rights contains the necessary information in accordance with article 7 of the Capital Market Act.[165]

Securities in the form of certificates may be admitted if the issuer satisfies the conditions outlined in article 68, paragraph 1, numbers 1–3, of the Stock Exchange Act; the certificates meet the requirements of article 68, paragraph 1, numbers 4–9, of the Stock Exchange Act; and the issuer guarantees the fulfillment of its obligations to the bearers of such certificates.[166]

Printing

Individually printed securities must be counterfeit-proof and must facilitate the simple and swift settlement of securities transactions.[167] The FMA is responsible for issuing decrees regulating the print of security certificates based on an expertise drawn up by the exchange operating company taking technological progress into account and also must examine the printed securities as to their compliance with the minimum requirements stipulated in the printing guidelines. The application of additional security characteristics must always be permissible.[168]

If the securities of a foreign issuer do not comply with the FMA printing Directives, the issuer must certify that such securities satisfy the admission requirements in the country of its registered office. Furthermore, the shares will only be admitted under the following circumstances:

- Notice is given to the public that the print does not meet Austrian standards;
- Such deviation from Austrian standards does not jeopardize investors' legitimate interests; and
- The country in which the issuer has its registered office is prepared to admit Austrian securities under the same conditions.[169]

Disclosure Requirements

Periodic Disclosure

Official Trade

An issuer is required to disclose its most recent annual financial report, encompassing the consolidated audited financial accounts and the management board's report within four months after the close of the fiscal year. It is the issuer's duty to ensure that these financial statements are made publicly available for at least five years.[170]

Additionally, the following must be provided: commentary and information of the issuer's legal representatives that confirm that the legal representatives have complied with the applicable accounting standards while drafting the annual financial statements. Furthermore, the legal representatives must provide confirmation that the management board's report represents a fair and accurate view of the issuer's financial position and relevant risks.[171]

Issuers of shares must guarantee that, in their home member state, shareholders have the information and tools necessary to exercise their rights and that the data is accurate.[172] Such issuers also are required to treat all shareholders in comparable positions equally. The joint-stock company must inform the FMA and the public immediately in the event that changes in the rights attached to shares come into effect and important changes occur in the capital structure, meaning that information previously published on that subject is no longer valid as soon as such changes come to its attention.

The joint-stock company must inform the Stock Exchange and the FMA in writing of any intentions to make changes in the company's articles of association or articles of incorporation before or at the latest simultaneously with the call to hold the general meeting which is to decide on the proposed amendments and which must be published.

If a foreign issuer of debt securities has an obligation to publish annual accounts in its home country, the annual accounts also must be published in Austria. The issuer must inform the Stock Exchange in writing, before or at the same time as the call to hold a meeting of a body empowered to make such changes, of any changes planned in its statutes or instrument of incorporation insofar as these changes affect the rights of, eg, the bondholders.

The issuer must publish any changes in the rights of bearers of securities other than stocks immediately, in particular such changes as arise out of changes in the bond terms or interest rates.[173] Furthermore, the issuer must immediately inform the public of any new issue of bonds and, in particular, of the guarantees furnished for these bonds.[174] If the official listing is for bonds with exchange rights or subscription rights, the issuer must publish all changes in the rights that are attached to the different classes of underlying securities.

171 Stock Exchange Act, art 82, para 4; VwGH, 11 April 2011, 2010/17/0203 on Stock Exchange Act, art 82, re: annual financial report not published in the correct language in time.

172 Stock Exchange Act, art 83, para 2.

Unlisted Trade

Issuers of shares must draw up and publish, within the legal limits, annual accounts, including business reports and suggestions for the distribution of profits. If the annual accounts are not published in time (see text, below), an interim report must be published containing preliminary results of the business year concluded. The reports must be delivered immediately to the Stock Exchange.

The issuer must communicate the content of the propositions to be dealt with at the general meeting to the Stock Exchange at least 14 days in advance. In the event that the annual accounts are not published in time, the Stock Exchange must be informed of the period of extension granted by the supervisory board. The Stock Exchange must be notified at least one month in advance of shares to be withdrawn from the unlisted securities market and this must be published simultaneously in the Official Gazette of the Wiener Zeitung.

The issuers must inform the Stock Exchange immediately in writing of all significant circumstances concerning shareholders, in particular, general meetings to be held, changes in the statutes (such as capital increase or decrease and changes validated by placing a mark on the share certificate), conclusion of contracts on exclusion of profits or losses, distribution of dividends, invitations to exercise subscription rights, exchange of share certificates, and issuing of new coupon sheets.

Issuers of debt securities must deliver their annual accounts and business reports to the Stock Exchange at the latest 14 days before the general meeting is held. The Stock Exchange must be notified at least one month in advance of shares to be withdrawn from the unlisted securities market and this must be published simultaneously in the Official Gazette of the Wiener Zeitung.

The issuers are obliged to inform the Stock Exchange immediately in writing of all significant circumstances concerning bondholders, especially of resolutions regarding the conversion of securities, the issue of new interest coupon sheets, and the numbers of securities redeemed or drawn by lots and must publish the information in the Official Gazette of the Wiener Zeitung.

174 Stock Exchange Act, art 93, para 6.

Interim Reports

Issuers of shares or debt securities are required to produce interim reports regarding the first six months of the business year, immediately after the close of the reporting period, or by no later than two months after such closure. The issuers also must guarantee that these reports are available to the public for at least five years after publication. An interim financial report must contain abridged financial accounts, the management board's half-year report, and affidavits in which the issuer's legal representatives affirm their names and positions.

The legal representatives must verify that, to the best of their knowledge, the abridged financial accounts were prepared in compliance with the applicable accounting standards and that such accounts, along with the management board's report, represent a fair and accurate view of the assets, financial standing, and relevant risks.[175] If the issuer is not obliged to produce consolidated financial statements, the abridged financial accounts must include at least a condensed balance sheet, a compressed profit-loss account, and commentary to the financial statements.

The reporting and valuation standards regarding the production of the annual financial reports apply to the condensed financial accounts. If the issuer is obliged to produce such condensed financial accounts, the abridged financial accounts must be produced in compliance with the IFRS pursuant to Regulation 1606/2002/EEC.[176]

Furthermore, if the interim abridged financial accounts are audited, they must contain the unabridged text of the auditor's opinion. If such accounts are reviewed, they must include the unabridged version of the auditor's review report. However, if the interim reports have neither been completely audited nor reviewed by an auditor, the issuer is required to disclose this fact in its report. The applicable liability attaches to the auditor who performs the review.[177]

The interim report must at least encompass any major events that occurred within the first six months of the fiscal year and their effects on the abridged financial reports. It also must illustrate the essential risks and uncertainties for the remainder of the fiscal year. Moreover, issuers of shares must disclose any major transactions performed by closely related persons or companies, including:

- Dealings with affiliated companies and individuals concluded during the first six months of the current fiscal year and which have had a substantial effect on the company's financial standing or earnings within the period; and

176 Stock Exchange Act, art 87, para 2.
177 Stock Exchange Act, art 87, para 3. Liability is subject to article 275, paragraph 2, of the Companies Act; article 62a of the Banking Act; and article 82, paragraph 8, of the Insurance Supervision Act.

- Changes pertaining to deals with affiliated companies and individuals that were identified in the last annual financial report that may affect the company's financial standing or net operating profit during the first half of the current fiscal year. Issuers of shares that are not obliged to produce a condensed financial report must at least disclose deals with affiliated companies and individuals, as referred to in article 43, paragraph 1, number 7, letter b, of Directive 78/660/EEC. [178]

Credit institutions may use their monthly returns or quarterly reports encompassing assets, capital, and risks, in compliance with article 74 of the Banking Act as a substructure for the interim reports. Insurance companies must disclose the premium income deriving from contributions per insurance class, in addition to its aggregate life insurance contracts, in place of sales and operating results. The report must be accompanied with commentary of their results comprised of information detailing profits, costs, and degree of damages flowing from investments.[179]

The interim report must be written in German; in the event of a third-country issuer, publication in another language accepted by the competent body (eg, the regulator) in the third country or a commonly used language in the relevant international financial affiliations.[180]

Exemptions

The following issuers are exempted from the reporting obligation pursuant to article 82, paragraphs 4 and 87 of the Stock Exchange Act:

- Central states, regional authorities, international bodies under public law to which at least one member state belongs, the European Central Bank, and the national central banks of member states, irrespective of whether they issue shares or other securities; and
- Issuers of debt securities admitted to trading only on a regulated market with a minimum denomination of €100,000 or, in case of debt securities denominated in a currency other than Euros, with a minimum denomination whose value on the first listing equaled at least €100,000.

The following issuers are exempted[181] from the obligation to publish interim financial reports:

- Credit institutions that do not possess shares admitted to trading on the regulated market and that have steadily issued debt securities, provided that the debt securities' aggregate nominal value does not exceed €100 million and no Directive 2003/71/EC-mandated prospectus has been published; and

- Issuers already in existence on or before 31 December 2003 that have only issued debt securities on regulated markets that are irrevocably guaranteed by the origin member state or its regional authorities.[182]

Ad Hoc Publicity

An issuer with securities admitted to the Official or Unlisted Market is required to immediately disseminate any new developments relative to inside information that are likely to have a significant influence on the prices of the securities or, in the case of bonds, facts that could hinder the issuer's capacity to fulfill its commitments simultaneously to the public, all investors, and the FMA.[183]

These facts must be published in compliance with the applicable communication of information provisions.[184] Furthermore, an issuer of shares admitted to listing on the Official Market or to the Unlisted Regulated Market is required to immediately disclose to the public a declaration on any stock options granted, the resolution of the general meeting, and the duration of any stock buyback programs, immediately preceding the implementation of such programs.[185] The FMA may exempt the issuer from the obligation to publish this information if it serves to prevent the issuer from suffering damages with regard to its legitimate interests. In this case, the issuer must certify that investors will not suffer damages.

Insider Trading

In General. The Securities Supervision Act 2007 became effective on 1 November 2007. It implemented Directive 2004/39/EC, also known as the Markets in Financial Instruments Directive (MiFID), and Commission Directive 2006/73/EC regarding organizational and operating requirements. The MiFID provides for a standardized level of protection for investors and standardized practice conditions for a service provider.

Directive 2014/65/EU on Markets in Financial Instruments, repealing Directive 2004/39/EC (MiFID II), and Regulation (EU) 600/2014 on Markets in Financial Instruments (MiFIR) have been published in the EU Official Journal. Member states have two years to transpose the new rules stipulated therein, which will be applicable starting January 2017.

Regulation 596/2014 on market abuse (Market Abuse Regulation) and Directive 2014/57/EU on criminal sanctions for market abuse (Market Abuse Directive) have been published recently in the EU Official Journal. The Market Abuse Regulation must enter into application in July 2016. Member states have two years to transpose the Directive on criminal sanctions for market abuse. The new rules on market abuse update and strengthen the existing framework to ensure market integrity and investor protection provided by the existing Market Abuse Directive (2003/6/EC) that will be repealed.

The Directive on criminal sanctions for market abuse (Market Abuse Directive) complements the Market Abuse Regulation by requiring all member states to provide for harmonized criminal offences of insider dealing and market manipulation, and to impose maximum criminal penalties of not less than four and two years' imprisonment for the most serious market abuse offences. Member states must make sure that such behavior, including the manipulation of benchmarks, is a criminal offence, punishable with effective sanctions everywhere in Europe.[186]

Reporting Obligations. Institutions subject to reporting requirements may notify the FMA of transactions which use instruments required to be reported promptly and no later than the close of the following banking day. The following institutions are subject to reporting requirements:

- Credit institutions which hold a full banking license in Austria;
- Austrian branch offices of credit institutions, financial institutions, and investment firms;
- The Austrian National Bank (Österreichische Nationalbank); and
- Recognized investment firms and corporations whose registered office is located in a third country, provided that they are members of a securities exchange as defined in the Stock Exchange Act, in addition to membership to any cooperation exchange engaged in a stock exchange.[187]

These reports must include the details listed in Table 1 of Annex I of Commission Regulation 1287/2006/EC, ie, firm identification, trading day, trading time buy/sell indicator, trading capacity, instrument identification, maturity date, derivative type, unit price, quantity, and counterparty. Pursuant to the Resolution on Reporting Requirements of Securities 2007, reports must include additional details (eg, unit of marketable securities, open/close mark, market maker mark, and SWIFT code of counterparty).[188]

The reports must be transmitted electronically.[189] When an institution has issued a declaration pursuant to article 13(1), second sentence, of Regulation 1287/2006/EC, they may omit certain sections of their individual report. Credit institutions and investment firms are obliged to gather information about their customer's identity for the purpose of these reports. Additionally, credit institutions are required to ascertain and verify their customer's identity prior to administering any securities transaction with a minimum value of €15,000.[190]

Exemptions. The Securities Supervision Act 2007 exempts the following from reporting duties (however, they are obliged to disclose information to the FMA upon request):

- Investment management companies (pursuant to article 2 of the Investment Funds Act 1993[191]);
- Investment management companies for real estate;
- Employee pension funds; and
- The Austrian National Bank.[192]

Rules of Conduct. According to articles 3 and 4 of the Securities Supervision Act 2007, any person or legal entity that intends to provide investment services in Austria must obtain permission from the FMA. Additionally, the Act provides detailed rules of conduct to prevent insider trading, fraud, and improper manipulation of the market and to ensure adequate protection of the customers.

Persons and legal entities providing business services involving securities or other forms of investment of customer assets, as well as the agents of such persons and legal entities, are specifically prohibited from:

- Marketing via telephone and fax listed or unlisted securities or contracts, without the consent of the subscriber; [193] and
- Sending electronic mail, including sms messages, to consumers without the recipient's prior consent, provided that such message was sent for the purpose of direct marketing or delivered to more than 50 recipients.[194]

Such consent may be withdrawn at any time, however, revocation of consent has no effect on the relevant contractual relationship; with respect to marketing phone calls, the caller may not conceal or disguise the identification of the calling number.
194 Telekommunikationsgesetz 2003, art 107, para 2.

Prior consent to electronic mail is not required if:[195]

- The sender has acquired the contact information for the communication regarding a sale or a service to his customers;
- The message is conveyed for the purpose of marketing his own comparable products or services;
- Upon the conveyance of the customer's electronic contact details and each subsequent message, a clear and explicit opportunity to refuse communications regarding direct marketing has been provided to such customer; and
- The customer has not declined a priori that electronic mail is sent to him, specifically through registration to the listing according to article 7 of the E-Commerce Act.

Inside information and Insider

In General. For the purposes of the Stock Exchange Act, inside information is defined as any precise information consisting of confidential facts, directly or indirectly related to one or more financial instruments, and its disclosure may significantly influence the prices of such financial instruments or their derivatives if made public.[196]

Insiders are persons who, as members of an issuer's administrative, management, or supervisory board, or due to their occupation, profession, duties, or participation in the capital of an issuer, are privy to inside information. Any person having gained inside information through the commission of a crime also is considered an insider. In the event that a legal entity is liable for inside information violations, the natural persons who are involved in the decision to execute a transaction on behalf of such legal entity are deemed insiders.[197] The following financial instruments are subject to the rules of insider trading and market manipulation:

- Securities as defined under article 1, paragraph 4, of the Securities Supervision Act 2007;
- Shares in entities for joint investments;
- Money market instruments;
- Financial futures contracts, including transacted cash settlements of comparable instruments;
- Forward-rate agreements;
- Equity swaps: interest and foreign exchange swaps and swaps on shares or stock indices;

195 Telekommunikationsgesetz 2003, art 107, para 3.
196 Stock Exchange Act, art 48a, para 1, no 1.
197 Stock Exchange Act, art 48b, para 4.

- Call and put options on all instruments set forth above, including parallel instruments settled in cash, such as foreign exchange and interest rate options;
- Commodity derivatives; and
- All other instruments listed on a regulated market in an EEA member state or for which the application has been submitted for listing on such a market.[198]

Additionally, insider trading rules apply to any financial instrument admitted to trading on a regulated market in at least one member state, or for which an application for admission to trading on such a market has been submitted, irrespective of whether or not the transaction itself actually takes place on that market and to any financial instrument not admitted to trading on a regulated market in a member state, but whose value depends on a financial instrument in the aforementioned meaning.[199] Abuse of inside information occurs when a person utilizes inside information with the intention of procuring a financial benefit for oneself or a third party by:

- Purchasing or selling the relevant instruments or proposing or advising to purchase from/sell instruments to a third party or regarding two-day spots on emission allowances, pursuant article 3, number 5, of Regulation (EU) 1031/2010;
- Placing a bid with the intention to profit from the misuse of inside information or advising the action to a third party; or
- Disclosing inside information to a third party absent an obligation or need to do so.[200]

Generally, market manipulation involves transactions or purchase/sell orders, which either send or are likely to send false or deceptive signs concerning the price, supply, or demand for instruments or are executed by one or more persons intentionally acting in concert to drive up the price of one or more financial instruments to a level that is artificial or abnormal.[201] However, if such person has legitimate reasons for this and the transactions or orders are in conformity with the relevant regulated market's accepted market practices, such action may not be deemed as market manipulation.

Release of Inside Information to Public. Issuers having inside information relating directly to their financial instruments are obliged to immediately disclose and disseminate such information and any amendment to the public. The information must be disseminated simultaneously for all categories of investors in the relevant EEA member states. This inside information also must be available for the public on the issuer's website for an appropriate period of time.[202]

199 Stock Exchange Act, art 48e, paras 2 and 3.

The issuer may postpone the release of the inside information, provided that it could be potentially damaging to the issuer's legitimate interests, ie, to prevent disruptions of ongoing negotiations, unless concealing the information would be deceptive for the public and the issuer is not required to ensure the information to remain confidential.[203] The issuers are obliged to guarantee confidentiality of inside information; thus, they must regulate who has access to it. They must take effective and required measures to:

- Prevent unauthorized persons from gaining access to such information;
- Ensure that every person who has access to inside information assents to the legal duties resulting from such knowledge and is informed of the sanctions for abuse and improper dissemination of inside information; and
- Permit immediate release of such information.[204]

Issuer Compliance Resolution 2007. The Issuer Compliance Resolution 2007 (Emittenten-Compliance-Verordnung) provides guidelines for the dissemination of information within companies and organizational measures to prevent the abuse of inside information and other compliance-relevant information.

This resolution applies to issuers of shares or securities on the regulated market in Austria pursuant to article 1, paragraph 2, of the Stock Exchange Act. The regulations do not apply to issuers of financial instruments that only trade on multilateral trading systems, municipalities, and international and supranational organizations.[205] For the purposes of this Act, compliance-relevant information is insider information as well as other confidential, price sensitive information that does not meet the criteria of insider information, ie, not made public, qualified to influence the price. Thus, any information a reasonable investor does not think will become insider information in the future is not compliance-relevant.[206]

The issuer has a duty to issue an internal compliance policy and to notify the FMA; thus, confidential areas (Vertraulichkeitsbereiche) must be specified. Furthermore, the issuer must produce and maintain an insider list and provide it to the FMA upon request.[207] The compliance policy must include the following:

- Specified confidential areas;
- Implementation of duties with respect to the dealing with inside information;

202 Stock Exchange Act, art 48d, para 1.
203 Stock Exchange Act, art 48d, para 2.
204 Stock Exchange Act, art 48d, para 2, no 2.
205 Emittenten-Compliance-Verordnung 2007, ch 1, art 2.
206 Emittenten-Compliance-Verordnung 2007, ch 1, art 3, nos 1 and 1a.
207 Emittenten-Compliance-Verordnung 2007, art 11, no 1.

- Regulations regarding the transfer of inside information;
- Duration of retention periods prior to the planned publishing of figures;
- Transfer of director's dealing reports;
- Insider register;
- Rights and duties of the compliance department; and
- Consequences of a violation of the compliance policy under civil and labor law.[208]

Records of Insiders. The issuers or any person acting on their behalf or for their account must keep a record of the persons who work for them with a regular, or on an ad hoc basis, access to inside information. This record must be updated regularly and be forwarded to the FMA on request.[209] This insider list must include the following:

- Compilation and updated data of the insider lists;
- Declarations of natural persons of confidential groups certifying, to the best of the issuer's knowledge, their first and last name, date of birth, address, and membership of the groups;
- Declaration by the legal representatives of the confidential groups certifying, to the best of the issuer's knowledge, their business relationship with the person of such groups and that person's membership of groups, and his company register number noted at the beginning and end of such document; and
- All other required information pursuant to article 6, paragraph 4, and article 8, paragraph 5, of the Resolution.[210]

The provisions regarding the release of inside information and the records of insiders are not applicable to issuers who have not applied for admission of their financial instruments to be listed on a regulated market in an EEA member state or such admission has not been granted.[211]

Reporting Duties. Persons who either have close ties with issuers and persons who have a management position with an issuer of financial instruments with its registered office in Austria or the obligation to submit annual documents pursuant to article 10 of Directive 2003/71/EC must report all of their trading in equities and equity-like securities admitted to the regulated markets of the issuer or any related trades in derivatives or associated companies to the FMA.

The report must be made within five working days after the execution date of trade, but may be extended until the total volume of the trade executed reaches €5,000. This report may be omitted if the total volume of the trade executed fails to reach the amount by the close of the calendar year.[212] Furthermore, persons having their registered office or branch office in Austria who are professionally engaged in trading of securities must immediately inform the FMA of any well-founded suspicion they may have with regard to a transaction that could be an inside deal or constitute market manipulation.[213]

The above-mentioned prohibitions and requirements apply to actions which are executed in Austria or abroad concerning financial instruments that are admitted to trading on a regulated market situated or operating in Austria or for which an application for admission to trading on such a market has been made, or actions which are carried out in Austria concerning financial instruments that are admitted to trading on a regulated market in a member state or for which an application for admission to trading on such market has been made.[214]

Recommendations. For the purposes of the Stock Exchange Act, a recommendation is defined as:

'…an analysis or other explicit or implicit information, intended for information dissemination channels or for the public, recommending or suggesting an investment strategy regarding one or more financial instruments or issuers of financial instruments, including an assessment of the value or price of such instruments.'[215]

The issuer of a recommendation is obliged to:

- Specify the identity of the issuer and the legal entity who is responsible for its preparation;
- Specify the identity of the competent authority if the relevant entity is a securities firm or credit institution;
- Refer to the standard and rules mentioned if the issuer is neither a securities firm nor a credit institution; and
- In the case of non-written recommendations, specify where the information mentioned above is available to the public.[216]

A recommendation must contain detailed information as set forth in article 48f of the Stock Exchange Act, ie, reference to all essential sources, basis for the valuation, used methods, warning of potential risks, and conflicts of interest.[217]

Penal Provisions for Insider Trading. A person who abuses inside information must be punished by law by a prison sentence of up to three years and, if the benefit gained exceeds €50,000, by a prison sentence of six months to five years.[218]

A person who is not an insider and takes advantage of inside information that he is informed of or learns of in any other manner with the intention to gain a pecuniary benefit for himself or herself or a third party must be punished by law to a prison sentence of not more than one year or to a fine of not more than 360 times the daily fine rate as set by the court, but if the pecuniary benefit gained exceeds €50,000, the punishment must be a prison sentence of up to three years.[219]

Penal Provisions for Market Manipulation. Any person engaged in market manipulation — unless the act is a criminal offense punishable under the jurisdiction of the courts — must be deemed to commit an infraction of administrative law and must be punishable by the FMA by a fine of up to €150,000. The Administrative Offenses Act must apply. Any attempt also is punishable by law. Any pecuniary benefit gained from such acts must be declared void by the FMA.[220]

Member States. The provisions regarding abuse of inside information and market manipulation do not apply to trading in own shares in the form of 'buy-back' programs or price stabilization measures provided such transactions are carried out in accordance with Commission Regulation 2273/2003/EC.[221]

Traders, Trading Rules, and Trading Systems

Traders

Pursuant to article 32 of the Stock Exchange Act, official brokers (Sensale) are the officially appointed self-employed intermediaries of the exchange.[222] If the conclusion of dealings is not executed exclusively by the automated trading system, the FMA must appoint an adequate number of official brokers.[223] Prior to appointments, a public announcement of the vacant official broker position must be published in the Official Gazette of the Wiener Zeitung and in the organ of the exchange.

223 Stock Exchange Act, art 32, para 2.

All appointments require the approval of the state governor (Landeshauptmann).[224] Official brokers may be appointed in general for all types (pursuant to article 35, paragraph 1) or for specific types of intermediary dealings. The FMA must issue the official broker an appointment decree, which identifies the appointed exchange and the scope of such appointment. Subsequent to an appointment, the appointed exchange's competent Chamber of Commerce and Industries must be informed. In addition, the appointment must be announced in the Official Gazette of the Wiener Zeitung and in the organ of the Stock Exchange. The Stock Exchange Act provides that in order to become an official broker, a person must:

- Be at least 24 years of age;
- Have full legal capacity;
- Have successfully passed the official broker examination; and
- If the official broker is appointed for the securities exchange (Wertpapierbörse), have at least three years of experience in the field as an official broker's assistant or as an employee of a non-official broker; or
- If the official broker is appointed for the commodity exchange (Warenbörse), have at least five years of professional experience in a relevant line of business or be a judicially certified expert for such industry.[225]

Official brokers are granted various rights, such as the right to mediate contracts for negotiable instruments, as well as for the admissible auxiliary transactions concluded on the exchange.[226] Additionally, official brokers are entitled to a brokerage (broker's fee) for such completed transactions.[227] However, they are not permitted to mediate such deals in securities during stock exchange trading hours, unless the securities are quoted on the Official List of the Official Market of the Exchange. Furthermore, exchange brokers for the Commodity Exchange are entitled to render expert opinions as standard practice in their industry.[228]

Although official brokers enjoy various rights and duties, ie, the right and duty to fix the official exchange price, there are some restrictions that apply.[229] Official brokers must be present on the exchange during the entire trading period to keep records, or must provide written notice to the Exchange Commissioner and the Stock Exchange who must act as the official broker's representative.[230] Official brokers are under a duty to execute the transactions entrusted to them with the proper care of registered commercial businesspersons. They must avoid any activities which may damage their integrity in regards to their impartiality, the credibility of the prices they determine, or the certificates they issue.[231]

The official broker's activities must be 'supervised by the Stock Exchange, which in particular has the right to look into all the books of the broker for this purpose'.[232] Official brokers are appointed for an indefinite period of time. Upon request of the Stock Exchange, the FMA must remove the official broker for various reasons. Some examples include, but are not limited to, when he commits certain offences or when he has reached the age of 65 at the end of the year.[233]

The allotment of the negotiable instruments to the individual non-official brokers (freier Makler) must be done by the Stock Exchange with their agreement, and may be revoked at any time after hearing the representatives of the interest group of the non-official brokers if there is such a representative on the exchange concerned.[234] Furthermore, the Stock Exchange must appoint a non-official broker from among its members, if required to do so under article 56, paragraph 1; such appointees must act as intermediaries for the purpose of article 56, paragraph 4.[235] Additionally, if admitted by the Stock Exchange, the non-official brokers must be authorized to conduct the banking activities in accordance with article 1, paragraph 1, number 7, of the Banking Act with either other credit institutions licensed to perform the activities, as referred to in article 2, paragraph 23, of the Banking Act or investment firms pursuant to article 4, paragraph 1, of Council Directive 2004/39/EC. Non-official brokers may not engage in banking conduct beyond this scope; hence, they cannot officially fix exchange prices.[236]

The right to trade on the exchange must be obtained through entering an agreement with the Stock Exchange. Provided the applicant satisfies all the legal requirements, the Stock Exchange will be held under obligation to contract. Traders are physical persons who have been admitted as traders to the exchange by the Stock Exchange, and are authorized to place orders and to close dealings on behalf of members on the exchange or within the trading system.[237] To be admitted as a trader to the exchange, the applicant must fulfill the following conditions:

- The person must be a physical person and a member of the exchange;
- The person must either belong to the management of a member; or

- The person must be employed by the management of one of the members.[238]

Furthermore, they must meet the requirements provided in article 14 of the Stock Exchange Act (see text, above). Note, admission grounded in the first and third items, above, requires that the person have adequate experience and qualifications to participate in Stock Exchange trading, so that he will not disrupt trading.[239]

Trading Rules

Austrian law does not provide many specific rules for the offering of securities to the public except the obligation of the offeror of listed, as well as unlisted, securities to publish a prospectus at least one day before the offering begins. According to the Capital Market Act, this prospectus must be examined and signed by one of the credit institutions or associations referenced in article 8, paragraph 2, of the Capital Market Act.

Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings

Shareholder Duties. A person who intends to directly or indirectly possess a qualified share in a stock exchange is required to inform the FMA where general commodity exchanges are involved. This notification must be transcribed identifying the amount of the stake and submitted prior to acquisition of the shares.

Furthermore, any person determined to gain more volume in a qualified share in a stock exchange to an amount that will result in reaching or surpassing the limits of 20 per cent, 33 per cent, or 50 per cent of the voting rights or the company's capital, or where the relevant company becomes a subsidiary of the person, must submit written notice to the FMA prior to the procurement. When general commodity exchanges are involved, such notice must be delivered to the Federal Ministry of Economics and Labor (Bundesministerium für Wirtschaft, Forschung und Wissenschaft) prior to acquisition. The shareholder is required to submit written notification of any acquisition or divestiture of shares resulting in stakes falling below or surpassing the shareholding allowance, to the relative competent body.[240]

Persons who, directly or indirectly, acquire or sell holdings in a stock corporation admitted to trading on a regulated market are obliged to immediately, but at the latest within two business days of the relevant event, inform the FMA, the shares' issuer, and the Stock Exchange, about the voting rights held following the completed transaction, if as a result their proportion of voting rights held reaches, exceeds, or drops below four per cent, five per cent,

10 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent, 30 per cent, 35 per cent, 40 per cent, 45 per cent, 50 per cent, 75 per cent, and 90 per cent.[241]

The obligations stated above must apply only with respect to issuers for which Austria is the home member state and vis-à-vis the exchange operating company only if the securities of the issuer have been admitted to listing on a regulated market of the exchange operating company. The period of two trading days runs as of the day following the day on which the person gains knowledge of the relevant transaction or on which the person should have gained knowledge of the circumstances, regardless of the actual date of such transaction or when the power to exercise such voting rights are realized, or has been notified of the calculated percentages of the voting rights.[242] This requirement does not apply if the acquisition or sale is effected in the course of securities dealings business conducted by credit institutions and other investment services providers.[243]

Company Duties. Once the issuer receives official notice that there is a considerable change in the proportions of voting rights in a stock corporation, in respect to figures previously published, such issuer is required to immediately, but at the latest within two business days from the receipt of notice, disclose all the information included in the notification.[244]

If the shares also are quoted on a foreign exchange, at least such information must be published as is given to the public in the country where this foreign exchange is located. If the company fails to publish such information, the FMA must make it public at the expense of the company.

Supervisory Power of the FMA. The FMA is responsible for supervising compliance with the relevant provisions set forth in article 48a–f of the Stock Exchange Act.[245] For this purpose, the FMA has certain rights, ie, conduct investigations, inspect the results of telecommunication surveillance, order the Stock Exchange to suspend trading in a financial instrument, and issue a ban on accused persons from exercising their profession, in addition to the authority to impose fines.[246]

Every year, the FMA must send to ESMA a summary of the information on all administrative measures taken and on all sanctions imposed. When the FMA announces administrative measures or a sanction to the public, it must simultaneously inform ESMA.[247] Due to the international financial markets crisis and its impact on domestic regulated markets, Austria has devised a comprehensive and sustainable package of measures for the protection of savings account holders and the strengthening of banks (eg, the IBSG).

The central aspects of the Austrian package address the need for liquidity in the financial sector, set the groundwork for a possible measure to strengthen the equity of banks, provide retroactive safeguards on an individual's deposit from 1 October 2008, and include a rule of the speculative short selling of securities.

Speculative Short Selling of Securities. According to articles 5 to 10 of Regulation 236/2012 of the European Parliament and the Council of 14 March 2012 on short selling and certain aspects of Credit Default Swaps (SSR), significant net short positions on shares, sovereign debts, and uncovered positions in sovereign Credit Default Swaps (CDS) must be reported to the relevant competent authority.

Trading Systems

Electronic Trading Systems. Electronic trading systems are only available to Stock Exchange members. The two trading systems used in Austria are:

- Xetra® for cash market securities; and
- Eurex® for derivatives.

Xetra® (Exchange Electronic Trading) is the electronic trading system of the Deutsche Börse, which was introduced to the Austrian exchange in November 1999. Xetra® provides various services, such as trading periods with only one auction, continuous trading with numerous auctions, and a continuous auction. During the trading procedure known as an auction, there is a specific time at which the liquidity available in a security is concentrated.[248] Auction schedules are published, so that market participants may know when specific securities will be called. Auctions are comprised of three phases:

- The call phase (Aufrufphase);
- The price determination phase (Preisermittlungsphase); and
- The order book balancing phase (Marktausgleichsphase).[249]

The order book is opened during the call phase of stocks being traded, at which time a preliminary, tentative price is quoted (price determination phase). Auction prices are fixed by determining the price that will actualize the largest volume of orders, while minimizing the amount of orders left unfilled. Orders which cannot be traded in the price determination phase are offered in the order book balancing phase.

Continuous trading begins immediately after the opening auction is closed. The electronic order book juxtaposes the purchase and sale orders. This order book and display remain open during continuous trading, thus allowing market participants to view aggregate purchase orders adjacent from applicable limits. Once the limit is reached, the orders are automatically processed. This type of trading procedure offers benefits, such as closing trades without waiting for an auction and a guarantee from the firm that quotes are continuously entered into the system; continuous input of quotes increases liquidity of the market. Continuous trading has the following types of orders:

- Limit order;
- Market order;
- Stop order (stop market order and stop limit order);
- 'Iceberg' order (minimum overall quantity of 1,000 and minimum peak quantity of 100); and
- Market-to-limit order.[250]

Continuous auctions transpire throughout the trading day, comprising of three phases: the pre-trading phase, the main trading phase, and the post-trading phase. The end of one phase automatically triggers the beginning of the next. An auction has two phases, the pre-call or an optional call phase and the price determination phase. Prior to the start of the price determination phase, all market participants may continue to enter, change, or delete orders; exchange members acting as liquidity providers; or may enter or delete quotas during this time. The available types of orders are the limit orders, market orders, and stop orders. These orders are subject to order restrictions.

On 26 April 2010, the Eurex® trading system replaced OMex®. Eurex® is used to trade derivative products (financial futures contracts and options). Trading is executed exclusively through continuous trading, which begins with the pre-opening phase. During the first phase, orders and quotes may be entered, modified, or deleted. The system uses this information along with the information entered from the previous day to determine an opening price. The next phase is the price determination, called netting, which only takes seconds.

There is only one determined price each trading session. Immediately following netting, the continuous trading begins. The order book remains open in this phase and, as each order is placed, the system automatically checks to see if it can be filled against existing orders.[251] All trading through this system is anonymous, even after the trade is confirmed. The orders are filled according to a price and time priority. In contrast to Xetra®, all order sizes can be placed through Eurex®. The following types of orders are available:

- Limit order;
- Market order;
- Stop order (only for futures); and
- One-cancel-the-other-order (only for futures).[252]

Off-Market Transactions. Off-market transactions can be carried out by Stock Exchange members, ie, between credit institutions. Even the securities listed on the official or unlisted securities market may be traded off the floor. Exchange members do not have the duty to trade listed securities exclusively on the stock market.

Additionally, credit institutions have the possibility to adjust buy-and-sell offers sent to them by different clients themselves, or to sell their own securities to a bidder-client. Nevertheless, such off-floor trades must be reported to the Stock Exchange by the exchange members on every exchange trading day.[253]

Members who deal in officially listed securities off the exchange also must publish these turnovers in an official bulletin, unless bonds and other forms of secured debt, block transactions, or highly illiquid instruments are concerned. For the purpose of insider dealing investigations, off-floor trades also must be reported according to article 64, paragraph 1, of the Securities Supervision Act 2007.

Jurisdictional Conflicts

In General

Although jurisdictional conflicts are likely to occur in the global securities business, effective multilateral solutions are often lacking. The EU and the EEA have established systems of procedural management of jurisdictional conflicts, as well as substantive law solutions.

An increasing number of EU Directives and Regulations will ensure the harmonization of national regulations and help to avoid international delinquency in securities business. Austrian law lays down specific rules for jurisdictional conflicts concerning contracts in general in the Rome I Regulation,[254] which replaced (together with the Rome II Regulation[255]) the Rome Convention of 1980 in the year 2009, as well as transactions concluded at stock exchanges in the International Private Law Act (Internationales Privatrechts-Gesetz, IPRG).

Multilateral Approaches

Substantive Law Solutions

The Rome Convention of 1980, which was signed by all members of the EU, provided for solutions of jurisdictional conflicts for contract law in general, but obligations resulting from the negotiable character of instruments were not included. The Rome Convention stated the freedom of the contracting parties to choose the law governing their contractual relationship or single aspects of the contract.

As mentioned above, the Rome Convention was replaced by two Regulations: the Rome I Regulation, effective as of 17 December 2009, and the Rome II Regulation, effective as of 11 January 2009. The Rome I Regulation stipulates the law applicable on contractual obligations arising from all contracts with EU member states, with the exception of Denmark, concluded after 17 December 2009.

Concerning all contracts concluded before this date, the Rome Convention of 1980 is still applicable. According to the Rome I Convention, the contractual parties are still free to choose the applicable law with an exception regarding the facts which are only domestic (Inlandssachverhalte).

Regarding those facts, the contractual parties may not choose a foreign law in order to avoid obligatory domestic provisions. The Rome II Regulation stipulates the law applicable to non-contractual obligations, such as unjust enrichment (ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung), culpa in contrahendo (Verschuldens bei Vertragsverhandlungen), and unfair competition (unlauterer Wettbewerb).

Procedural Solutions

In 2002, the Council Regulation on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (EUGVVO)[256] came into effect and replaced the Brussels Convention on the recognition and 254 Regulation (EC) 593/2008 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 June 2008 on the law applicable to contractual obligations (Rome I).

255 Regulation (EC) 864/2007 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 July 2007 on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II).

256 Council Regulation (EC) 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters.

enforcement of judgments (except for Denmark, which entered into force on 1 July 2007). The EFTA States signed the nearly identical Lugano Convention (convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters) so that, in effect, there is one regulatory system for all EU and EFTA member states.

According to the regulations, parties have the freedom to submit to a jurisdiction of their choice (in cases of non-exclusive jurisdiction). If the submission agreement between the parties has not been expressed clearly or if such an agreement does not exist, the general rules apply. A person must be sued in his country of residence and legal entities must be sued in the country of their registered office. A party to a contract also may be sued in the country that is determined to be the place of performance. The Council Regulation and the two conventions state a number of detailed provisions for the determination of the jurisdiction in special cases, but securities transactions are not specifically mentioned.

In procedures concerning the validity of the constitution, dissolution of a company, or decisions of the administrative organs, the country where the company has its registered office has exclusive jurisdiction. If the validity of entries in official books or registers is concerned, the exclusive jurisdiction is conferred to the country where the books or registers are kept. Proceedings regarding the enforcement of judgments always must be conducted at the courts of the state where the judgment concerned was made.

Unilateral Approaches

The IPRG regulates the determination of the governing law in Austria. In general, parties are free to agree on the law of any country as governing law if the application of that law by Austrian courts does not violate the public order. When there is no such agreement, contracts are governed by the law of the country where the party whose performance is non-monetary resides or has its registered office.

In the case of contracts that create duties for only one party, ie, donations, the law of that country applies where the obliged party resides or has its registered office. Banking contracts are governed by the law of the country where the credit institution has its registered office. If both of the parties are credit institutions, the law of the country where the instructed credit institution is seated applies. Transactions concluded on a stock exchange or on a market are governed by the law of the country where the stock exchange or the market is situated.

Institutional Framework and Organisation of Regulated Markets

Legal Framework

The Law of 6 April 1995 on Secondary Markets, the Status and Supervision of Investment Firms, Intermediaries, and Advisers implemented the European Community (EC) Directive 93/22/EEC of 10 May 1993 on investment services in the securities field (the 'Investment Services Directive') and the EC Directive on the capital adequacy of investment firms and credit institutions (the 'Capital Adequacy Directive'). The Law of 6 April 1995 amended the Law of 4 December 1990 on Financial Transactions and Financial Markets, which itself constituted a general overhaul of the legal framework of Belgian securities legislation. The Law of 6 April 1995 implemented the EC Directives and restructured Belgian financial markets to enhance their competitiveness with other European markets. Two important new concepts were introduced into Belgian law, namely:

- The concept of 'financial instrument'; and
- The notion of 'regulated market'.[1]

In general, financial instruments can be traded on a stock exchange or another financial market, and they can enter into the scope of the so-called 'European passport' (mutual recognition). However, not all instruments can effectively be traded on a stock exchange. Instruments that naturally cannot be traded on an exchange include over-the-counter instruments such as swaps and forward-rate agreements. Categories of financial instruments which are already listed on a stock exchange may only be traded on another stock exchange or financial market with the approval of the body responsible for the management of the market on which the financial instrument is already traded (eg, options traded on Belfox will not be listed on the Brussels Stock Exchange). The following instruments are considered financial instruments:

- Shares, bonds, warrants, and inscription rights;
- Participations in collective investment undertakings;
- Money market instruments (eg, treasury bills, commercial paper, and billets de trésorerie);
- Financial futures contracts, including equivalent cash-settled instruments;
- Forward interest rate agreements;
- Interest rate, currency, and equity swaps; and
- Options to acquire or dispose of any instruments mentioned above, including equivalent cash-settled instruments and options on currency and on interest rates.

This list is clearly based on section B of the Annex to the Investment Services Directive. However, the general notion of 'transferable securities' is not being adopted. As the notion of 'securities' is frequently used in Belgian company and financial law (eg, in the take-over legislation), the omission of this notion in a general definition is to be regretted. A regulated Belgian market is a market of financial instruments which functions regularly, whose organisation and operation is regulated, and which appears on the list of regulated markets established by the Belgian Minister of Finance. This list is published and communicated to the other European Union (EU) member states and to the European Commission. The Ministerial Decree of 3 May 1996, as amended, provides a list of the regulated Belgian markets, as of 31 December 1997, namely:

- The first market, the secondary market, and the EURO.NM market of the Brussels Stock Exchange;
- The Belgian futures and options market, known as Belfox;
- The secondary off-market of public debt instruments; and
- The European Association of Securities Dealers Automated Quotation, known as Belfox.

This notion is based on article 1.13 of the Investment Services Directive. Article 7 of the Law of 6 April 1995 defines a stock exchange (bourse de valeurs mobilières) as a market where transactions are public and where anyone who so desires may, through an intermediary authorised to act at the exchange, buy or sell financial instruments admitted to that market. The first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange is itself subdivided into different sections according to the nature of the market and instruments traded on the market and the liquidity of the market. In the forward section, transactions are settled every two weeks (quinzaine). This market is specialised in large companies. On the spot market, which is specialised in small and medium-sized companies, settlements take place three days after the transaction. In the public debt instruments section, public debt instruments are traded which have been issued by the Belgian state, regional authorities, their subdivisions or other public authorities.

Legal Form, Shareholding, and Membership in the Brussels Stock Exchange

Legal Form

The Brussels Stock Exchange is organised by the Stock Exchange Corporation of Brussels, which is a co-operative corporation with limited liability.[2] This company, like any other company, is governed by the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies. It also is governed by its articles of association and the Law of 6 April 1995 to such an extent that the latter provisions will prevail over the 'general' rules of the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies.

The Brussels Stock Exchange has a somewhat hybrid form. An example of this is the distinction between shareholder and member. It is a commercial company, subject to the rules of company law and, therefore, has corporate bodies, internal operational rules as a company, and articles of association. At the same time, it is a regulated market in which members have access to the market and, as such, it is legally organised by the regulations of the Brussels Stock Exchange approved by the Royal Decree of 16 February 1996 and the market regulations of the Brussels Stock Exchange approved by the Ministerial Decree of 16 April 1996. The effects of this hybrid organisation of the Brussels Stock Exchange will be felt throughout the operation and control of the Brussels Stock Exchange as, for example, in the respective roles of the Board of Directors and the Management Committee.

It is expected that the Brussels Stock Exchange will merge with the Belgian options and futures market BELFOX and with the Interprofessionele Effectendeposito- en Girokas NV/Caisse Interprofessionnelle de Dépôts et de Virements de Titres SA, known as the CIK. The CIK is the central depository in Belgium for fungible securities that can be given in custody with the CIK and traded by book entries on accounts of affiliates held in the books of the CIK. In the future, the CIK also will do the clearing of all dematerialised and fungible securities issued by private (as opposed to public or state-related) issuers.

Shareholders and Members of the Stock Exchange Corporation

Before 1 January 1996, the date on which the largest part of the Law of 6 April 1995 entered into force, only stock brokerage firms could become members of the Brussels Stock Exchange. In addition, no distinction was made between the status of membership in the Stock Exchange and the status of shareholder. Under the Law of 6 April 1995, a distinction was made between the status of member and the status of shareholder. To be able to do their business, stockbrokerage firms are still compelled to become shareholders in the Stock Exchange Corporation. This also is applies to other investment firms which are licensed to carry out transactions in financial instruments for their own account or for the account of certain categories of clients.

Financial institutions can become full shareholders of the Stock Exchange Corporation as well as becoming members of the Exchange. This is new as, before 1996, they had no direct access to the exchange. As a consequence of this rule, all major Belgian credit institutions owned and controlled a stockbrokerage firm to gain access, however indirect, to the Stock Exchange. The membership of the markets or market sections is now open to:

- Licensed Belgian or European Union investment firms;
- Licensed branches of third-country investment firms;
- Belgian and European Union credit institutions (licensed to carry out transactions in financial instruments for their own account or for the account of certain categories of clients); and
- Branches of third-country credit institutions.

In theory, shareholding and membership of the Stock Exchange should be two different things. However, the regulations of the Brussels Stock Exchange, approved by the Royal Decree of 16 February 1996, provide that, to become a member of the Stock Exchange, Belgian credit institutions must become shareholders of the Stock Exchange Corporation. This enables the Stock Exchange to gain a sufficient capital base. This rule is not applicable to foreign, non-Belgian members.[3] However, only foreign institutions from European Union member states can become members of the Stock Exchange on the basis of a remote membership. Financial intermediaries of other states must be established in Belgium to become a member. This rule is justified on the basis of the difficulty of controlling these institutions as, for these institutions, the home-country-control rule is not relevant.

To avoid conflicts of interest, companies whose securities are listed on one of the market sections of the Brussels Stock Exchange may not become shareholders of the Stock Exchange Corporation. The admission of new shareholders and the revocation and resignation of existing shareholders is decided by the Board of Directors.

Corporate Bodies of the Stock Exchange

The powers of the general meeting of the Stock Exchange Corporation are the traditional powers of a general meeting in a commercial company. These powers are laid down in the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies and the articles of association of the Corporation. However, these powers have become somewhat eroded since the president and vice-president of the Stock Exchange are nominated by the King;[4] No shareholder may vote in the general meeting for more than 10 per cent of the total voting rights, even if his shareholding in the Stock Exchange Corporation is greater than 10 per cent.

The general policy of the Brussels Stock Exchange is determined by the Board of Directors (previously known as the Stock Exchange Commission, or Commission de la Bourse). The Board of Directors also controls the Management Committee within the framework of the general policy and budget. In addition, it determines the annual contribution of the members (traditionally a prerogative of the general meeting of the Stock Exchange), and it proposes amendments to the articles of association of the Corporation as well as giving advice to the company (although, in matters for which the Management Committee is responsible in its capacity as market authority, the opinion of the Management Committee also is taken into account). The mission of the Board of Directors also includes proposing to the Minister of Finance the appointment or dismissal of the members of the Management Committee.

4 Law of 6 April 1995, art 14; in Belgian company law, it is a traditional privilege of the general meeting to nominate the directors of a commercial company.

The Management Committee is responsible for the general management of the Stock Exchange Corporation within the framework of the general policy and budget determined by the Board of Directors and the delegations made by the Board of Directors. At the same time, and totally independent of its more general functions, it acts as a (new) market authority which is independent of the Stock Exchange Corporation. In this capacity it is responsible for the organisation of the Brussels Stock Exchange and the monitoring of the different markets. As such, the Management Committee is responsible, for example, for:

- The acceptation, suspension, and cancellation of financial instruments to the listing;[5]
- The admission of new members to the Brussels Stock Exchange;[6] and
- The revocation of membership.

It also is responsible for the organisation of a clearing and settlement system for transactions concluded on or outside the markets of the Stock Exchange in respect of financial instruments listed on a market of the Stock Exchange.[7] The monitoring of the markets also includes the publication of daily information on transactions and volumes executed on the market. In its capacity as autonomous market authority, the Management Committee is an administrative authority with independent controlling and investigation powers.

Supervision and Control of the Brussels Stock Exchange

Management Committee

In addition to its responsibilities relating to market organisation and the monitoring of the market (as described above), in its role as autonomous market authority, the Management Committee is responsible for the first-line control of the market. Here, the Management Committee has extensive supervisory, monitoring, and investigative powers in relation to the members of the Stock Exchange.[8] The Management Committee monitors the integrity of the market, the transparency of the information, and the compulsory disclosure of occasional sensitive information. The Management Committee also is charged with monitoring and ensuring that the financial intermediaries active on the market respect the rules of the market and the Law of 6 April 1995. It also monitors compliance with the rules on insider trading.

5 Law of 6 April 1995, art 17.
6 Law of 6 April 1995, art 17; Stock Exchange Regulations, arts 54 et seq.
7 This responsibility has been delegated to the Settlement Co-operative (Coopérative de Liquidation des Marchés).
8 Law of 6 April 1995, arts 20 and 21.

As stated above, the Management Committee has extensive supervisory, monitoring, and investigative powers. According to article 20 of the Law of 6 April 1995, the Management Committee may gain access to all documents and copy all documents they consider relevant for the investigation. It has the right to obtain any relevant information and can question any officer or employee of a financial intermediary (member of the exchange). The market authority may ask any question that, in its opinion, is reasonable and useful; it has the right to require all information and/or records to be supplied; and it may visit the financial intermediary member of the Stock Exchange, where it has full access to all documents and records. It may consult with other market authorities and exchange information. It may adopt measures of intervention to halt those activities that go against the rules of the Exchange. The relevant market authority has the same powers over foreign member institutions active on the market as it has over Belgian members. The question whether Belgian law applies or not depends on the relevant regulated market (whether a Belgian-regulated market or not).

The Management Committee can order the financial intermediary to immediately halt certain practices which go against the regulations of the exchange, for example, when such practices falsify the functioning of the market, thus giving unfair advantage to those involved, jeopardising the equal treatment of the investors and of the information which must be disclosed to shareholders and investors, and giving an advantage to issuers or investors by manipulations or other practices which are contrary to their professional obligations.

The Management Committee can take disciplinary sanctions against members of the exchange who do not co-operate in an investigation or with the Management Committee. These disciplinary sanctions can range from a warning or reprimand to the suspension of a member for a maximum period of six months from one or more markets on which it is active, and it can go so far as the revocation of the member from one or more markets on which it is active. Administrative sanctions (fines) also are possible.

Banking and Finance Commission

The Banking and Finance Commission (Commissie voor Bank — en Financierveren / Commission Bancaire et Financière) is responsible for the second-line supervision of the regulated markets. With respect to the Brussels Stock Exchange, this supervisory duty comprises supervising the administrative organisation of the Board of Directors and the Management Committee, monitoring the procedures necessary for these entities to carry out their tasks, and supervising the manner in which the procedures are complied with.

One important task of this second-line supervisory body is supervising the manner in which the Management Committee carries out its duty as market authority. If the Banking and Finance Commission is of the opinion that the Board of Directors or the Managing Board are not fulfilling their duties in a satisfactory manner, it has the option of setting a time period within which the situation must be rectified. If the situation is not rectified within the given time, the case may be submitted to the Ministry of Finance.

Ministry of Finance

The Ministry of Finance is the controller of last resort. The Ministry of Finance may take any measures it considers necessary to remedy the situation, including recommendations on the situation, suspension of the decisions, and the dismissal of defaulting members of the Management Committee.[9]

Commission of Appeal

An appeal may be lodged against any decision of the Management Committee with the Commission of Appeal.

Belgian Offering and Listing Regulations

Application of Belgian Law

Irrespective of its nationality, any company requiring a listing on a Belgian official exchange or making a public offering in Belgium must adhere to the Belgian listing requirements or the Belgian local offering laws, respectively. A quotation on EASDAQ and EURO.NM Belgium is not an admission to the official listing of a stock exchange but is rather based on the concept of a public offering of securities. Likewise, such admission to trading will not trigger the application of listing regulations but instead the application of public offering laws.[10]

Belgian Public Offering Laws

In General

Public offerings of securities in Belgium are regulated under Belgian law and supervised by the Banking and Finance Commission.

Issue of Securities

The core of the Belgian legislation lies in articles 26 et seq of Royal Decree Number 185 of 9 July 1935. The Banking and Finance Commission adheres to a broad interpretation as to what operations fall within the scope of this Decree. Any public offering of securities, public issue, or exchange, and any listing on a Belgian official exchange or other public market falls within the scope of application of the Decree. Judicial public sales or public sales ordered by Stock Exchange Authorities are excluded.

9 Law of 6 April 1995, art 5.

10 It also will have an impact on the type of prospectus that must be established in case of admission of securities to trading on EASDAQ or EURO.NM.

Offer in Belgium

The offer (or issue or exchange) must take place within Belgium. This is a factual circumstance. The nationality both of offeror and of recipient are irrelevant for this criterion. What is relevant is the question as to whether the offer has been made on Belgian territory. It goes without saying that (public) offers through new media such as the Internet pose considerable problems with respect to this criterion.

When an offer is made simultaneously in Belgium and abroad, the issuer must take the different national legislation into consideration. Under certain circumstances, a prospectus made in Belgium by application of the relevant Belgian regulation can benefit from a mutual recognition in another EU member state.

Public Character of Offer

The most important question in relation to the scope of application of Royal Decree Number 185 is the question as to the public character of the offer. The public character of the offer of securities will be determined by the Royal Decree of 9 January 1991 on the public character of transactions involving public appeal to savings and the qualification of certain operations as public offerings. According to this regulation, an offer is public:

- When use is made of any means of publicity or advertising of whatever nature aimed at the public in Belgium to announce or recommend the offering;[11]
- When one relies on a professional intermediary in Belgium, or when such a professional intermediary intervenes in the public offering; and
- When more than 50 different persons are solicited in Belgium.

There are three exemptions to the public offering qualification, which exempt the offering from the regulations applicable to public offerings as soon as one of the following conditions is met, namely:

- When the offering is subject to a minimum investment of BEF 10 million per investor;[12]
- When the offering is targeted only at professional investors acting for their own account (eg, pension funds, investment funds, and insurance companies); and
- When the acquisition of the financial instruments thus offered is a condition for the exercise of a profession or is necessary for the exercise of such profession.

11 The following are deemed to be means of publicity or advertising: the spreading of information in the press or in publications or on the radio, television, or any other audio-visual support; the spreading of circulars or any other printed documents concerning the offering, including materials sent personally to the recipients (direct mail); and the spreading of information by way of telephone campaigns (cold calling) or by the use of a system of electronic information.

12 Note that, with the introduction of the Euro in Belgium, this sum will be replaced by Euro 250,000.

Furthermore, exemptions exist for securities issued by the Belgian state and the regional authorities, for the public sale or auction of instruments ordered by court or organised periodically by the Management Committee of the stock exchange, and for the public offering of Eurobonds. The Royal Decree of 9 January 1991 is currently under review. The basic choices made in the Decree will probably remain. The main improvement is the introduction of the notion of 'institutional investor'. An offer of securities made only to institutional investors, even if made to more than 50 of them, is not treated as a public offer, but rather retains its private character.

Notification of the Banking and Finance Commission

A person having the intention to publicly issue, to offer securities for sale, or to call on public savings to subscribe to a capital increase in Belgium must notify the Commission Bancaire et Financière at least one month in advance.[13] Together with this notification, the person also must submit a file containing:

- A draft prospectus;[14]
- The reasons for the call on public savings;
- The conditions of the underwriting;
- A detailed summary of the participations held in the issuer by those who have informed the Commission Bancaire et Financière; and
- Other elements which the Commission Bancaire et Financière deems necessary to be adequately informed of the conditions and reasons of the transaction.

The Commission Bancaire et Financière has one month to approve the prospectus. In case approval is refused, it is possible to appeal the decision to the Minister of Finance. The decision can be annulled by the Council of State. The Commission Bancaire et Financière has the possibility of recommending a reduction of the number of securities offered when it thinks that the proposed offering can destabilise the capital markets. The prospectus must include a notice that the approval of the prospectus by the Commission Bancaire et Financière does not imply any evaluation as to the opportunity or the quality of the operation.[15]

The approved prospectus must be rendered public at least three banking days before the closing of the subscription period and at the latest on the day of the opening of the subscription.[16] If the issuer is a Belgian company, the prospectus must be made available to the public at its registered office and at the financial institutions that will be its paying agents. Any new fact occurring after the approval of the prospectus by the Commission Bancaire et Financière, but before the closing of the transaction which could influence the public's decision, must be disclosed under the form of an amendment to the prospectus. If this is not done, the Commission Bancaire et Financière can suspend the public transaction.[17]

Requirements Imposed on Non-Belgian Issuers

Specific rules of Belgian company law and stock exchange law apply to non-Belgian issuers. Article 199 of the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies provides that a public issue, an offer for sale, or a tender and sale of securities of foreign companies and the inclusion of such securities in an official listing of a stock exchange must be preceded by the filing for deposit of the instruments of incorporation of such companies at the clerk's office of the Commercial Court and will be subject to the regulations on public issues, offers for sale, and tender sales and inclusion of securities in an official listing applicable in Belgium. Any foreign company whose securities are included on the official list of a stock exchange must file its instruments for deposit at the clerk's office of the Commercial Court and its annual account with the National Bank of Belgium. The securities of companies which do not observe these obligations are not permitted to maintain a stock exchange listing. Article 199 of the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies applies to all non-Belgian issuers.

A company which does not belong to one of the member states of the EU and which desires to issue securities, to publicly sell securities, to engage in a take-over bid with respect to Belgian securities, or to list its securities on a Belgian stock exchange is required to file with the clerk of any Belgian commercial court the constitutional documents of the issuer and to seek the approval of the Belgian Ministry of Finance.[18] For the prospectus requirements, reference should be made to the Royal Decree of 31 October 1991 and, more importantly, to the Royal Decree of 14 November 1991 on the mutual recognition within the EU of public offerings prospectuses and of prospectuses for the admission of securities to official stock exchange listings.

Listing Regulations

The Prospectus

Any demand for a listing of securities on the primary or secondary market of the Brussels Stock Exchange or an admission to trading on the EURO.NM (Brussels) market of the Brussels Stock Exchange must be made to the Commission Bancaire et Financière at least one month in advance.[19] This demand is in itself a public issue. Therefore, a prospectus is necessary. In the case of the secondary market and the EURO.NM, a public offering prospectus is necessary. For a listing on the first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange, the prospectus must comply with the requirements of the Royal Decree of 18 September 1990. For foreign companies, reference should be made to the Royal Decree of 14 November 1991 on the mutual recognition within the European Community of public offerings prospectuses and of prospectuses for the admission of securities to official stock exchange listings. Reference also should be made to the Royal Decree of 13 February 1996, which establishes a method for accelerating the procedure for the approval of the admission prospectus.

The prospectus must be submitted to the Commission Bancaire et Financière. If the admission at the Stock Exchange is not accompanied by a public issue, the approved prospectus must be rendered public at least one day before the admission at the Stock Exchange becomes effective. If the admission at the Stock Exchange is accompanied by a public issue, the prospectus must be rendered public three banking days before the closing of the subscription period and at the latest the day of the opening of the subscription. For the prospectus requirements, reference should be made to the Royal Decree of 31 October 1991 and, more importantly, to the Royal Decree of 14 November 1991 on the mutual recognition within the EU of public offerings prospectuses and of prospectuses for the admission of securities to official stock exchange listings.

Request to the Management Committee of the Stock Exchange

The applicable rules and regulations for companies whose securities are (to be) listed on the first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange can be found in the Law of 6 April 1995 on Secondary Markets, the Status and Supervision of Investment Firms, Intermediaries and Advisers and the Royal Decree of 22 December 1995 on the admission of financial instruments on the first markets of the Stock Exchange.

In addition to the procedure before the Commission Bancaire et Financière in view of the approval of the prospectus, the company whose securities will be admitted to the first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange also should remit a file to the Management Committee (comité de direction) of the Brussels Stock Exchange. The file should contain the draft prospectus, the articles of association of the issuer, proof that the securities have already been admitted to a Stock Exchange of another member state of the EU (should such be the case), an undertaking of the financial intermediary declaring that it is acting as paying agent for the securities, and a copy of the annual accounts for the last three years. Additional information may be requested by the Management Committee of the Exchange. The Commission Bancaire et Financière also must be informed of any request of listing of securities on the Exchange. The Exchange must respond within two months to the issuer's request for admission to the first market of the Stock Exchange.

Specific rules apply for non-Belgian companies. Article 199 of the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies provides, inter alia, that the inclusion of securities in an official listing of a Belgian stock exchange must be preceded by the filing for deposit of the instruments of incorporation of such companies at the clerk's office of the Commercial Court. A foreign company, the securities of which are included on the official list of a stock exchange, must file its instruments for deposit at the clerk's office of the Commercial Court and its annual account with the National Bank of Belgium. The securities of companies which do not observe these obligations may not maintain a stock exchange listing. The Belgian Ministry of Finance must approve the listing of securities at a Belgian Stock Exchange of a company which does not belong to one of the member states of the EU and which desires to list its securities on a Belgian stock exchange.[20] Shares issued by a company which is subject to the legislation of a state which is not a member state of the EU and whose shares are not listed in its home country, can only be admitted to the first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange on the condition that the Management Committee is assured that the fact that these shares are not listed in its home country is not due to the necessity to protect the investors.[21]

Admission Requirements

In order for a company to have its shares and bonds admitted to the first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange, it is necessary that:

- All formalities required by the Royal Decree of 22 December 1995 and the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies be respected;[22]
- The issuing company, irrespective of its nationality, have complied with all relevant legislation, specifically with respect to its constitution and corporate activities;
- The shares and bonds be freely transferable and tradable;
- In the case of convertible bonds, the underlying shares have been admitted to the first market;
- In the case of shares and bonds, they have been issued but have not yet been admitted to the first market;
- The market value or — if this cannot be ascertained — the company's own funds, inclusive of profits from the previous year, equal at least ECU 1 million;
- In the case of bonds, the loan equals at least ECU 1 million;
- If the listing is requested for shares, the company have published and deposited its annual accounts for the last three years in accordance with the applicable laws; and 20 Law of 4 December 1990 on Financial Transactions and Financial Markets, art 4; such company also is required to file its constitutional documents with the clerk of any Belgian commercial court.

21 Royal Decree of 22 December 1995, art 13 in fine.

22 One of the consequences for a Belgian company of having its securities listed on an official exchange is that the company shall for company law purposes be considered as a company which has made a public offer of securities (article 26) and therefore must respect the specific rules and provisions of the company law with respect to public companies. Article 26, s 2, stipulates that a company limited by shares will be deemed to make or to have made a public offer of its securities if it has made a public offer in Belgium or abroad by way of a public offer to subscribe for, a public offer to sell, a public offer to convert, or an introduction to, the listing on a securities exchange of bonds or securities, whether or not these form part of its capital or voting rights are vested therein, and of securities which give the right to subscribe for or to acquire such securities or to convert such securities. A company which intends to make a first public offer must first change its articles to provide therein that its object permits it to act as a company limited by shares that makes or has made a public offer and, if necessary, to adapt the same to the statutory provisions and regulations applicable to such companies. It must further register with the Banking and Finance Commission.

- The shares and bonds be regularly and continuously traded in one or more member states of the EU or are listed in another state and are regularly and continuously traded there.[23]

Specific admission rules exist for certificates representing shares or bonds which are issued by financial intermediaries, such as fiduciary companies. These rules are similar to the rules applicable in case of the listing of shares and bonds, but have been adapted to the specific situation in which the issuer of the certificates is an intermediary for the company issuing the shares or bonds represented by the certificates. Such certificates are the European equivalent of American Depository Receipts. They are sometimes referred to as International Depository Receipts. They are most frequently issued in Belgium by fiduciaries created by and managed by financial institutions.

Notwithstanding the above criteria, the Managing Committee of the Stock Exchange, under certain circumstances, may depart from these rules. The Managing Committee has relatively significant discretionary power in this respect.[24] Financial instruments for which a listing has been requested also must comply with certain formal requirements (eg, form of the security and of the coupon, height, drawings, and quality of paper).

Once the securities of the company which has made a public offer of its securities[25] are admitted to the first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange, the company must respect certain continuing obligations as to disclosure, as to the payment of fees to the Commission Bancaire et Financière and the Stock Exchange, and with respect to trading rules.

Disclosure Requirements

In General

The main obligation deriving from the fact that a company has made a public offering or that its shares are listed on an official exchange is that to disclose information to the 23 There is a legal assumption that shares or bonds are regularly and continuously traded in one or more member state of the European Union when at least 25 per cent of the shares or bonds belonging to the category for which the listing is requested are held by the public. However, the Management Committee may use other criteria to determine whether the securities are regularly and continuously traded. Furthermore, one should not comply with this condition when the public circulation will occur shortly through the intermediary of the Stock Exchange (Royal Decree of 22 December 1995, art 17).

25 See article 26 of the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies, providing that a company limited by shares will be deemed to make or to have made a public offer of its securities if it has made a public offer in Belgium or abroad by way of a public offer to subscribe for, a public offer to sell, a public offer to convert, or an introduction to, the listing on a securities exchange of bonds or securities, whether or not these form part of its capital or voting rights are vested therein, and of securities which give the right to subscribe for or to acquire such securities or to convert such securities.

public. Some legal commentators go beyond these specific rules and hold that there should be a general obligation of transparency.[26]

Various Disclosure Requirements

When dealing with disclosure, several distinctions must be made. The first distinction exists between the disclosure to be made by the company itself and the disclosure requirements of its shareholders. The latter undertaking is known as the disclosure of major holdings of shares and is based on the Council Directive of 12 December 1988, on the information to be published when a major holding in a listed company is acquired or disposed of.[27] A second distinction regarding financial disclosure must be drawn, on the one hand, between the listing and public offering disclosure, without foregoing the distinction between these two sets of disclosure requirements and, on the other hand, the disclosure of ad hoc and periodical information. As indicated, this distinction itself embodies two further distinctions.

Listing Disclosure and Public Offering Disclosure: Prospectus Requirements

Legal Framework

Both sets of disclosure rules are based on European Directives.[28]

Public Offering Prospectus

The Belgian rules on the public offering prospectus are determined by the Royal Decree of 31 October 1991. Such prospectus applies for any public offering, such as a public capital increase or a public tender, but also when such offer is combined with a request for admission to trading on EURO.NM Belgium. Indeed, similar to the admission to trading on EASDAQ, the admission to trading on EURO.NM Belgium is based on the concept of a public offering of securities. However, where a public offering takes place concurrently with an admission to an official exchange (the first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange), the relevant prospectus to publish should be the listing prospectus.[29] The minimum content of the public offering prospectus is laid down in the

Annexes to the Royal Decree.[30] Some exceptions and specific rules are described in the Royal Decree of 31 October 1991.[31]

Similar to the listing prospectus, the public offering prospectus must contain all elements necessary for the public to have a well-informed opinion on the assets, financial position, performance, and prospects of the issuer. Therefore, the prospectus should contain provisions on the persons under whose responsibility the prospectus has been made and on the control of the accounts. This will normally be respectively the directors and accountants of the issuer. The prospectus also should include details on the securities which will be offered to the public (eg, description of the rights attached to the securities, possible limitations to the free transferability, and tax aspects), and details on the financial institution which will act as paying agent in Belgium, including details on the transaction (nature, purpose, preferential rights of existing shareholders, limitations of such rights, transaction price, method of payment, subscription period, delivery of securities, underwriting conditions, and total net proceeds of the transaction for the issuer). The prospectus also should include general provisions on the issuer and its share capital, its business, activities, and foreseen investments. Details on the financial position and the results of the issuer also must be inserted (eg, balance sheets, consolidated balance sheets, and semi-annual results). Specifications on the management and control of the issuer also must be included in the prospectus.

Specifically for EURO.NM Belgium, the prospectus must contain a business plan which must contain objective data on the market where the issuer is active and information on the position of the issuer on the market. Together with the EURO.NM prospectus, financial notes prepared by the sponsor/market-maker must be submitted. Any new fact that could have an impact on the valuation of the securities which occurs between the moment the prospectus has been approved by the Commission Bancaire et Financière and the closing of the public issue must be disclosed in an addendum of the prospectus. Any addendum to the prospectus, as well as any other communication or other pieces which announce a public issue may only be rendered public after the approval of the Commission Bancaire et Financière.

31 Royal Decree of 31 October 1991, arts 5, 7, 8, and 9.

Listing Prospectus

The Belgian requirements regarding a listing prospectus are laid down in the Royal Decree of 18 September 1990. As stated above, in the case where a public offering of securities takes place at the same time as the listing of the securities, the relevant prospectus to be drawn up is a listing prospectus containing the (minimum) elements described in the Royal Decree of 18 September 1990. Depending on the nature of the issuer and the securities for which the listing is requested, the listing prospectus must contain all elements that give the investors and their advisors an opinion on the assets, financial position, performance, and prospects of the issuer and the securities.[32]

The minimum content of the prospectus is provided in the annexes to the Royal Decree. The Commission Bancaire et Financière has the possibility within certain limits described in the Royal Decree to grant exceptions to the obligation to make a listing prospectus.[33] This content is similar to the content of the public offering prospectus. The listing prospectus for securities admitted to the first market of the Brussels Stock Exchange must be drawn up in one of the official languages of Belgium (French or Dutch).

Mutual Recognition

The principle of mutual recognition of prospectuses is provided in the Council Directive 80/390/EEC of 17 March 1980, as amended, and Council Directive 89/298/EEC of 17 April 1989. The basic rule is that a public offering prospectus or listing prospectus approved by a competent authority, such as the Commission Bancaire et Financière, of one member state of the EU must be recognised in all other member states of the EU where a public offering is taking place simultaneously. In Belgium, the provisions of the mutual recognition of prospectuses are provided in the Royal Decree of 14 November 1991.[34]

The competent authority in Belgium for mutual recognition is the Commission Bancaire et Financière. Article 3, section 1, of the Royal Decree of 14 November 1991, stipulates that the request for recognition should be submitted to the Commission Bancaire et Financière at least 15 days prior to the public offering. In the case of public offering prospectuses which, in accordance with the national legislation of the issuer, do not need to be approved by a national competent authority, no mutual recognition in Belgium is possible. A way to get round this problem is to draft the local prospectus as a listing prospectus and have it approved as such by the local competent authority. Mutual recognition in Belgium by the Commission Bancaire et Financière is then possible and the prospectus can be used for the public issue of the securities in Belgium (or admission to trading on EASDAQ or EURO.NM Belgium). There are limitations to the mutual recognition. The competent authority may require the translation of the prospectus into one of the national languages.

The competent authority also may require that significant information with regard to the local market (and local shareholders) be inserted in the prospectus.

Ad Hoc and Periodic Information Disclosure

Applicable Legislation

One of the main continuing obligations of a listed company is the reporting requirement of periodic and occasional information towards the Commission Bancaire et Financière and the Management Committee of the Stock Exchange. These requirements are provided in the Royal Decree of 3 July 1996, regarding the obligations on occasional information of issuers whose financial instruments are listed on the first market or the new market of a stock exchange (the so-called 'Royal Decree on Occasional Information'), and the Royal Decree of 3 July 1996, regarding the obligations on periodic information of issuers whose financial instruments are listed on the first market or the new market of a stock exchange (the so-called 'Royal Decree on Periodic Information'). The relevant authority for the periodic information is the Commission Bancaire et Financière and, for the occasional information, it is the Managing Committee of the exchange.

Periodic Information

The Royal Decree on Periodic Information provides for listed companies, admitted on the first market and the EURO.NM, the publishing of a biannual report on their business and their results during the first half of each business year within four months after the end of the relevant half year. This biannual report should consist of quantitative data, including the net turnover and the profits before and after tax, as well as a report on the company and the results during the previous half year. Companies whose securities have been admitted for trading on the EURO.NM also must communicate to the Commission Bancaire et Financière a thrice-monthly report on the first and third quarters of each business year. Beside the biannual and eventual quarterly reports, the listed companies also should disclose information annually: the annual accounts and annual report, on a consolidation and non-consolidated basis.

The publication procedure is determined by the Royal Decree on Periodic Information and by the Consolidated Laws on Commercial Companies to which Belgian companies are subject. The reports must be disclosed to the Commission Bancaire et Financière and to the Managing Committee of the Stock Exchange. They also must be published in a widely circulating Belgian newspaper and be communicated both to a Belgian press agency and through an electronic transmission system.

Occasional Information

The Royal Decree on Occasional Information lays down the rule that companies whose financial instruments are admitted to the first market of a Belgian exchange and the new market of a Belgian exchange (EURO.NM Belgium) should respect the equal treatment of all its investors. This should be done by providing the necessary information to guarantee the transparency and adequacy of the market.[35] Therefore, they must disclose the so-called 'occasional information'. The following information should be disclosed:

- All information regarding the exercise by the holders of financial instruments of their rights or of rights attached to the holding of financial instruments;
- Any information regarding the rights attached to the holding of financial instruments (eg, the right to convert its security); and
- All facts or decisions known to the issuer that, if disclosed, could influence in a sensitive way the price of the financial instruments.

The following are refutably considered to be sensitive information in the sense of the Royal Decree on Occasional Information:

- The communication of results;
- The communication of the amount of the dividend; and
- The communication of any amendment to the rights related to different classes of securities.

Foreign companies that fall within the scope of application of the Royal Decree on Occasional Information must carefully see to it that the Belgian market receives equal information as the market of other states where the company is listed. The method of disclosure when dealing with periodic information has already been described above; similar rules apply to occasional information. Occasional information must be disclosed in one or more Belgian newspapers with a large circulation in Belgium, to Belgian press agencies, and by electronic transmission systems. It is important that the disclosure occurs after the closing of the exchange (4:30 pm).

In case certain information is at the same time periodic information and sensitive information which must be disclosed on the basis of the Royal Decree on Occasional Information, the issuer should comply with the disclosure procedures determined by the Royal Decree on Occasional Information. Therefore, in practice, the periodic information (which, in most cases, will be sensitive information) will be disclosed by respecting the procedure determined in the Royal Decree on Occasional Information and possibly in a cumulative manner (although this is not compulsory), by also respecting the procedure provided in the Royal Decree on Periodic Information.

The Commission Bancaire et Financière and the Managing Committee exercise an a posteriori control on the information transmitted, the Commission Bancaire et Financière regarding compliance with the Royal Decree on Periodic Information and the Management Committee regarding compliance with the Royal Decree on Occasional Information.

Trading Rules

In General

When dealing on a Belgian stock exchange market or regulated market, one must adhere to a number of trading rules. Except for the mandatory use of financial intermediaries, which applies to any investor who wishes to carry out transactions on financial instruments issued by a Belgian company and listed on a Stock Exchange or other regulated market, these rules apply to financial intermediaries acting on behalf of the investors (however, there are exceptions).

Rules of Conduct

Article 11 of the Investment Services Directives provides that the EU member states must implement rules of conduct for investment firms. The minimum rules are described in the Investment Services Directive. Article 11 of the Investment Services Directive in fact finds its origin in Recommendation 77/534/EEC of 25 July 1977 of the European Commission, which contains a (non-binding) code of conduct for investment transactions.

In application of article 11 of the Investment Services Directive, the Law of 6 April 1995 on Secondary Markets, the Status and Supervision of Investment Firms, Intermediaries, and Advisors specified the rules of conduct applicable to all investment services. The rules are based on the ratio legis of article 11 of the Investment Services Directive, on the aim of enhancing the transparency, integrity, and security of the Belgian financial markets, on the idea of giving the Belgian markets a level playing field to operate on, and on the principles elaborated by the SIB under the Financial Services Act of 1986. Seven general rules of conduct are provided by article 36 of the Law of 6 April 1995. A financial intermediary should:

- Act honestly and fairly in conducting his business activities to promote fair practices on and the integrity of the markets in an optimal manner;
- Act with due skill, care, and diligence in the best interest of his clients, taking into account the professional nature of the person for whom the service is provided;[36]
- Comply with all codes of conduct and any other rules applicable to the conduct of his business activities (ie, the entering into transactions in financial instruments) with a view to defending the interest of his clients and the integrity of the markets in an optimal manner;
- Seek from the clients he advises all useful information regarding their financial situation, investment experience, and objectives as regards the services requested which are reasonably relevant to fulfilling his obligations towards his clients in an optimal manner;

36 With regard to financial instruments admitted to listing on the Stock Exchange or traded on another regulated market, the financial intermediary will be considered to have complied with this obligation if he has executed the transaction on a regulated market, unless he has been otherwise instructed by his client.

- Take reasonable steps to provide his clients, within a reasonable period of time, with all information enabling them to take a well-considered and informed decision;[37]
- Attempt to avoid conflicts of interest and, when they cannot be avoided, ensure that his clients are fairly and equally treated and, if applicable, take all other steps such as reporting, complying with internal rules of confidentiality, or refusing to act;[38] and
- Have and employ effectively the resources and procedures which are necessary for the proper performance of his business activities.[39]

The rules should be viewed as general legal principles applicable to all investment services. The regulatory bodies (market authorities) of every regulated market have the power to further elaborate detailed conduct rules in their market regulations. This has, for example, been done for Belfox in articles 3 et seq of the Ministerial Decree of 9 April 1996, articles 1 et seq of the EASDAQ rule book,[40] and articles 3 et seq of the off-market for public debt instruments.[41]

Other Transaction Rules

Mandatory Use of Authorised Financial Intermediaries

Article 2 of the Law of 6 April 1995 on Secondary Markets, the Status and Supervision of Investment Firms, Intermediaries, and Advisors provides that investors established in Belgium who wish to carry out a transaction with regard to financial instruments issued by a Belgian company or institution listed on a Belgian stock exchange must use an authorised financial intermediary; this will be a licensed credit institution (eg, Belgian credit institutions, EU credit institutions operating through a branch or on the basis of the free provision of services, and authorised non-EU institutions), investment firm (eg, stockbrokerage firm), foreign investment firms operating in Belgium on the basis of the Investment Services Directive (and the Law of 6 April 1995), or intermediary acting on regulated markets. The requirement to use a financial intermediary does not apply to:

- Occasional transactions between private individuals;
- The sale of financial instruments representing at least 10 per cent of the voting rights of the issuer;

37 At the simple request of a client, the financial intermediary must be readily available to give a full and honest report of his undertaking towards the client. He may not suggest or promote any action which might incite the client not to fulfil his legal obligations, including his obligations towards the state.

38 The financial intermediary may not have his own interests in an unfair manner prevail over his clients' interests and, if a well-informed client may reasonably expect that such intermediary would allow his clients' interests to prevail, the intermediary must act in accordance with that expectation.

39 The drafting of these rules is in very broad terms and goes (far) beyond the text of the rules of article 11 of the Investment Services Directive.

40 Ministerial Decree of 15 October 1996.

41 Ministerial Decree of 24 January 1996.

- Transactions between the different sections of the same collective investment institution; and
- The public issue of securities.

The purpose of this mandatory use of financial intermediaries is to enhance the protection of the investor; a financial intermediary should respect the rules of conduct and the other trading rules and must carry out the transaction on a regulated market.

Mandatory Use of Regulated Markets

Financial intermediaries acting on behalf of investors residing or established in Belgium must carry out a transaction with respect to a financial instrument listed on a Belgian stock exchange or traded on another Belgian regulated market, or on a Belgian regulated market or a regulated market of another member state of the EU.[42] The investor, however, may explicitly stipulate that a transaction be carried out outside a regulated market. When a financial intermediary acting on behalf of an investor residing or established in Belgium does not respect the concentration rule, the investor may refuse to be bound by the concluded transaction.

Acting as Counterparty of Client

Financial intermediaries may act as counterparty of their client only on a regulated market, or otherwise only after having informed the client beforehand.

No 'Netting'

Financial intermediaries may not compensate orders in financial instruments traded on a Belgian regulated market (with some exceptions).

Reporting Requirements for Executed Transactions

The financial intermediary has a reporting requirement towards his client and towards the market authorities. The client must be informed of the details of the executed transaction at the latest on the next business day following the day of the transaction. In case of a transaction executed outside Belgium, the client should be informed the next business day following receipt of confirmation of the transaction.

In addition to the reporting requirement towards the client, the financial intermediary should report all transactions carried out by such intermediary in financial instruments to the market authority where the transaction took place. The specific rules are based on article 20 of the Investment Services Directive and elaborated in a Royal Decree of 25 February 1996, on the communication of transactions and the keeping of information.

Disclosure of Substantial Holdings and Public Take-Over Bids

In General

The Belgian legislation regarding the acquisition, maintenance, and disposal of a substantial holding in a listed company is based on three options, namely:

- The transparency of the financial markets;
- The duty of information towards all shareholders; and
- The equality among shareholders.[43]

The Belgian legislation regarding the acquisition, maintenance, and disposal of a substantial holding is basically provided in one law and three royal Decrees executing this law, namely:

- The Law of 2 March 1989, on the disclosure of major holdings in companies listed on a stock exchange and on public take-overs bids (hereafter referred to as the 'Law of 2 March 1989');
- The Royal Decree of 10 May 1989 (hereafter referred to as the 'Disclosure Decree'); and
- The Royal Decree of 8 November 1989 (hereafter referred to as the 'Take-Over Decree').

Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings

Scope of Application

Chapter I of the Law of 2 March 1989, as well as the Disclosure Decree, deals with the disclosure by a shareholder of a Belgian listed company of substantial shareholdings in such company. This legislation implements in Belgian law the Council Directive of 12 December 1988, on the information to be published when a major holding in a listed company is acquired or sold.[44] A system is organised in which holders of shares or other stock carrying effective or potential voting rights in companies listed on a stock exchange are obligated to disclose the interests they hold whenever, as a result of the acquisition or disposal of such shares or stock, they reach or exceed, or fall below, certain thresholds. These thresholds are determined by national law.

Contrary to the disclosure of information in the listing prospectus, the ad hoc information of major significance (so-called 'occasional information')[45] or the periodical information on the basis of the Royal Decree of 3 July 1996, regarding the obligations on periodic information of issuers whose financial instruments are listed on the first market or the new market of a stock exchange, the Directive of 12 December 1988, the Belgian Law of 2 March 1989, and the Disclosure Decree impose obligations on shareholders of listed companies, but not on the issuers. This legislation is more a rule of company law, the application of which is restricted to listed companies, than a stock exchange disclosure law.

The Law of 2 March 1989 and the Disclosure Decree only apply to Belgian companies whose securities are listed on an official stock exchange of a member state of the EU. The nationality of the listed company is of great importance here. Under Belgian private international law, a company has the Belgian nationality when its corporate seat is situated on Belgian territory.[46] In contrast with the nationality of the listed company, which must be Belgian, the nationality (or home country requirements) of the shareholder holding, a substantial shareholding is irrelevant. Belgian companies listed on a non-Belgian EU stock exchange fall within the scope of the Belgian disclosure regulations. Even so, European companies listed on the Brussels Stock Exchange will have to adhere to their national disclosure requirements, although these requirements will be similar to the Belgian ones, as they will both be based on the EU Council Directive of 12 December 1988, on the information to be published when a major holding in a listed company is acquired or sold.[47] The legal status of the disclosing shareholder or person also is not relevant.

Belgian companies whose securities are traded on EASDAQ or EURO.NM do not fall within the scope of this regulation. On the basis of this legislation, shareholders of such companies do not need to disclose their substantial holdings in such companies. Indeed, as already mentioned, the admission to trading on EASDAQ and EURO.NM is based on the principle of a public offering of securities and not on the concept of the admission of securities to the official listing on a stock exchange. Therefore, these companies cannot be considered as being Belgian companies whose securities are listed on an official stock exchange. However, both markets for young and innovative companies have very specific rules on the disclosure of significant shareholdings. Companies falling within the scope of the application of chapter I of the Law of 2 March 1989 and the Disclosure Decree must adhere to the principles provided in these regulations.

Disclosure Regulation of Law of 2 March 1989 and Disclosure Decree

Relevant Securities. Relevant securities include not only securities having actual voting rights are relevant, but also securities which bear potential voting rights, such as convertible bonds and warrants.

Disclosure Requirement. Any person owning, acquiring, or transferring securities which represent five per cent or more, or a multiple of five per cent (eg, 10, 15, or 20 per cent) of the total voting rights of all securities of a listed company should disclose their shareholding to the Commission Bancaire et Financière and to the listed company. The initial threshold of five per cent can be lowered to three per cent (and multiples of three per cent) in the articles of incorporation of the issuer. Such disclosure should take place at the latest two days after the transaction whereby the (new) threshold was reached.

46 Consolidated Laws of Commercial Companies, art 196.

47 The threshold can differ, however; the United Kingdom, for example, has gone down to three per cent.

The disclosure requirement is applicable to persons having directly (or indirectly) five per cent or more of the voting rights. Also, the securities held by persons acting jointly are to be taken together for the purpose of establishing whether a person has 5 per cent or more of the voting rights. Persons acting together can act together on the basis of shareholders agreements, blocking conventions, fiduciary agreement, and agreements relating to the certification of shares.[48]

Duties of Company Whose Securities Are Object of Disclosure. The issuer, informed by the disclosing shareholder, must at the latest on the next working day publish the notification (which should appear in two nationally distributed newspapers). In the annexes to the annual accounts, the company should detail the situation of its capital and the structure of its shareholding.[49]

Sanction on Non-Disclosure. A shareholder who does not disclose the ownership or acquisition or transfer of relevant securities at least 45 days before a general meeting will lose that part of the voting rights attached to the securities which gave rise to the disclosure obligation.

However, this sanction does not apply with regard to securities obtained by way of exercising a right of pre-emption, by way of inheritance, merger, division, liquidation, or public offer.[50] The Law of 2 March 1989 also has criminal sanctions for shareholders with substantial holdings who intentionally do not disclose.[51]

Disclosure Regulations for Companies Whose Securities Are Traded on EASDAQ or EURO.NM

In General. Belgian companies whose shares are traded on EASDAQ or EURO.NM Belgium (and are not simultaneously listed on an official stock exchange) do not fall within the scope of application of the Law of 2 March 1989 and the Disclosure Decree. Nevertheless, the Law of 2 March 1989 expressly permits companies which do not fall within the scope of application of this law to voluntary submit to the disclosure system of the Law of 2 March 1989 and the Disclosure Decree. Moreover, due to the very specific nature of these two markets, specific disclosure regulations will apply. These are provided for each market.

Issuers of Securities Traded on EASDAQ. Article 3, sub-clause 2.6, of Book II of the EASDAQ Regulation stipulates that the public offering prospectus which must be drawn up for admission to trading on EASDAQ must identify, in so far as this is known to the issuer, the natural or legal person who, directly or indirectly, severally or jointly, exercises or could exercise control over the issuer, and the particulars of the proportion of the capital giving a right to vote. A brief description of the nature of such control also should be given. The notion of joint control is to be understood as the control exercised by more than one company or by more than one person that has concluded a written or unwritten agreement which may lead to their adopting a common policy in respect of the issuer.

In addition, and in so far as they are known to the issuer, the identity of any person or group that is known to the issuer, either directly or indirectly, to own or to control five per cent or more of any clause of the issuer's financial instruments also must be stated. The financial instruments held by persons acting jointly are to be taken together for the purpose of establishing whether a person controls the issuer or owns or controls five per cent. The same threshold as the one applicable under the Law of 2 March 1989 is relevant here. Each class of equity financial instruments of the issuer, or any of its parents or subsidiaries, owned by any of the issuer's directors, executives, or managers and their nominees also must be disclosed. The prospectus also should contain a description of any arrangements, in so far as these are known to the issuer, the operation of which, at a subsequent date, may result in a change of control of the issuer.

Issuers of Securities Traded on EURO.NM Belgium. The Royal Decree of 16 February 1996 stipulates that the articles of association of an issuer whose securities are traded on EURO.NM Belgium must contain mandatory disclosure rules. The articles of association of such a company must stipulate that each person or body corporate transferring or receiving securities should inform the issuing company and the market authority, in this case the Management Committee established within the Stock Exchange Corporation of Brussels, about the amount of voting rights it possesses, if these voting rights amount to five per cent, 10 per cent, or 15 per cent (per five per cent) of the total amount of voting rights attached to the securities of the issuer.

Specific disclosure requirements apply to the shareholder-managers. As already mentioned, specific rules were enacted for the founding shareholder(s) and the shareholders participating in the daily management of the issuer. In an undertaking, in the form of a letter to the Management Committee, the shareholders-managers must subscribe to a lock-up arrangement. They must undertake not to sell a certain minimum percentage of their holdings (which is to be agreed with the Management Committee) for a period of 12 months. In addition, they must undertake to notify the Management Committee of every transfer by them of the same percentage of securities of the issuing company, whether or not these securities are traded on EURO.NM Belgium, within five working days following this transfer.[52]

Public Take-Over Bids

In General

A distinction must be drawn between the voluntary take-over bid and the mandatory take-over bid. A voluntary take-over bid takes place on the initiative of the bidder. A mandatory take-over bid must take place on the acquisition of a controlling stake in a listed company.

Voluntary Take-Over Bids

Scope of Application. The rules regarding voluntary take-over bids, which can be found in Chapter II of the Take-Over Decree, apply to companies, irrespective of their legal form and irrespective of whether or not their securities are listed or traded in public.[53] Three elements must be united in order for the Take-Over Decree to apply, namely:

- There must be an offer;
- The offer must be made to the public; and
- The offer must be related to certain 'securities' as defined in the Decree.[54]

Belgian law does not define the notion 'offer'. However, there is a consensus in the doctrine whereby it is considered that a public purchase offer is an offer made to the public to acquire against cash or other consideration securities held by the public. The 'public' character of an offer is determined on the basis of the Royal Decree of 9 January 1991 regarding the public nature of transactions carried out with a view to attracting savings. (Please note that this Royal Decree is currently under review; however, the basic choices made by this Decree will probably remain). According to this regulation an offer is public in the following circumstances (here summarised):

- When more than 50 different persons are solicited in Belgium;
- When, for the offering, use is made of any means of publicity or advertising of whatever nature aimed at the public in Belgium to announce or recommend the offering, such means being understood to include any publicity or advertising or spreading of information in the press or in publications or on the radio, or on the television or any other audio-visual support, or the spreading of circulars or any other printed documents concerning the offering, including materials sent personally to the recipients (direct mail) and the spreading of information by way of telephone campaigns (cold calling) or by the use of a system of electronic information; or
- When there is reliance on or intervention by professional intermediaries in Belgium.

53 In contrast to Chapter II, Chapter III of the Decree applies only to companies which have made a public offering of securities.

54 Royal Decree of 8 November 1989, art 1.

There are three exemptions to the public offering qualification; these exempt offerings from the regulations applicable to public offerings as soon as one of the following conditions is met, namely:

- When the offering is subject to a minimum investment of BEF 10 million per investor;
- When the offering is targeted only at professional investors acting for their own account (eg, pension funds, investment funds, and insurance companies); and
- When the acquisition of the financial instruments thus offered is a condition for the exercise of a profession or is necessary for the exercise of such profession.

Furthermore, exemptions exist for securities issued by the Belgian state and the regional authorities, for the public sale or auction of instruments ordered by court or organised periodically by the Management Committee of the stock exchange, and for the public offering of Eurobonds. The 'securities' envisaged by the Take-Over Decree are securities to which voting rights are attached and securities which contain a right for the holder to acquire voting stock, such as warrants and convertible bonds.[55]

Conflict of Laws Aspects. The scope of application contains certain elements which involve an aspect of international private law. Firstly, the Belgian take-over regulation should be considered as a loi de police, having a peremptory character. As soon as the offer for securities has a public character in Belgium, this legislation must be applied. It will therefore not be possible to contract-out of the take-over Decree by choosing a different contract law on the transaction. A raider cannot opt to acquire the shares of the shareholders under foreign law. Even if the target is a foreign company, as soon as the take-over enters into the scope of application of the Belgian take-over legislation, such legislation must apply.

Secondly, the question as to whether the Belgian take-over legislation applies also involves certain elements of international private law. Reconsidering the scope of application, it is primarily in the assessment of the notion of 'public' that the international aspect appears. The notion 'offer' is self-explanatory. The offer must be made with regard to 'securities'. It is irrelevant here whether the securities are subject to Belgian law or to foreign law.

When more than 50 persons are solicited, the bid will be regarded as public. However, more than 50 people must be solicited in Belgium. The same applies for the second criterion: the publicity, cold calling, or direct mail. These must be done in Belgium. Here, the recipient will be considered. Hence, cold calling from abroad to Belgium falls within the scope. The answer to the question as to whether the public is approached in Belgium or not remains of course very factual (eg, whether a certain newspaper is circulated in Belgium).

55 The Stock Exchange Law of 1995 no longer defines or uses the notion of 'securities', but rather uses the broader notion of 'financial instruments', which also includes forward rate agreements, swaps, options, and futures.

Consequently, even if target and bidder are foreign companies, it could well be that the Belgian take-over legislation applies as long as the take-over bid falls within the scope of the Belgian Take-Over Decree. It will in the first place be the Commission Bancaire et Financière that will judge whether the Belgian procedure must be followed. However, even if the Commission Bancaire et Financière considers that no such offer is necessary in Belgium, a (minority) shareholder can still petition the court and require that a public bid be made in Belgium. However, due to mutual recognition of prospectuses, this will normally not be a problem in practice. A more realistic hypothesis is of course the case of a foreign bidder and domestic (Belgian) target. As a significant portion of the target's shares will probably be distributed in the public in Belgium, a public take-over bid in Belgium in accordance with the Take-Over Decree will be necessary.

Regulation of Take-Over Bids. Here, a distinction will be made between the conditions of the take-over bid and the procedure.

Conditions for Take-Over Bid. The public offer must extend to all voting securities of the company. However, the offeror has the right to restrict its offer to 10 per cent of the voting rights, taking into account those attached to securities he already holds.[56] The offer must be a firm offer. The offeror must have the intention to bring the bid to a successful end. However, the offeror has the right to make its offer conditional on the effective obtaining of a certain minimum percentage.[57]

The offeror must be able to show, to the satisfaction of the Commission Bancaire et Financière, that it has sufficient financial resources to successfully complete the take-over. Either the funds must be available on a blocked account, or the offeror must have an unconditional credit line at his disposal. In the case of an exchange offer, the offeror must be able to show that he can either issue the relevant securities or acquire them within the required period of time. The bid must be formal in order. It must comply with the procedure and formalities of the Take-Over Decree.

Take-Over Procedure. The offeror must notify the Commission Bancaire et Financière 15 days before the actual offer of his intention to make a public offer. A file containing information regarding the offered price (or other consideration), the conditions on fulfilment of which the offer will be completed, and other aspects of the bid should accompany the notification. At the same time, a draft prospectus relating to the forthcoming offer should be submitted to the Commission Bancaire et Financière. Unless the offer is prima facie inadmissible, the notification will be published by the Commission Bancaire et Financière the following day and passed on to the target and the stock exchange.

The notification by the Commission Bancaire et Financière of the bid to the company shall limit the powers of the board of directors and general meeting of the target. From the moment of receipt by the company of the notification of the Commission Bancaire et Financière, the target is legally prohibited from increasing its capital or issuing voting securities whereby the right of pre-emption is limited or lifted, except by a decision of a general meeting of shareholders.[58] Likewise, the company may not take a decision which would result in a substantial alteration of the assets and liabilities of the company. However, decisions validly taken by the company before the notification by the Commission Bancaire et Financière of the take-over bid may be executed. Likewise, the board of directors may proceed with an increase of the capital within the limits of its powers.

Under Belgian company law, the general meeting of the company can authorise the board to increase the capital of the company. This is the so-called 'authorised capital'.[59] However, once the company has been notified of a take-over bid, the increase of capital within the limits of the authorised capital is only possible if the authorisation to increase the capital does not date back more than three years and explicitly gives the Board of Directors the authority to increase the capital in the event of a take-over bid. Furthermore, the following conditions must be fulfilled:

- The shares to be issued must be completely and immediately paid in at the time of issuance;
- The subscription price must be at least as high as the offered take-over price; and
- The total amount of newly issued shares may not exceed 10 per cent of the total number of shares.[60]

Under the Take-Over Decree, once the company is notified of the intended offer, the Board of Directors of the target is required to take a position with regard to the offer and to make its position public.[61] The board must inform the Commission Bancaire et Financière and the offeror within five days of its position. It must verify the accuracy of the information contained in the draft prospectus. The members of the board, in their capacity as shareholders, must indicate whether or not they themselves accept the offer. The advice of the board of directors of the target will be rendered public in the prospectus or in a separate memorandum. After the notification of the offer to the target, the offeror may only change the conditions of the bid if this change implies an improvement for the shareholders.[62]

The role of the Commission Bancaire et Financière is a formal one. The Commission Bancaire et Financière will check the prospectus as to the correctness and completeness of the information provided in it. However, the Commission Bancaire et Financière will not evaluate the advisability or quality of the offer. The minimum content of a take-over prospectus is provided in an annex to the Take-Over Decree. When the prospectus is approved, together with an acceptance form, which shall form a part of the prospectus, it will be published and distributed through a financial institution chosen by the offeror. Furthermore, the general public must be informed through a notice published in one or more national newspapers.

Should the (draft) take-over prospectus not be approved by the Commission Bancaire et Financière, the offeror can appeal to the Minister of Finance. The duration of the bid should be at least 10, and a maximum of 20, days. Within five days of the closing of the offer, the offeror must communicate to the public. If the offeror has acquired more than 90 per cent of the voting securities through the offer, he must re-open the offer within one month. This should permit minority shareholders to dispose of their securities (the bid should be re-opened for five days) and also will permit the offeror to request a de-listing of the securities (in which case, the bid should be re-opened for 15 days).[63] A counter-offer by a third party must be submitted at least two days before the closing of the offer and must be at least five per cent higher.

Mandatory Take-Over Bids

In General. Chapter III of the Take-Over Decree applies where there is a change in control of a company which has made a public offering of securities. Under Belgian law, in the event control over a Belgian public company (ie, a company which has engaged in public solicitation which by definition is not the same as a listed company; see article 26 bis of the Consolidated Laws of Commercial Companies) has been transferred outside a public offer and the price paid by the person who has gained control was higher than the market-price of the shares, then the minority shareholders have the right to dispose of their shareholding under the same conditions as the former majority shareholder(s).

It should be noted that, contrary to the legislation in several other European states, the mere transfer of a controlling stake in a listed or public company is not enough to trigger the obligation of the transferee to acquire all outstanding shares of the controlled company. In order for the transferee to be obliged to launch a public bid on all outstanding shares, the controlling stake should be acquired at an overprice, a so-called 'control premium'.[64]

Scope of Application. Due to its imprecise formation, the scope of application of the Belgian legislation on mandatory bids is not always clear.[65] The Cour de Cassation has ruled that the Belgian take-over legislation, and more specifically article 41 of the Take-Over Decree which forms the basis for the mandatory bid, belongs to the Belgian legal public order.[66] It is not possible to contract-out of this legislation. Consequently, the parties dealing with a majority stake in a Belgian public company should take full account of Chapter III of the Take-Over Decree, even if they choose to adopt a foreign law.

63 Royal Decree of 8 November 1989, art 32.

64 The Belgian rules are currently under review. A proposal has been made to simplify the regulation in such a manner that the mere owning or acquiring of a certain threshold percentage — this threshold value remains to be decided — will trigger the bid.

65 Royal Decree of 8 November 1989, arts 38 et seq.

In the case of a cross-border transfer of a control stake in a Belgian public company, the transferor and transferee should bear in mind that the Belgian take-over legislation is a mandatory regulation,[67] and the Belgian law is the lex societatis (a company has under Belgian law the Belgian nationality if its registered seat is situated in Belgium), which determines the conditions under which one can become a shareholder (eg, the question as to whether an acceptance clause is effective.) The scope of application of chapter III of the Take-Over Decree contains two important elements, both of which can lead to uncertainties.

The first element is the seizure of control. Control is defined in the Take-Over Decree by reference to the accountancy legislation. Control is seen as the fact of having a decisive influence on the appointment of the majority of the Board of Directors of the company or on the policy decisions of the company.[68] The acquisition of the control by parties acting in mutual agreement is considered to be identical to the acquisition of control by one party. A capital increase decided by the general meeting will fall outside the scope of application of the regulation on mandatory bids. Therefore, in the case where the seizure of (joint) control is done with the co-operation of the majority shareholder of the company, this could be a successful escape route to avoid a mandatory public bid on all shares.

The second important element is the question as to whether a control premium has been paid. The consequence of this necessary condition for a mandatory bid is that the Belgian regulation on the private transfer of controlling holdings does not apply to market acquisitions at the stock exchange as there would be no overprice over the market price, unless the official stock exchange quotation did not reflect the market price. However, it is not always easy to determine when a control premium was paid and what the premium was in consideration for the transfer of control. A controlling stake could be bought at market price and the premium could be shifted to unrelated transactions.

The Regulation. A person acquiring control over a public company by paying a control premium is required to offer to acquire all remaining voting shares of the target company.[69] This can be done through a public bid in which the bid price will equal the highest share price at which the acquirer acquired his controlling stake. Alternately, this also can be done through a so-called 'maintenance of the quotation price' (maintien de cours) for a period of at least 15 days, and this must take place within 30 days.[70] The public bid follows to a great extent the procedure of the voluntary public bid.[71] For example,

68 Royal Decree of 8 November 1989, art 2, s 1; Royal Decree of 8 October 1976.
69 Royal Decree of 8 November 1989, art 41.
70 Royal Decree of 8 November 1989, art 42; for an example of such price stabilisation in which the undertaking to maintain the price was linked to a put option in favour of the shareholders, see Commission Bancaire et Financière, Jaarverslag (1993–1994), at p 90.

the rule of article 32 of the Take-Over Decree that a bidder holding 90 per cent or more of the voting shares of a target company must reopen the bid within one month after announcing the result of the initial bid applies equally to a mandatory bid.

Squeeze-Out

The controlling shareholder of a listed company can have an interest in 'de-listing' its subsidiary. The first step to such de-listing could be a so-called 'squeeze-out' procedure. In the case of a squeeze-out procedure, a shareholder holding at least 95 per cent of the voting shares of a company bids for the remaining five per cent. The take-over bid is mandatory on the part of the minority shareholders, in the sense that after the squeeze-out bid they can no longer remain shareholders of the company, but it will only have a right to the price offered by the bidder. Three different procedures are possible, depending on whether the squeeze-out bid follows a 'normal' take-over bid.

The first procedure is a squeeze-out bid in the sense of article 190 quinquies of the Consolidated Laws of Commercial Companies as detailed in Chapter IV of the Royal Decree of 8 November 1989. Article 190 quinquies of the Consolidated Laws of Commercial Companies provides that each natural or legal person who, alone or jointly, holds 95 per cent of the voting securities of a company limited by shares may acquire all the securities of such company. At the end of the proceedings any securities that have not been offered, whether or not the holder thereof appeared, will be considered transmitted by operation of law to that person, on payment of the purchase price into the Caisse de Dépôt et Consignation (which is a state-owned depository institution). Securities issued to the bearer which have not been offered will be converted into registered shares by a resolution of the general meeting. At the end of the purchase offer, the company will no longer be considered a company which makes or has made a public offer of its securities unless bonds issued by such company are still publicly held.

The conditions of the bid are detailed in article 45 of the Royal Decree of 8 November 1989. The bid must comply with the provisions of Chapter IV of the Royal Decree of 8 November 1989, but also with Chapter I of this Decree. Therefore, as far as the procedure is concerned, the squeeze-out bid is very similar to a voluntary take-over bid. Of course, the result will differ. The result of a squeeze-out bid will be that the minority shareholders lose their proprietary rights in the company and the bidder will have full, 100 per cent control over the company. The minority shareholders cannot refuse to sell their shares. The aim of a mere take-over bid is to have control of the public company, but not 100 per cent of the shares. In the case of a voluntary take-over bid, the minority shareholders have the possibility of refusing the offer and not selling their voting shares at the proposed price.

The most important element of the squeeze-out bid, and the element by means of which the squeeze-out bid differs from the take-over bid, is the price and the setting of the price. As the minority shareholder cannot refuse to sell its shares, the setting of a correct price is very important. The Royal Decree provides that with regard to the price, the interests of the investors should be safeguarded.[72] The following measures will be necessary to implement this rule:

- An independent expert must make a report on the relevancy of the valuation rules used by the bidder to evaluate the target company and to justify the price, and the expert should indicate whether the price safeguards the interests of the investors and the equal treatment of the investors;
- The managing board of the target company should give its advice;
- There is a procedure installed whereby the minority shareholders can offer comments; and
- The Commission Bancaire et Financière controls the regularity of the offer and the quality of the information given by the offeror.

The second possible procedure is a voluntary take-over bid (in the sense of Chapter II of the Royal Decree of 8 November 1989), followed by a squeeze-out bid. A person making a voluntary take-over bid on the shares of a company whose shares are distributed in public (a public company) can retain in the prospectus the possibility of reopening the bid and of opening a squeeze-out bid when as a result of the (first) bid he holds 95 per cent or more of the voting shares. The price of the squeeze-out bid is the same as the price of the voluntary take-over bid. This price is viewed as correct because the market has evaluated it as a correct price.

The third possible procedure is a squeeze-out bid which follows the acquisition of control over a company, whether through a public bid or a maintenance of the quotation price. In fact, two different hypotheses of squeeze-out are possible in the case of an acquisition of control, namely:

- The offeror has the possibility of giving the mandatory take-over bid the legal consequences of a squeeze-out bid when, as a result of the acquisition of control, he already holds at least 95 per cent of the voting shares of the company; and
- When, as a result of the acquisition of the control, he does not (yet) hold 95 per cent of the voting shares, he has the possibility of letting the mandatory take-over bid be followed by a squeeze-out bid.[73]

Applicable Legislation and Regulation

Applicable Legislation

The prohibition of the use of privileged price-sensitive information with regard to securities traded on a stock exchange was introduced in Belgium in 1989 with the insertion of 72 Royal Decree of 8 November 1989, art 45, s 4.

73 The price will then be equal to the price of the mandatory take-over bid, which will, for the same reasons as in the case of a squeeze-out bid which follows a voluntary take-over bid, be regarded as a correct market price.

article 509 quater in the Penal Code. The rules were reformed by the Law of 4 December 1990 on Financial Transactions and Financial Markets and again by the Law of 6 April 1995 on Secondary Markets, the Status and Supervision of Investment Firms, Intermediaries, and Advisers. The insider dealing legislation which is currently in force is based on the Council Directive of 13 November 1989, Co-ordinating Regulations on Insider Dealing.[74]

Definitions and Regulation

The Belgian definition of 'inside information'[75] is based on the definition of article 1 of the EC Directive: 'inside information' means information which has not been made public which is sufficiently clear relating to one or several issuers of securities or other financial instruments, and which, if it were made public, would be likely to have a significant effect on the price of the securities or other financial instruments in question. The notion of insider information therefore depends to a large extent on the price sensitivity the information would possess if it were disclosed. The information must be sufficiently precise and certain.

Under Belgian law, there is an exception for holding companies. Information which holding companies have on their subsidiaries on the basis of their role in the management of these subsidiaries — even price-sensitive information — will not be considered inside information, provided that such information is not subject to mandatory disclosure.

Belgian law makes a further distinction between primary insiders and secondary insiders, so-called 'tippees'. 'Primary insiders' are persons who by virtue of their membership in the management or supervisory bodies of the company or by virtue of their holding in the capital of the issuer, or because they have access to such information by virtue of the exercise of their employment, profession, or duties, possess information of which they reasonably should be aware that such information constitutes inside information. It is prohibited for primary insiders either for their own account or for the account of third parties to buy or sell securities or other financial instruments to which such information relates. The primary insiders may not divulge the inside information, except in the course of their normal professional activities, nor may they on the basis of the inside information propose or recommend a third party transaction with respect to such instruments to which the information relates.

A 'secondary insider' is a person who has received the inside information as a tip. The same restriction on the use of inside information exists for secondary as for primary insiders.[76]

Conflict of Law Aspects

Article 5 of the Council Directive of 13 November 1989 provides that each member state of the EU must apply its insider dealing regulations at least to actions undertaken within its territory to the extent that the transferable securities concerned are admitted to trading on a market of an EU member state. In any event, each member state must regard a transaction as carried out within its territory if it is carried out on a regulated market situated or operating within its territory. In application of article 5, the Belgian legislator has provided that the Belgian insider dealing regulations[77] apply to acts accomplished in Belgium or abroad when they relate to securities or other financial instruments which have been admitted in Belgium to the listing of a Stock Exchange (or are traded on a market designated by the King; NASDAQ is such a market).

Furthermore, the Belgian insider dealing rules also are applicable to acts accomplished in Belgium relative to securities or other financial instruments which have been admitted for trading on a regulated market which is controlled by an entity recognised by the authority, which functions on a regular basis, which is open to the public, and which is situated or operational in a member state of the EU.

Powers of Market Authority

For the Brussels Stock Exchange, the relevant authorities will be the Managing Committee and the Commission Bancaire et Financière, which are responsible for monitoring compliance with the insider dealing rules, though without taking anything away from the competence of the judicial authorities.

The market authority may acquire access to all documents and copy all documents it considers relevant for the investigation of insider trading. It has the right to obtain any relevant information and can question any officer or employee of a financial intermediary (member of the exchange). It can ask any question that in its opinion is reasonable and useful. It may visit the financial intermediary, on whose premises it must be granted full access to all documents and records. It may consult with other market authorities and exchange information. It may adopt measures of intervention to stop the activities which go against the rules of the relevant market.

The relevant market authority has the same powers over foreign member institutions active on the market that it has over Belgian members. The relevant market authority can take disciplinary sanctions against the members of the exchange who do not co-operate in an investigation on insider dealing (fines, suspension of membership, limitation of activities, and revocation of authorisation). However, the market authority has no direct power over investors; it can only transmit its finding to the judicial authorities who, on the basis of the factual information given by the market authority, can institute proceedings against the investors committing the criminal offence of insider trading. In this respect, no difference should be made between Belgian and foreign investors.

Judicial Proceedings

The relevant market authority does not have the authority to judge the investor charged with insider dealing. This belongs to the competence of the criminal courts. The judicial authorities can demand from the market authority and the Commission Bancaire et Financière any information which it deems necessary for building its criminal case.[78] At any time, they may demand the advice of the Commission Bancaire et Financière, which normally must then be given within one month. The Commission Bancaire et Financière also can give advice to foreign judicial authorities. The Commission Bancaire et Financière may, however, refuse to give any information to a foreign judicial authority if such information would jeopardise Belgian sovereignty, safety, or public order.

An investor who has been found guilty of insider trading can be imprisoned for a maximum period of one year and can be heavily fined. Appeal against a decision in first instance of the criminal courts is possible.

Introduction

In General

The main laws applied to the Brazilian securities market are:

- Law Number 6.385 of 7 December 1976 (the 'Securities Law'), as amended by Law Number 10.303 of 31 October 2001, which disciplines the securities market and creates the regulatory entity, the Securities and Exchange Commission (CVM); and
- Law Number 6.404 of 15 December 1976 (the 'Corporation Law'), as amended by Law Number 9.457 of 5 May 1997 and Law Number 10.303/01, which governs corporations.

The CVM functions under the National Monetary Council (CMN) and at the same hierarchical level of the Central Bank of Brazil (Bacen), which form part of the Brazilian Financial System:[1] All these entities are subject to the Constitution and the laws issued by the National Congress, and other rules with the same legal power, such as provisional measures, enacted directly by the President of the Republic.

Due to the agility, complexity, and constant evolution of the Brazilian Financial System, it would be impossible for all related regulation to pass through the parliamentary process. Therefore, Law Number 4.595 of 31 December 1964 created and gave normative powers to the CMN, which is the highest regulatory entity within the Brazilian Financial System. The rules issue by the CMN, ie, Resolutions (Resoluçoes), must be complied with by the members of the Financial System, including Bacen and the CVM.

The CVM has the power to issue complementary rules to the laws and CMN Resolutions. The most relevant rules issued by the CVM are Instructions and Deliberations. This system, as it can be observed in the diagram below, is complemented by the self-regulatory power of Stock and Futures Exchanges.

1 The Brazilian Financial System is composed of the CMN, the Private Insurances National Council (CNSP), and the Complementary Pension Management Council (CGPC). Both the CVM and Bacen are linked to the CMN. The regulatory supervising entities linked to the CNSP and CGPC are, respectively, the Private Insurance Superintendency (Susep) and the Complementary Pension Secretariat (SPC).

Regulatory Structure of the Brazilian Financial System

Role of the National Monetary Council

The CMN is the head body of the Brazilian Financial System, has normative functions, and:

- Defines the policy to be observed in the organisation and operation of the securities market;
- Regulates the use of credit within the market;
- Establishes the general guidelines to be observed by the CVM in the performance of its duties;
- Defines the activities of the CVM to be performed in coordination with Bacen; and
- Approves the staff and personnel regulation of the CVM and establish the remuneration of the chairman, commissioners, holders of trusted positions, and other employees.

Bacen, created by Law Number 4.595 of 31 December 1964, is an autonomous federal institution which ensures the purchasing power stability of the Brazilian currency (the Real) and the integrity of the financial system, and exclusively prints and issues currency. Its functions include those to:

- Formulate monetary policy through the use of National Treasury bonds;
- Establish the reference rate for one-day committed operations, known as the SELIC rate;[2]
- Control the credit operations of institutions that comprise the financial system.
- Formulate, execute, and supervise the currency exchange policy and financial relations policy with foreign countries;
- Inspect commercial banks;
- Issue paper money;
- Execute current services to supply money needed to economic activities;
- Control inflation;
- Control the expansion of currency, credit, and interest rates;
- Operate in the open market;
- Announce decisions made by the CMN;
- Keep gold and foreign currency assets for operation in currency exchange markets to maintain the parity of the Brazilian currency;
- Manage Brazilian international reserves;
- Assure the liquidity and solvency of financial institutions; and
- Authorise the functioning of financial institutions.

Integration of the National Monetary Council and the Securities and Exchange Commission

The CMN and CVM are to perform their respective duties, as provided for under the Securities Law, in order to:

- Stimulate the creation of savings and their investment in securities;
- Promote the expansion and the regular and efficient operation of the stock markets, and stimulate permanent investments in the capital stock of publicly held corporations controlled by private Brazilian capital;
- Guarantee the efficient and correct operation of stock markets and over-the-counter markets;
- Protect securities holders and market investors against the irregular issue of securities, illegal acts of officers and controlling shareholders of publicly held corporations, or managers of securities portfolios, and the use of relevant information not disclosed to the market;

2 The Monetary Policy Committee (Copom) is the primary monetary policy-making body of Bacen and it is responsible for establishing the target for the SELIC rate, the Bacen's principal monetary policy instrument, which is the average interest rate on overnight inter-bank loans collateralised by government bonds that are registered with and traded on the Settlement and Custody Special System (SELIC).

- Avoid or prevent fraud or manipulation intended to create artificial conditions of supply, demand, or price of securities traded on the market;
- Guarantee public access to information on the securities traded and the corporations issuing them;
- Guarantee the observance of equitable business practice on the securities market; and
- Guarantee compliance with the conditions established by the CMN regarding use of credit.

Securities Exchange Commission

The CVM is an autonomous federal institution linked to the Ministry of Finance, but not under hierarchical subordination, created by the Securities Law to inspect and develop the securities market in Brazil. Its role is to:

- Regulate the matters expressly provided for in the Securities Law and in the Corporation Law, with due regard for the policies defined by the CMN;
- Administer the registrations instituted by the Securities Law;
- Control the activities and services of the securities market, and disclose information relating to the market, individuals participating in it, and the securities traded thereon;
- Propose to the CMN establishment of maximum limits for prices, commissions, and fees charged by market brokers; and
- Control publicly held corporations.

International Activities of the Securities Exchange Commission

The CVM has an International Affairs Office, whose competence consists of management of the execution of several Agreements of Technical Cooperation and Exchange of Information (Memorandum of Understanding, MoU) signed by the CVM and other commissions, with the objective of strengthening mutual cooperation and supervision, and representation of the CVM before international institutions related to the regulating agencies or other operating organs in the securities area.

The CVM has endorsed several international cooperation agreements, both bilateral and multilateral. The multilateral agreements endorsed by the CVM are:

- The Windsor Declaration (1995);
- The Boca Raton Declaration (1996); and
- The International Organisation of Securities Commissions (IOSCO) Multilateral Memorandum of Understanding Concerning Consultation and Cooperation and the Exchange of Information (May 2002).

Securities Market

The following activities are governed by and controlled by the CVM in accordance with the Securities Law:

- Issuing and distribution of securities on the market;

- Trading and intermediation on the securities market;
- Trading and intermediation in the derivatives market;
- Organisation and operation of stock exchanges;
- Organisation and operation of commodities and futures exchanges;
- Management of securities portfolios and custody of securities;
- Auditing of publicly held corporations; and
- Services of securities consultants and advisors.

For the purposes of the Securities Law, the term 'securities' comprises:

- Shares, debentures, and subscription bonuses;
- Coupons, rights, subscription receipts, and split certificates relating to the securities indicated above;
- Certificates of deposit of securities;
- Debenture certificates;
- Shares of mutual funds investing in securities and shares of investment clubs investing in any type of assets;
- Commercial paper;
- Futures, options, and other derivatives agreements whose underlying assets are securities;
- Other derivatives agreements regardless of the respective underlying assets; and
- When publicly offered, any other collective investment instrument or agreement that creates the right of participation on profits or remuneration, including as a result of the rendering of services, and whose profits derive from the efforts of the entrepreneur or from the efforts of third parties.

All securities are subject to the supervision and control of the CVM. Federal, state, or municipal government bonds and negotiable instruments guaranteed by a financial institution (other than debentures) are not deemed to be 'securities' within this context and are subject to the supervision and control of Bacen and not of the CVM. The issuer of the securities, as well as the managers and controlling parties, are subject to the rules established by the Securities Law with respect to publicly held corporations. The CVM will be responsible for issuing regulations to give effect to the provisions of the Securities Law, being empowered to:

- Require that the issuers be incorporated as corporations;
- Require that the financial statements of the issuers, or information concerning the applicable project, be audited by an independent auditor registered with the CVM;
- Waive the requirement of participation of a company comprising the Securities Distribution System in a public offering of securities; and
- Establish standard clauses and conditions to be adopted in the investment instruments and agreements to be traded in Stock Exchanges or in organised or non-organised over-the-counter markets and refuse the trading of any issue that fails to meet such standards.

Securities Distribution System

The Securities Distribution System in Brazil comprises the following participants:

- Financial institutions and other corporations engaged in the activity of distributing securities issues as agents of the issuing corporation or for their own accounts, underwriting or purchasing the issue in order to place it on the market;
- Corporations engaged in the activity of purchasing securities available on the market, in order to resell them for their own accounts;
- Corporations and independent agents engaged in intermediation activities in the trading of securities on stock exchanges or the over-the-counter market;
- Stock exchanges;
- Organised over-the-counter markets;
- Commodities brokers, special operators, and the commodities and futures exchanges; and
- Securities clearing and settlement entities.

The CVM will define the types and kinds of financial institution which may perform activities in the securities market, as well as the transactions it may carry and the services it may provide on this market and the specialisation of transactions or services to be observed by the corporations in the market, as well as the conditions under which they may accumulate their types and kinds of transactions and services.

With respect to financial institutions and other corporations authorised to perform simultaneously transactions or services on the securities market and on markets subject to Bacen's supervision, the duties of the CVM will be limited to the activities governed by Securities Law and will be exercised taking into account the duties of Bacen. The CMN will regulate these activities, ensuring the coordination of services between Bacen and the CVM. The following activities will require prior authorisation of the CVM:

- Distribution of securities issues on the market;
- Purchase of securities for resale, for their own accounts;
- Intermediation or brokerage on operations involving titles; and
- Clearing and settlement on operations involving titles.[3]

The stock exchanges, futures exchanges, organised over-the-counter market entities, and securities clearing and settlement entities have administrative and financial autonomy and must operate under the supervision of the CVM. Stock exchanges, futures exchanges, over-the-counter market entities, and securities clearing entities, as ancillary entities of the CVM, will be required to supervise their respective members and the securities transactions carried out by them. In this regard, the CVM will govern:

- The conditions for obtaining the authorisation or registration required for carrying out any of the above-mentioned activities and the respective administrative procedures;

3 Only independent agents and corporations registered with the CVM may engage in securities mediation or brokerage activities outside the Stock Exchange.

- The conditions regarding the good reputation, financial capacity, and technical qualifications for corporation officers and any other individuals participating in the securities market;
- The conditions regarding the constitution and dissolution of Stock Exchanges, entities of the organised over-the-counter market, as well as entities of clearing and settlement, their legal constitution, and the appointment of members of their boards;
- The exercise of disciplinary authority by the Stock Exchanges and organised over-the-counter market, concerning the trading of securities, and by entities of clearing and settlement over their members, the imposition of penalties, and cases of exclusion;
- The number of broker-dealers which may be members of a Stock Exchange, requirements or conditions for admission regarding credibility, financial capacity, and technical qualifications of their managers, and representation on Stock Exchange floor trading;
- The management of Stock Exchanges, entities of the organised over-the-counter market, and entities of clearing and settlement; fees, commissions, and any other amount charged by the Stock Exchanges and entities of clearing and settlement or their members;
- The conditions regarding forward operations; and
- The conditions for constitution and dissolution of the futures exchanges, their legal form, administration institutions, and their components.

Furthermore, the CVM will define:

- The types of operations Stock Exchanges and over-the-counter markets may engage in, the methods and practices to be observed on the market, and the accountability of intermediaries in operations;
- The pattern of artificial conditions of supply, demand, and price of securities, or of price manipulation and fraudulent operations and inequitable practices in securities distribution or intermediation; and
- The rules applicable to the record of operations, to be kept by the entities that compose the Securities Distribution System.

Trading of Securities

No public issue of securities may be distributed on the market without prior registration with the CVM. The CVM is empowered to enact rules governing the enforcement of the provisions of issue and distribution of securities. The sale, the promise to sell, the offer to sell or underwrite, and the acceptance of an order to sell or underwrite securities, when practised by an issuing corporation, its founders, or persons considered equivalent to such, will be considered acts of distribution. The following will be considered equivalent to an issuing corporation:

- The controlling shareholder and any entities controlled by the corporation;
- The co-obligor named in the securities;
- The financial institutions and other corporations engaged in the activity of distributing securities issues as agents of the issuing corporation or for their own accounts, underwriting, or purchasing the issue in order to place it on the market; and

- Anyone who has underwritten securities of an issue, or has purchased them from the issuing corporation for the purpose of placing them on the market.

A public issue is characterised by the use of sales or underwriting lists or bulletins, leaflets, prospectuses (brochures), or advertisements directed at the public; the search for underwriters or purchasers of securities by employees, agents, or brokers; and trading carried out in a store, office, or establishment open to the public, or by using public communication services. A public issue may only be placed on the market through the Securities Distribution System, and the CVM may require the participation of a financial institution.

The CVM may define other situations which, for registration purposes, constitute a public issuing, as well as cases in which such registration may be dispensed, bearing in mind the interests of the investing public; and establish registration procedures and specify the information to be supplied with the application, including that with respect to:

- The issuing corporation, the business, or activities it is or intends to be engaged in, its financial and economic situation, management, and principal shareholders;
- The characteristics of the issuance and the use of the proceeds thereof;
- The seller of the securities; and
- The parties participating in the distribution, their remuneration, and their relationship with the issuing corporation or the seller.

The CVM may condition such registration to a minimum capital of the issuing corporation and a minimum amount of issue, as well as to the disclosure of any information it may deem necessary to protect the interests of the investing public. The registration application will be accompanied by prospectuses and any other documents to be published or distributed, for the offering, advertising, or promotion of an issue. The CVM will order the suspension of any issuance or distribution which is not being made in accordance with the applicable provisions mentioned herein, particularly when:

- The issuance has been deemed as fraudulent or illegal, even after it has been registered; or
- The offer, release, promotion, or announcement of the securities is being made under conditions other than those contained in the registration, or with false, fraudulent, or substantially inaccurate information.

Negotiation on the Stock Exchange and the Over-the-Counter Market

In addition to the registration for public issue and distribution of securities, the CVM will maintain registration for trading on the Stock Exchange and registration for trading on the over-the-counter market, organised or not. Only the securities issued by a corporation registered in accordance with the law may be traded on the Stock Exchange and the over-the-counter market.

The registration for public issue and distribution of securities with the CVM implies the registration for the over-the-counter market, but not for a stock exchange or an organised over-the-counter market entity. The activities carried out with the participation of the corporations or professionals listed below, or in their premises, excluding those made on

Stock Exchanges or on systems administered by entities of the organised over-the-counter market, are considered as being on the non-organised over-the-counter market. The corporations or professionals referred to herein are the following:

- Financial institutions and other corporations engaged in the activity of distributing securities issues as agents of the issuing corporation or for their own accounts, underwriting, or purchasing the issue in order to place it on the market;
- Corporations engaged in the activity of purchasing securities available on the market, in order to resell them for their own account; and
- Corporations and independent agents engaged in intermediation activities in the trading of securities, on Stock Exchanges or the over-the-counter market.

Each stock exchange or entity of the organised over-the-counter market may lay down its own requirements for accepting securities for trading on their floors or systems, once prior approval has been given by the CVM. The organised over-the-counter market will be administrated by entities which operate after previous authorisation of the CVM, which will issue general rules regarding:

- The conditions for their constitution and dissolution, their legal form, and the appointment of members of their boards;
- The exercise of disciplinary authority over their members, the imposition of penalties, and cases of exclusion;
- The requirements or conditions for admission regarding credibility, financial capacity, and technical qualifications of the managers and officers of their members; and
- The management of the entities, fees, commissions, and any other amount charged by the entities or their members, as the case may be.

The CVM will issue regulations specifying:

- The cases in which the registration may be dispensed with, refused, suspended, or cancelled;
- The information and documents which must be submitted by the corporation for obtaining registration and the respective procedures; and
- The cases in which the securities may be simultaneously negotiated on a stock exchange and on the over-the-counter market, organised or not. The CVM will issue rules regarding the nature of the minimum information and its periodical presentation by any party who has access to relevant information.

CVM Instruction Number 461 of 23 October 2007, amended by CVM Instruction Number 468 of 18 April 2008, governs the securities regulated markets in Brazil and the incorporation, organisation, operation, and winding-up of stock exchanges, commodities and futures exchanges, and organised and non-organised over-the-counter markets. The only relevant Brazilian exchange is the BM&FBOVESPA SA (Securities, Commodities and Futures Exchange), which is responsible for all the organised markets (stocks, commodities and futures, and over-the-counter market).

An organised market of securities will be considered by the CVM as an organised stock exchange or an organised over-the-counter market, depending on:

- The existence of a system or environment for registration of operations previously effected;
- The rules adopted in their transaction environments or systems for pricing, as described below, in the case of a stock exchange or of an organised over-the-counter market;
- The possibility of direct participation in the market, with no intervention of any intermediary;
- The possibility of postponing the disclosure of information on the transactions carried out;
- The volume traded in their environments and systems; and
- The investor audience targeted by the market.

Stock Exchange markets are those that:

- Trade regularly as central and multilateral trading systems that enable the matching and the interaction of offers for the purchase and sale of securities; or
- Allow the transaction of business, whether subject or not to the interference of other persons authorised to trade in the market, where a counterpart is a market maker that undertakes the obligation of placement of firm offers for purchase and sale, provided that (a) the participation of a market maker be regulated by the Stock Exchange, pursuant to the specific regulation of the CVM for market makers, and inspected by the Self-Regulation Department, (b) the Stock Exchange establishes maximum limits for the difference between the purchase and sale prices offered by the market maker; and (c) the interference of other persons authorised to trade in interval between the offers of purchase and sale, insofar as for the entire amount of that transaction.

A centralised and multilateral system is considered that system in which all the offers referring to the same security are directed to the same trading channel, and are exposed to the acceptance and competition by all the parties authorised to negotiate in the system. The Stock Exchange trading environment or system will have the characteristics, procedure, and trading rules previously established and disclosed that permanently enable:

- Regular, adequate, and efficient pricing;
- Prompt conduct, visibility, and registration of the transactions carried out; and
- Public dissemination of offers and business involving the assets traded thereon timely, comprehensively, and in sufficient details for the proper market information and pricing.

When the application involves a centralised and multilateral trading system, pricing will be made through interacting offers, in which preference is given to the one that represents the best price, with due regard for the chronological sequence of the offers entered into the system or trading environment, except in the cases of special trading procedures established by regulation. The Stock Exchange trading rules are intended to:

- Avoid or curb modes of fraud or manipulation designed to create artificial conditions of demand, offer, or price of securities traded in its environments;

- Ensure that all persons authorised to trade in their environments receive equal treatment, subject to the distinctions among the categories that may be specified in their bylaws and regulation;
- Avoid or curb non-equitable practices in its environments; and
- Establish the variations of prices and quantities offered, in its trading environment that is described as centralised and multilateral, which require the adoption of special trading procedures, as well as the operating procedures required when these variations are reached, subject to the minimum conditions established by the CVM in a specific regulation.

The organised over-the-counter market may trade in one or more of the following forms:

- As a centralised and multilateral trading system, and which enables the matching and interaction of offers for the purchase and sale of securities;
- By carrying out transactions, whether subject or not to the interference of other persons authorised to trade in the market that undertakes the obligation to place firm purchase and sale offers; or
- Through the registration of transactions previously carried out.

In an organised over-the-counter market, the trading or registration of transactions previously carried out may occur without the direct participation of an intermediary that is a member of the Securities Distribution System, provided that, in this case, according to the regulation procedures, the settlement of the transaction is contractually guaranteed by the managing entity of an organised over-the-counter market or, alternatively, directly by the parties to the transaction.

The trading environments and systems of an organised over-the-counter market must have the characteristics, procedures, and rules of negotiation previously established and disclosed that enable, on a permanent basis, a regular, adequate, and efficient pricing, as well as the prompt trading and registration of the transactions effected.

In the case of a centralised and multilateral trading system, pricing will be made by interacting offers, in which preference will be given to offers that represent the best price, according to the chronological order of entry of offers into the trading environment or system, except in the cases of special trading procedures provided for in a regulation.

In the case of a market in which the counter parties are market makers their action will be regulated and inspected by the managing entity of an organised over-the-counter market, pursuant to the terms of a specific CVM regulation for market makers. The rules of trade of the trading system of organised over-the-counter markets are intended to:

- Prevent or curb modes of fraud or manipulation designed to create artificial demand, offer, or price conditions of the securities traded in their environments;
- Ensure equal treatment to the persons authorised to trade in their environments, subject to the distinctions between categories that are stipulated in their bylaws and regulations; and
- Prevent or curb non-equitable practices in their environments.

The CVM may order the transformation of the organised over-the-counter market in a stock exchange, the change of operation procedures or rules of the organised over-the-counter market, or the amendment of waivers or special authorities granted by reason of actual characteristics of the market.

The operation and dissolution of organised markets of securities depends on the CVM's prior approval. Organised markets of securities may be divided into trading segments, taking the characteristics of the transactions carried out, the securities traded, the issuers thereof, the transaction system used, and the quantities traded into account. The operation and dissolution of the trading segment are contingent upon the CVM's prior consent, in writing. Every information or advertising material referring to organised markets of securities will mention, in an outstanding manner, its nature of either a stock exchange or an organised over-the-counter market.

Publicly Held Corporations

A corporation will be publicly held or closely held depending on whether its securities are accepted for trading in the securities market. Only securities issued by a corporation registered in the CVM may be traded in the securities market. No securities may be publicly distributed in the market without previous registration with the CVM.

The CVM may classify publicly held corporations in categories according to the types and classes of securities issued by it and traded in the market, and will specify the regulations for publicly held companies applicable to each category.

The registration of a publicly held corporation for shares to be traded in the market may only be cancelled if the corporation that issued the shares, the majority shareholder, or the controlling corporation directly or indirectly makes a public offering to acquire the entirety of outstanding shares for a fair price, at least equal to the appraised worth of the corporation, calculated based on one or more of the following criteria:

- Net assets appraised at market value;
- Discounted cash flow;
- Comparison by multiples;
- Share quotation in the securities market; or
- Another criteria adopted by the CVM.

If less than five per cent of all shares issued by the corporation are outstanding after the expiration of the term for public offering established by the regulation issued by the CVM, the general meeting may decide to redeem these shares for the amount of the offer, as long as it deposits the redemption amount at a bank authorised by the CVM.

If the majority shareholder or the controlling corporation acquires shares of a publicly held corporation under its control, and these shares directly or indirectly increase their interest in a certain class of shares in a way that hinders the market liquidity of the remaining shares, they will be required to make a public offering for a price determined for the acquisition of all shares remaining in the market, according to the general rules issued by the CVM.

Shareholders holding at least 10 per cent of outstanding shares of a publicly held corporation may request the officers to call a special general meeting with holders of outstanding shares in order to determine a new appraisal, based on the same or on different criteria from those originally adopted, for purposes of determining the valuation of the company.

The request must be delivered within 15 days from the announcement of the price attributed to the public offer, accompanied by a justification and evidence of inadequacy or misuse of the calculation methodology or the valuation criteria. The shareholders holding at least 10 per cent of outstanding shares may call the applicable meeting if the officers fail to do so within eight days of the date of the request. Outstanding shares include all issued shares of a publicly held corporation less the shares held by controlling shareholders, officers and directors, and treasury shares.

Those shareholders who request a new valuation and those shareholders who vote in favour of the new valuation will reimburse the company of all costs incurred with the new valuation if the new valuation amount is lower than or equal to the initial amount of the public offer. Therefore, a corporation will be considered to be as publicly held when its securities are accepted for trading on the Stock Exchange or over-the-counter market. the CVM will issue regulations applicable to publicly held corporations concerning:

- The kind of information which must be supplied and how often;
- The management report and financial statements;
- The purchase of shares issued by the corporation itself and the disposal of treasury shares;
- The accounting standards and reports and opinions of independent auditors;
- The information supplied by officers, members of the statutory audit committee, and controlling and small shareholders relating to the purchase, exchange, or sale of securities issued by the corporation and by controlled or parent corporations;
- The disclosure of resolutions of the general meeting and the corporation's management bodies, or of relevant events occurring in its operations which may considerably influence the decisions of investors to buy or sell securities issued by the corporation;
- The holding, by publicly held corporations with shares traded on the Stock Exchange or organised over-the-counter market, of annual meetings with their shareholders and securities market participants, in the city where most of the operations involving the corporation's securities took place the year before, in order to disclose their financial situation and projected figures, and to answer requests for clarifications; and
- Other topics envisaged by law.

Portfolio Management and Custody of Securities

The professional management of securities portfolios of other individuals is subject to prior authorisation of the CVM. This will apply to the professional management of funds and securities delivered to the administrator, with authorisation for such administrator to buy or sell securities on behalf of the principal. The CVM will establish the rules to be observed by the managers and their remuneration, proposing to the CMN maximum limits for such remuneration.

The CVM will authorise securities custody activities, to be carried out exclusively by financial institutions and entities of clearing and settlement. Custody of securities is defined as the activities of depositing securities for safekeeping, receiving dividends or stock dividends, redemption, amortisation, or reimbursement, and exercise of underwriting rights, without the depositary having powers to transfer securities deposited or reinvest amounts received, except upon the express authorisation of the depositor in each instance.

The portfolio manager and the custodian may not exercise the voting rights of the shares under their management or custody, except in the event of a mandate for a period of no longer than one year.

Independent Auditors, Securities Analysts, and Consultants

Only audit firms or independent auditors which are registered with the CVM may audit, for the purposes of the Securities Law, the financial statements of publicly held corporations and institutions, companies, or other entities which compose the Securities Distribution System. The CVM will determine the conditions for registration and the respective procedures, and will define the cases in which such registration may be denied, suspended, or cancelled. CVM Instruction Number 308 of 14 May 1999 regulates the registration procedure and activities performance of independent auditors in the securities market.

Independent auditors or auditing firms will be subject to civil liability for any losses caused to third parties as a result of fraud or fault in the exercise of their functions.[4] Independent auditors of auditing firms are administratively responsible, before Bacen, for the acts or omissions when auditing financial institutions and other entities that are authorised to function by Bacen.[5] In this case, Bacen is responsible for enforcing on the offenders the penalties provided for in the Securities Law. The CVM may establish regulations regarding the activities of securities analysts and consultants.

International Financial Reporting Standards

Law Number 11.638 of 28 December 2007 amends and revokes certain provisions of the Corporation Law and the Securities Law, and extends to large companies the provisions regarding the preparation and disclosure of financial statements. The Law introduces in Brazil the international accounting standards, ie, the pronouncements issued by the International Accounting Standards Board (IASB), the so-called International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS).

With the adoption of the IFRS, the Brazilian cost is reduced, mainly for the foreign investor who was obliged to maintain an exclusive department for the preparation and analysis of the financial statements of the companies established in Brazil. According to the rules, assets and liabilities of the Brazilian companies will be registered by their market value and no longer for their acquisition cost. This will assure more reality in the examination of the solvency conditions of the companies.

5 Securities Law, art 26, para 3.

As a result of Law Number 11.638/07, Brazilian publicly held corporations must regularly disclose cash flow and aggregate value statements. This will enable investors to better know the company's cash flow. However, any closely held corporation with a net worth value of less than R $2 million on the date of the balance sheet will not be obliged to prepare and publish a cash flow statement.

The Law applies not only to the publicly held corporations, but also to the closely held companies, even those that are not incorporated in the form of corporations (sociedades anônimas), if they are deemed to be large companies. For the purpose of Law Number 11.638/07, 'large company' is the company or group of companies under common control that has, in the precedent fiscal year, total assets above the amount of R $240 million or an annual gross revenue exceeding R $300 million. Therefore, a limited liability company (sociedade empresária limitada) or any other type of legal entity which complies with such requirements also will be considered a large company. All large companies, regardless of their corporate form, must follow the new rules about bookkeeping and preparation of financial statements and hire an independent auditor duly registered with the CVM to audit such financial statements. Law Number 11.638 came into force on 1 January 2009.

CVM Instruction Number 457 of 13 July 2007, which governs the preparation and disclosure of consolidated financial statements according to the IFRS as issued by the IASB, was enacted before Law Number 11.638/07 and determines that publicly held corporations will present their consolidated financial statements complying with such requirement starting from reporting periods ending in 2010. This also is applied to the consolidated financial statements of the previous fiscal year presented for comparison purposes.

Until the reporting period ending in 2009, publicly held corporations may, optionally, present their consolidated financial statements in accordance with the IFRS as issued by the IASB, in lieu of Brazilian accounting standards. As a result of adopting this option, and in addition to the other applicable provisions required by the CVM, the explanatory notes to the consolidated financial statements will include a reconciliation illustrating the effects of events that produced differences between the amounts of shareholders' equity and of profit or loss of the parent company, comparing such amounts with those of the consolidated equity and of profit or loss. Those companies that adopt this optional procedure are not obliged to present, for comparison purposes, the consolidated financial statements of the previous reporting period prepared under the Brazilian accounting standards. Independent auditors must issue an opinion about the consolidated financial statements prepared according to the IFRS, as well as about the explanatory note referred to above.

Investment Funds

The mutual industry fund in Brazil is highly regulated and is subject to the control and supervision of the CVM.[6] Under the current regulations, 'investment fund' is the gathering of capital, in the form of a condominium, aimed at the investment in shares and stock and any other kind of instrument available in the financial and capital markets. Therefore, unlike other jurisdictions, a Brazilian fund is a condominium and not a legal entity.

Management of the fund's portfolio is the professional management, as established in the regulation, of its securities, developed by an individual or a legal entity registered in the administrator of the securities portfolio by the CVM, having the manager powers to trade, in the name of the investment fund, these securities.

Market Makers

A 'market maker' is a person, brokerage, dealer, bank, or institution that stands ready to buy and sell a particular stock on a regular and continuous basis at a publicly quoted price. Market makers play an important role in maintaining liquidity and guaranteeing price reference for the particular securities for which they are registered to trade.

The role of market maker at BM&FBOVESPA may be performed by trading members, non-member-broker dealers, investment banks, and multi-service banks that manage investment portfolios. There are two types of market maker:

- The independent market maker — The market maker has links neither with the issuing corporation nor with its holders/major shareholders, being committed to making the market without ties with the company, holding group, or shareholders; and
- The contracted market maker — The market maker signs an agreement with the issuing corporation, holding group, affiliates, or any shareholder to make the market for a given security. In this case, remuneration is freely agreed between parts.

This possibility is highly important in the Brazilian scenario, where the number of assets available is generally low. Therefore, the issuing corporation is allowed to take part in this process to improve the liquidity of its securities in the market.

Foreign Exchanges

CVM Instruction Number 461/07 introduced the conditions a foreign exchange has to comply with to offer to Brazilian intermediaries access to its electronic trading venues. The foreign stock exchange willing to establish the access screens to their trading systems in Brazil, in the institutions that are members of the Securities Distribution System, must obtain CVM prior approval, to be granted, provided that the candidate for CVM authorisation:

- Is recognised as a stock exchange and is duly authorised to trade as such in its country of origin;
- Is subject to the supervision of the regulatory authority of the capital market of its country of origin, with which the CVM maintains an arrangement or agreement for international cooperation or which is a signatory to the Multilateral Memorandum of Understanding of the International Organisation of Securities; and

- The requisites required for authorisation and operation of stock exchanges in the applicant's country of origin are substantially equivalent to those provided for in the CVM regulations.

The CVM authorisation depends on the accessibility, sufficiency, and quality of the information concerning the assets negotiated in a foreign Stock Exchange, as well as of their issuers, if applicable. In confirming the requisites specified in the general provisions, the CVM will consider, among other characteristics considered relevant, if it is a derivative contract. The underlying asset of which has homogeneous characteristics is produced and quoted on international level, and the accounting standard according to which the financial statements of issuers of the assets traded. The authorisation for installation of a trading screen will exempt the issuers and securities traded thereon from registration, and the authorisation may be limited to specific assets and issuers or to some trading segments.

Enforcement Attributions of the CVM

To enforce the Securities Law, the CVM may:

- Examine and extract examples of accounting records, books or documents, including electronic programmes, magnetic and optical files, as well as any other files, and the paperwork of independent auditors (all of which must be organised and preserved intact for at least five years) regarding (a) individuals and corporations pertaining to the Securities Distribution System; (b) publicly held corporations and other issuers of securities and, whenever there are indicia of illegal activities, of the corresponding controlling and controlled companies, affiliated companies, and companies under common control; (c) investment funds and corporations; (d) securities portfolios and custodians; (e) independent auditors; (f) securities analysts and consultants; and (g) any other individuals or legal entities whenever they participate in any irregularities, which will be investigated according to the fifth item below, to ensure the non-occurrence of any illegal acts and inequitable acts;
- Issue subpoenas requesting information or clarifications to the persons indicated above, under penalty of a fine, without prejudice to the other penalties set forth below;
- Request information from any government agency, autonomous institution, or public corporation;
- Require publicly held corporations to republish their financial statements, reports, or information released, duly corrected or amended;
- Investigate, through administrative proceedings, illegal acts and inequitable practices of managers, members of the finance committee, and shareholders of publicly held corporations, intermediaries, and other market participants; and
- Apply penalties to any person committing the violations referred to in the previous item, regardless of civil or criminal responsibility.

In order to prevent or correct abnormal market situations, the CVM may:

- Suspend trading of securities or declare the recess of a Stock Exchange;
- Suspend or cancel the registrations provided for in the Securities Law;

- Publish information or recommendations for the purpose of informing or advising market participants; and
- Prohibit market participants, under the penalty of fine, from performing any activities it may specify which it considers to be harmful to normal market functioning.[7]

The determination of illegal acts and inequitable practices may be preceded by an investigation process, which will ensure the secrecy that the public interest demands, which is necessary for clearing the facts, and will be subject to the procedure established by the CVM.

In the investigation into the infringement of regulations under the securities market, the CVM will prioritise the violation of the severe nature of the law, which penalties will educate and prevent the individuals participating in the market. The CVM will have authority to investigate as well as to impose penalties on the violators of the laws under the market when:

- It causes damages to individuals living in Brazil, wherever the accident has happened; or
- Material actions or omissions have happened in Brazil.

The CVM may enter into agreements with similar entities in other countries, or with international entities, for assistance and cooperation in the investigations relating to infringement of regulations pertaining to the securities market occurring in Brazil and abroad. The CVM may refuse to provide the assistance referred to herein when the public interest needs to be preserved. This also will apply to information deemed confidential by law. The following penalties may be imposed by the CVM on the violators of any provision of the Securities Law, the Corporation Law, or CVM Resolutions, as well as any other legal provisions which are the CVM's responsibility to enforce:

- Warning;
- Fine;
- Suspension from duties of a director, administrator, or member of the fiscal council or statutory audit committee of a publicly held corporation, from an entity taking part in the Securities Distribution System, or from other bodies which require authorisation by, or registration with, the CVM;
- Temporary disqualification, up to a maximum period of 20 years, from occupying the posts mentioned in the previous item;
- Suspension of the authorisation or registration for the execution of the activities covered by the Securities Law;
- Cancellation of the registration or of the authorisation to carry out the activities covered by the Securities Law;

7 When the public interest demands, the CVM may disclose the establishment of any such procedure.

- Temporary prohibition, up to a maximum period of 20 years, from practising certain activities or transactions, to the entities that compose the Securities Distribution System or other entities that depend on authorisation by, or registration with, the CVM; and
- Temporary prohibition, for a maximum period of ten years, to operate, directly or indirectly, in one or more types of transaction in the securities market.

The fine may not exceed the larger of R $500,000, 50 per cent of the amount of the securities issuing or of the irregular operation, or three times the amount of the economic advantage gained or loss avoided due to the violation. Should the offence be repeated, the fines can be imposed and multiplied up to three times or, alternatively, the penalties provided above may be applied.

Crimes against Capital Markets

The Securities Law deals with crimes against capital markets and their respective penalties. To engage in fraudulent transactions or other deceitful action aiming at artificially changing the regular operation of the securities markets in stock exchanges and in futures and commodities exchanges, over-the-counter markets, or organised over-the-counter markets for the purpose of obtaining undue advantages or profits for oneself or others, or to cause damage to third parties, may result in imprisonment of one to eight years and a fine of up to three times the amount of the undue advantage obtained as a result of the crime.

To use relevant information not yet disclosed to the market, which one may know and which must remain confidential, so as to create undue advantages, for oneself or others, through the negotiation of securities, on one's behalf or on behalf of others may result in imprisonment of one to five years and a fine of up to three times the amount of the undue advantage obtained as a result of the crime.

To act in the securities market, whether free of charge or not, as an institution belonging to the distribution system, as a collective or individual portfolio manager, self-employed investment agent, independent auditor, securities analyst, or fiduciary agent or to exercise any position, profession, activity, or function without being so authorised by or registered at the applicable administrative authority, when required by law or regulation, may result in imprisonment of six months to two years and a fine.

The fines imposed on the crimes of market manipulation or misuse of privileged information will be applied according to the damage caused or the undue advantage obtained by the agent. In case of repeated offence, the fine may be tripled.

Anti-Money Laundering Regulations

CVM Instruction Number 463 of 8 January 2008 amends the rules dealing with crimes on money laundering or concealment of assets, rights, and valuables, originally established by CVM Instruction Number 301 of 16 April 1999, and sets forth the procedures to be observed for the follow-up of transactions entered into by people politically exposed. The provisions incorporate in Brazilian regulations the FATF recommendations[8] designed to counter the use of the financial system by criminals and prevent terrorist financing and enable the supervision of the financial transactions made by people politically exposed.

The definition of 'people politically exposed' includes anyone who had a relevant public position, job, or function within the last five years in Brazil or in another country, foreign territory, and dependence, as well as his representatives, family members, and other persons of close relationship and comprises heads of state or of the government, high-level politicians, public servants, judges, or militaries and leaders of state-owned companies or of political parties, their first degree direct relatives, and the spouse, companion, or stepson or stepdaughter.

The main changes introduced by the CVM are related to the new obligations to be performed by the legal entities whose activity is the custody, issuance, distribution, settlement, negotiation, intermediation, or administration of securities, ie, banks, brokerage house companies, and fund managers, as well as entities which administer exchanges and the organised over-the-counter market.

These entities must keep registry of every transaction involving securities, regardless of its value, in order to permit the verification of the financial movement of each client, based on the defined criteria adopted by the institution in its control procedures, regarding the assets and financial situation shown in the client's registration form, considering the amounts paid to settle these transactions, the amounts or assets deposited as collateral in transactions carried out in future settlement markets, and the transfer of securities for the client's custody account.

The registration forms of the active clients must be updated by the institution each 24 months. All the relevant information (the registration form, the registries, and the documentation) must be maintained by the institution at the disposal of the CVM for a minimum term of five years as of the date the account is closed or of the latest transaction made in the name of the respective client. This term may be extended for an undetermined period of time in the event that there is an investigation conducted by the CVM and provided that this fact is formally notified to the person or institution. Transactions with securities which deserve special attention on the part of the institutions include those:

- Made between the same parties or having as beneficiaries the same parties, in which there is a repeated gain or loss with respect to any of the involved persons;
- Made with the purpose of producing a loss or gain and for which there is no an objective economic substance;
- Made with individuals resident or companies incorporated in countries and territories identified as non-cooperative in the circular-letters issued by the Council of Control of Financial Activities (COAF);

8 These recommendations have been made by the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering (FATF), which was established by the G-7 Summit in Paris in 1989 to develop a coordinated international response to set out the measures national governments should take to implement effective anti-money laundering programmes, and have been recognised, endorsed, or adopted by many international bodies.

- Settled in cash, if and when permitted;
- Made through private transfers of funds and securities, without any apparent motivation;
- Whose degree of complexity and risk seems incompatible with the technical qualification of the client or of his representative;
- Made with deposits or transfers made by third parties, for the settlement of transactions of the client, or for the rendering of guarantees in transactions carried out in future settlement markets; and
- Made through payment to third parties, under any form whatsoever, to settle transactions or redeem amounts deposited as collateral, registered in the name of the client.

In addition, an additional care is specially required in the case of certain clients, ie, non-resident investors, mainly when a trust or incorporated as a company with bearer shares, private banking clients, and persons politically exposed.

Any suspect transaction or proposal thereof must be reported by the institution to the CVM within 24 hours of the date it happens. When the client is included in the definition of 'persons politically exposed', this must be highlighted in the communication made to the CVM. The transactions are considered to be related to terrorism or its financing when performed by individuals who practice or plan to practice terrorist acts, or who participate therein or facilitate their practice, as well as by entities owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by any such individuals and the individuals and entities who/which operate under their command.

Any financial institution or similar entity must develop and implement a manual of control procedures to comply with the requirements of the CVM Instruction and maintain a continuous training programme for its employees, aimed to divulgate the control and anti-money laundering procedures adopted by the institution. The institution must also have a director in charge of the performance of such obligations, who will have access to all the registration forms and data of all clients and to the information of any and all transactions made by clients.

Introduction

Regulatory System

The Canadian securities regulatory regime is designed to regulate the investment of capital in business enterprises and the resale of securities issued in consideration for that capital. Through these regulations, the Canadian regime provides safeguards which protect the investing public and promote confidence in the Canadian capital markets.

The regulatory framework is based on the securities regulatory model developed in the United States. Two principal activities are regulated. Firstly, the registration and control of market participants involved in the trading of securities are regulated through the imposition of a registration requirement whereby any person who purports to trade, advise, or underwrite the issue of securities must register unless an exemption from registration is otherwise available. Secondly, the disclosure of material information by issuers who propose to distribute securities to the public is regulated:

- Through the imposition of a prospectus requirement; and
- By imposing an obligation on publicly held companies to provide continuous disclosure about their activities.

Legal Sources

Canadian securities legislation is the domain of the 10 Canadian provinces and, accordingly, each province has enacted and administers its own securities legislation.

However, considerable uniformity exists between the provincial regimes, particularly in the regulation of primary and secondary market trading. Sources of securities law vary slightly from province to province, but they can generally be summarised as follows:

- Provincial Securities Acts — Each province has passed a statute dealing directly with securities regulation.[1] The Act sets out the broad framework for the regulation of securities trading generally in the province.
- Provincial Regulations — Each provincial Securities Act will have a corresponding set of regulations which set out much of the detail of how the Provincial Act will be administered.[2] These regulations are passed pursuant to powers granted under the Provincial Acts. Many of the requirements also are found in 'forms' included in the regulations. For example, regulations may include forms that prescribe the contents of prospectuses, proxy circulars, and take-over bid circulars.
- Regulatory Bodies — Typically, the provincial Securities Acts and regulations delegate adjudicative and administrative powers to a panel of commissioners (referred to as the provincial Securities Commission) or an administrator for that province.[3] The local provincial Securities Commission is the source of much of the securities law for that province. The provincial Securities Commissions are discussed in detail below under 'Authorities'.
- Policy Statements — Generally, the provincial Securities Commissions have the power to issue policy statements which set out the way in which their discretionary powers will be exercised. Typically, these statements will outline the broad policy to be applied

2 Securities Regulation (Ontario), RRO 1990, Regulation 1015, as amended; Alberta Securities Commission Rules, Alta Reg 46/87, as amended; Securities Rules (British Columbia), BC Reg 479/95, as amended; Securities Regulation (Manitoba), Man Reg 491/88R, as amended; General Regulation — Security Frauds Prevention Act (New Brunswick), NB Reg 84-128, as amended; Securities Regulations, 1991 (Newfoundland), Cons Newf, Reg 805/96; Securities Regulations (Nova Scotia), NS Reg 201/87, as amended; Securities Act Regulations (Prince Edward Island), RRPEI 1988, c S-3, as amended; Securities Regulation (Quebec), OC 660-83, as amended; Securities Regulations (Saskatchewan), OC 931/88, as amended.

as well as contain detailed requirements that must be met to meet the exercise of their discretion. Policy statements generally come in three categories: (a) national policy statements, which are joint policy statements agreed to by the provincial Securities Commissions in each province (collectively, the 'Canadian Securities Regulators'), designed to conform treatment across the country to specific issues of national concern; (b) multi-jurisdictional policy statements, which are joint policy statements of a number of the provincial Securities Commissions; and (c) local policy statements, which are statements of the local provincial Securities Commission.

- Blanket Orders and Notices — Blanket orders are normally granted by a provincial Securities Commission where a similar order has been frequently requested or a new policy has been developed for dealing with a particular situation. The blanket order will apply to anyone who fits the terms of the order and will relieve the provincial Securities Commission from dealing with numerous separate orders. Notices are circulated by a provincial Securities Commission to inform those concerned with a particular aspect of securities regulation of a development or proposed change. For example, a notice may advise of a proceeding, a draft policy, or blanket order being considered.
- Decisions and Rulings — Each provincial Securities Commission typically acts as an appeal tribunal from the decision of the administrator and has the power to issue decisions and rulings concerning the application of the provincial legislation. Most decisions of a provincial Securities Commission can be appealed to the Courts of its province. Therefore, decisions of the courts also can be a source of securities law in each province.
- Rules — In some provinces, the provincial Securities Commission has been given the authority to make rules having the effect of regulation in connection with specifically enumerated 'heads of power'.[4] This rule-making authority is intended to provide sufficient authority for the Securities Commission to make rules in respect of matters which are currently the subject of policy instruments or blanket orders or rulings, as well as those securities regulatory matters which may foreseeable arise in the near to medium term.
- Bulletins — Most of the provincial Securities Commissions publish important information about their activities in the form of bulletins which include, for example, notices, blanket orders, decisions, orders and rulings of the commission, new policies, new legislation, cease trade orders, new issues of securities, and insider-trading reports.

Authorities

The securities legislation in each province typically delegates adjudicative and administrative powers to a panel of commissioners known as the provincial Securities Commission. These provincial Securities Commissions are usually two-tiered structures with the first tier consisting of a panel of commissioners and the second tier consisting of an administrative agency headed by a chief administrative officer. The panel of commissioners has the power to make orders and rulings and also acts as an appeal tribunal from the decisions of the administrator. They also have the power to formulate policy and make recommendations to government for changes in legislation and regulation. The administrator, in comparison, exercises the administrative function assigned to the administrator under the provincial securities legislation and implements the decisions or directives of the commissioners. In a few provinces, Securities Commissions have not been created. Instead, the administrative responsibilities are assigned to government officials or administrators appointed under the provincial securities legislation.

There also are four principal stock exchanges in Canada which provide a major regulatory function. The four stock exchanges are:

- The Toronto Stock Exchange;
- The Montreal Exchange;
- The Vancouver Stock Exchange; and
- The Alberta Stock Exchange.

These exchanges are self-regulating, non-profit organisations created by statute to facilitate the trading of securities through members of the exchange. Each exchange passes its own by-laws and rules which govern the qualifications and continued fitness of members for membership in the exchange, set out requirements for the listing of securities and the conditions to be met by listed issuers to maintain their listing, and govern the manner in which trading in listed securities is to be conducted by members.[5] They also may issue policy statements providing guidelines as to how they will exercise the discretion given to them by their by-laws or rules.

The Investment Dealers' Association of Canada is another self-regulatory organisation of which all investment dealers in Canada are required to be members. The Investment Dealers' Association has rules regarding the conduct of its members and also dictates the qualifications required of its members.[6]

There are a number of other self-regulatory organisations such as clearing agencies and depositary institutions which are involved in the trading of securities and dictate the procedures and policies applicable to their function in the Canadian capital markets.

Procedures

The securities legislation in most provinces is based on the premise that investors are most effectively protected by requiring as many issuers of securities as possible to comply with 5 Toronto Stock Exchange General By-Laws, Rules, and Related Notices and Toronto Stock Exchange Company Manual (cited as 'TSE Company Manual'); Montreal Exchange (Bourse de Montreal) By-Laws, Rules, and Related Policies; Vancouver Stock Exchange By-Laws, Rules, and Related Policies; Alberta Stock Exchange General By-Laws and Member's Manual.

6 Investment Dealers Association By-Laws 1-37, Regulations 100-2300, and Related Policies and Forms.

the disclosure requirements of the legislation. The procedure adopted to accomplish this is described as the 'closed system'. The closed system ensures that securities that have not been qualified by prospectus disclosure will not be sold into the public markets and become freely tradable unless and until adequate public disclosure relating to those securities and their issuer is available and remains available through compliance with the continuous disclosure requirements. The closed system therefore requires that, before securities can be distributed to the public, a prospectus must have been filed and receipted by the provincial Securities Commission in each province in which the securities are to be offered.

The closed system recognises that full compliance in certain situations would be unduly burdensome and unnecessary. Therefore, it provides exemptions from the prospectus requirements based on criteria such as the nature of the securities, the transaction, or the participants in the transactions. However, where securities are issued in reliance on an exemption, they remain in the closed system and are prohibited from being freely traded in the secondary market until the prospectus disclosure requirements are met or a further exemption is available. In addition, there may be applicable hold periods, depending on the nature of the exemption relied on when the securities were acquired.

Market Participants

In General. As a general proposition, absent being able to rely on a statutory exemption, only a properly registered entity can trade, underwrite, or advise in connection with securities transactions in Canada, whether in the primary or secondary markets. Canadian securities legislation generally provides broad definitions of the activities contemplated by the terms 'trade', 'underwrite', and 'advise', and an entity may be required to be registered as a result of one or more of these activities. The definition of 'trade' for these purposes is broadly defined, and it would include the disposition or sale for value of a security or an act in furtherance of such a disposition or sale.

Acts in furtherance of a disposition or sale would include things such as advertisement, solicitation, direct or indirect negotiation, or other conduct to facilitate a disposition or sale. The definition of 'underwriting' includes both purchasing as principle for resale, and also acting as agent in connection with a distribution, although subject to some exclusions. The definition of 'advise' applies to anyone engaging in, or holding themselves out as engaging in, the business of advising others on investments.

Registration Requirements. The definition of 'trade' specifically excludes the purchase of a security; thus, investors (other than certain institutional investors who wish to rely on exemptions available only to sophisticated purchasers) are generally not required to be registered. The registration requirement primarily catches those market participants involved in the selling and marketing of securities.

The intent of the registration requirement is to ensure that only reputable and qualified entities are involved in the selling and marketing of securities to the public. Registration encourages honesty, competence, and financial responsibility among registrants,[7] and it assists the Canadian Securities Regulators in pursuing enforcement actions where these objectives are not met.

Registrants may be required to be registered in one or more categories depending on their activities. The trading function (whether as principal or agent) gives rise to a requirement to be registered as a 'dealer'. In some provinces, the 'universal registration' system, described below, creates multiple categories of dealer registration.

The underwriting function gives rise to a separate registration requirement. Registered dealers are deemed to be registered as underwriters, although the underwriter registration is limited in a manner consistent with the registered entity's permitted trading activities (eg, an international dealer is deemed to be registered as an underwriter for securities offering primarily outside Canada). Other entities not registered as dealers may obtain registration as an underwriter, but this is not typical.

The advising function also gives rise to a separate registration requirement. Again, registered dealers are not required to register as advisers since they are specifically permitted to provide advice incidental to their dealer functions. Registration requirements apply both at the corporate level (requiring registration as a dealer, underwriter, or adviser) and at the individual level (applying to all trading or advising personnel under the sponsorship of the corporate registrant).

Registration is granted on application to the relevant provincial Securities Commission and is at the discretion of the Securities Commission (or the designated administrative arms), which also has discretion to impose any conditions on a particular registration and to suspend or cancel an existing registration. In most cases, registration must be renewed annually. Applications for registration are generally straightforward, and they must be in prescribed form. The main responsibilities applicable to registrants are in the areas of:

- Educational and proficiency requirements;
- Capital requirements;
- Contributions to the Canadian Investor Protection Fund (CIPF); and
- Financial reporting and the keeping of records.

Registrants also are required to notify the provincial Securities Commissions of changes in the information contained in an application for registration. Again, compliance with ongoing registration requirements is fairly straightforward.

Although the registration requirement arises from securities legislation, primary responsibility for supervision of registrants has largely been delegated to self-regulatory organisations (such as the Canadian stock exchanges, all of whose members are registrants, as well as the Investment Dealers' Association). The Canadian Securities Regulators also retain broad enforcement powers regarding registrants and registration matters.

7 United States readers should note the different terminology under Canadian securities legislation, where the term 'registrants' are generally dealers, underwriters, and advisers, rather than issuers.

Registration Exemptions. Having set out the general requirement of registration to trade, underwrite, or advise, Canadian securities legislation provides a number of exemptions from the requirement to register as a dealer or adviser in certain circumstances. These exemptions, which generally relate to certain types of securities and types of trades, coupled with corresponding exemptions from the prospectus requirements discussed below, establish an 'exempt market' in Canada.

A discussion of all of the registration exemptions is beyond the scope of this chapter. Furthermore, many such exemptions are unlikely to be relevant in the international context. However, there are several registration exemptions that commonly arise in international securities transactions or may affect non-Canadian dealers, such as where securities are sold to sophisticated investors or in substantial amounts. These exemptions generally mirror available prospectus exemptions, and are discussed in more detail in the text below, relating to 'Trading Rules-Securities Offerings-Private Placements'.

Universal Registration. Some Canadian provinces, including Ontario, have created the overlay of 'universal registration' through the 'market intermediary' concept.[8] Under universal registration, any person who acts as a market intermediary (which is very broadly defined to capture activities relating to trading as principal or agent), is precluded from relying on most of the important registration exemptions unless registered under this scheme. In effect, universal registration brings persons who would otherwise be able to operate in the exempt market back under the registration requirement.

Under universal registration, dealers are registered in one or more of 10 categories of dealer registration, depending on the residency of the entity and the nature of the activities undertaken. Dealer registration categories include those of broker, investment dealer, and securities dealer.

There are two categories of registration that are particularly relevant to foreign dealers, ie, the international dealer registration and the international advisor registration. These registrations permit foreign dealers to carry on prescribed activities in Ontario without setting up a place of business.

International Dealer Registration. A foreign dealer with an international dealer registration in Ontario is entitled to trade in certain permitted securities with particular categories of investors under available prospectus exemptions.[9] Registration as an international dealer is simple and straightforward. The registrant is required to file with the Ontario Securities Commission (OSC) a prescribed form, a number of supporting documents, and a fee.

9 See Securities Regulation (Ontario), s 208.

Once registered as an international dealer, all salesmen, partners, and officials of the foreign dealer are exempt from the registration requirements when trading in securities in Ontario. It is through this registration that many United States and European dealers are permitted to extend international equity offerings into Canada on a private placement basis, as described in the text, below, relating to 'Trading Rules-Securities Offerings-Private Placements'.

International Advisor Registration. A foreign dealer who is seeking to provide advisory services to clients in Ontario or to clients distributing securities in Ontario will need to register as an international advisor before undertaking any advisory services.[10]

Registration as an international adviser will permit a foreign dealer to act as an adviser to clients in Ontario in respect of 'foreign securities', defined as securities issued by a non-Canadian corporation or government, and it permits them to provide advice in Ontario in respect of Canadian securities, but only to the extent that such activities are incidental to acting as an adviser in respect of foreign securities. The registrant is required to file with the Ontario Securities Commission a prescribed form, a number of supporting documents, and a fee.

Securities

In General. As in other legal systems, many securities in Canada are issued without complying with the requirement that dealers, underwriters, and advisers be registered, and without a prospectus. In Canadian terminology, these securities remain within the closed system and, provided appropriate exemptions continue to be available, such securities (typically, though not necessarily, of smaller private issuers) can be held and, in limited circumstances, transferred. There are a number of available prospectus exemptions which permit the distribution and sale of securities within the closed system. Those that are particularly relevant in the international context are discussed in more detail in the text, below, relating to 'Trading Rules, Securities Offerings, Private Placements'.

However, for securities to be issued to the public and become freely tradable afterwards, they must be initially placed, or otherwise move outside, the closed system, either as a result of being qualified under a prospectus, or by other means. Once outside the closed system, securities are generally freely tradable without a prospectus, but they generally must be traded through a registrant (or under an available exemption from the registration requirement).

Types of Trades Triggering Prospectus Requirement. Under Canadian securities legislation, as a general proposition, any 'trade' (as noted above, broadly defined) that constitutes a 'distribution' triggers the prospectus requirement. Essentially, three types of trades constitute a distribution, namely:

- Treasury issuance;
- Sale by a 'control person' (a statutory term generally meaning a 20-per-cent- or-greater security holder); or 10 See Ontario Securities Commission Policy 4.8, 'Non-Resident Advisers' (1988), 11 Ontario Securities Commission Bulletin 4569 (cited as 'OSCB').

- Trade by an issuer of previously issued securities that have been redeemed, repurchased, or donated back to the issuer.

Consequences of Filing Prospectus. As in other jurisdictions, a prospectus (which follows prescribed form under Canadian securities legislation) is a document which is intended to provide disclosure about the issuer and the security sufficient to permit prospective purchasers to make an informed investment decision. Preparation and clearance of prospectuses are the subject of more detailed treatment in the text, below, relating to 'Trading Rules-Securities Offerings-Full Canadian Offering'. However, it should be noted that two important consequences flow from filing a prospectus in Canada, namely:

- The issuer becomes a 'reporting issuer' subject to continuous disclosure and other requirements in each Canadian jurisdiction where the prospectus is filed; and
- Any misrepresentation in a prospectus can result in statutory civil liability for the issuer, its directors, any selling security holder, underwriters, and other parties.

Exemption from Resale Restrictions. Securities initially issued or placed without a prospectus, and therefore subject to resale restrictions, also can exit the closed system and become freely tradable. Under Canadian securities legislation, depending on the circumstances of the initial placement, resale restrictions may be overcome in one of two ways. In each case, the issuer of the security must be a reporting issuer (and, in some cases, must have been so for at least 12 months). If this condition is met, resale restrictions can be overcome if:

- The security has been held for a minimum period (ranging from six to 18 months, depending on the type of security); or
- Proper disclosure of the initial placement was made to the relevant provincial Securities Commission and if no unusual marketing efforts have taken place in connection with the resale.

Exit from the closed system by either method is not possible where the company does not become a reporting issuer (which will typically be the case in the international context). However, it may be possible for securities issued in Canada without a prospectus to be resold outside Canada, provided (among other things) that the principal market for the securities is outside of Canada and the securities are sold through the facilities of a foreign stock exchange.

Periodic Disclosure

Overview of Disclosure Requirements

In General. Once a company acquires reporting issuer status in any of the provinces in Canada, it is thereafter required to comply with the reporting obligations of that province, which typically require that they file the following disclosure documents on a continuous basis.

Annual Financial Statements. Annual financial statements must be filed with the provincial Securities Commissions together with an auditor's report within 140 days of the reporting issuer's year end. The reporting issuer also must deliver the financial statements to each holder of its securities in Canada concurrent with such filing.

Interim Financial Statements. Quarterly financial statements must be filed with the provincial Securities Commissions within 60 days of the end of each quarter. The reporting issuer also must deliver the quarterly financial statements to each holder of its securities in Canada concurrent with such filings.

Annual Information Form and Management Discussion and Analysis Requirements. In most provinces, a reporting issuer is required to file with the provincial Securities Commission an Annual Information Form (AIF) and a Management Discussion and Analysis (MD&A) of its financial condition and results of operations within 140 days of its financial year end. The Management Discussion and Analysis must either accompany the financial statements or accompany or be contained in the annual report of the reporting issuer and must be mailed to shareholders within 140 days of the financial year end.

Insider Reporting. Certain individuals and companies associated with reporting issuers must file insider trading reports in a prescribed form. The term 'insider' for these purposes generally includes:

- Directors and senior officers of a reporting issuer;
- Directors and senior officers of an issuer that is itself an insider or subsidiary of a reporting issuer;
- Any person or company that beneficially owns (directly or indirectly) voting securities of a reporting issuer or that exercises control or direction over voting securities of a reporting issuer, or a combination of both, carrying more than 10 per cent of the voting rights attached to all voting securities of the issuer for the time being outstanding; and
- Any reporting issuer that has purchased, redeemed, or otherwise acquired any of its securities for so long as it holds any of its securities.

Insiders are required to file an initial report disclosing any direct or indirect beneficial ownership of or control or direction over any of the securities of the reporting issuer. The rules also impose an obligation on all insiders to file further reports if there is a change in their ownership of securities.

Material Change Report. If a material change has occurred in the business or affairs of a reporting issuer, the issuer must forthwith issue and file a press release authorised by a senior officer of the reporting issuer, disclosing the nature and substance of the change and then file a corresponding material change report in prescribed form within 10 days following the date on which the material change occurs. A 'material change' is generally defined as:

> A change in the business, operations or capital of the issuer that would have reasonably been expected to have a significant effect on the market price or value of any of > the securities of the issuer and includes a decision to implement such a change made by the board of directors of the issuer or by senior management of the issuer who believe that confirmation of the decision by the board of directors is probable.[11]

In certain circumstances, a 'confidential' material change report, in lieu of the press release and report, may be filed where, in the opinion of the reporting issuer, disclosure of a press release and non-confidential material change report would be unduly detrimental to the interests of the reporting issuer.

Where a company has listed its securities on one of the stock exchanges in Canada, it also must comply with the timely disclosure requirements of the relevant exchange as well as with the disclosure requirements of the provincial securities legislation. The exchange requirements relating to the disclosure of material change are often broader than those under provincial securities legislation.[12]

Sanctions for Non-Compliance

There are several possible sanctions for failure to comply with continuous disclosure requirements or for misrepresentation contained in documents filed in compliance with the continuous disclosure requirements. These sanctions include:

- Penal sanction under most of the provincial securities legislation;
- Compliance orders issued by the provincial Securities Commission;
- Cease trade order by the provincial Securities Commission; or
- Removal of an issuer's right to use the various exemptions provided by the relevant provincial securities legislation.

There is currently no statutory civil liability for misrepresentation in secondary market disclosure documents, such as financial statements, proxy circulars, material change reports, and insider-trading reports. However, there can be statutory civil liability for misrepresentation in secondary market disclosure documents if the secondary market disclosure document is incorporated by reference in a prospectus (eg, in connection with the utilisation of the prompt offering prospectus procedure, as discussed in the text, below, relating to 'Trading Rules, Securities Offerings, Full Canadian Offering').

Generally, the civil liability remedy for misrepresentation in continuous disclosure documents will be a common law action for fraudulent or negligent misrepresentation. To make its case, a plaintiff will need to establish that it relied on the misrepresentation, which means it would need to successfully argue that it read the particular misrepresentation in the disclosure document, understood it, and invested on the basis of it. However, in the statutory civil liability regime applicable to disclosure in a prospectus, an investor need not prove reliance to succeed in a misrepresentation action against the issuer or other responsible party.

Relief from Requirements for Foreign Issuers

In General. Where a foreign company has acquired reporting issuer status, it is prima facie required to comply with the continuous disclosure requirements set out above. However, discretionary exemptions from some of the financial reporting requirements may be available where a provincial Securities Commission is of the view that granting the exemption would not be prejudicial to the public interest. Described below are two categories of exemptions on which a foreign reporting issuer in Canada may seek to rely.

Deviation from Canadian Generally Accepted Accounting Principles. The Canadian Securities Regulator may accept financial statements not prepared in accordance with Canadian generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP) where it is not reasonably practicable for the issuer to revise the presentation in the financial statements to conform to generally accepted accounting principles. This exemption in effect permits foreign issuers to meet their continuous financial disclosure requirements without having to reconcile financial statements to Canadian generally accepted accounting principles.

Issuer Incorporated or Organised under Laws of Another Jurisdiction. Where a reporting issuer is subject to the laws of its incorporating jurisdiction concerning financial statement disclosure and there is a conflict between the laws of the incorporating jurisdiction and the laws of the applicable provincial securities legislation, most Securities Commissions will make an order exempting the reporting issuer from complying with the province's financial statement disclosure requirements provided the issuer complies with those of the incorporating jurisdiction.

Discretionary Exemption. Provincial Securities Commissions also are given the power to grant discretionary exemptions, subject to terms and conditions as they might impose, where they are otherwise satisfied in the circumstances of the particular case that there is adequate justification for doing so. This broad discretion may be used by a foreign reporting issuer where compliance with Canadian continuous disclosure requirements would create an undo hardship or little benefit is likely to be derived by investors in Canada. Factors that a commission might consider include:

- Number of security holders affected;
- Proportion of the securities held by security holders in the province to the total number of outstanding securities; and
- Substitute form of disclosure.

Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System and National Policy Statement 53 Issuer. There also is special treatment for foreign companies who have accessed the Canadian markets through either the National Policy Statement 53 (NP53) or the Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System (MJDS) offering regimes described below. Where the foreign company has become a reporting issuer pursuant to National Policy Statement 53, the ongoing continuous disclosure requirements are significantly modified by the discretionary exemption orders which are required to be issued by the Canadian Securities Regulators in authorising the National Policy Statement 53 offering.

The exemption orders generally permit the foreign company to satisfy its Canadian obligations by filing in Canada the same materials that it files with the Securities Exchange Commission and the New York Stock Exchange and sending to Canadian holders the same materials it sends to its United States holders. Under the terms of the Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System, where a United States issuer offers securities in Canada through a prospectus or a take-over bid circular, it becomes a reporting issuer in each of the provinces where the securities have been offered and subject to the various provincial continuous disclosure obligations. In most instances, United States issuers also will be able to satisfy their Canadian disclosure obligation by filing the United States continuous disclosure documentation in Canada. United States issuers also can satisfy proxy and proxy solicitation requirements by complying with the United States requirements.

Proxy Disclosure

Where an information circular has been sent to shareholders of a reporting issuer in connection with a solicitation of proxies from the shareholders, a copy of the information circular also must be filed with the provincial Securities Commissions. The contents of the information circular must comply with the requirements of the relevant provincial securities legislation.

With respect to foreign companies, there are certain exemptions from the proxy and information circular requirements which are automatic in that they do not require an order from the provincial Securities Commissions.[13] For example, where the issuer is complying with proxy rules in the United States, it is exempt from the proxy solicitation and information requirements of the provincial securities legislation.

As with continuous disclosure obligations, a discretionary exemption also is available for a foreign company where the statute governing the incorporation or organisation of the company contains provisions regarding proxy solicitation and the content of proxy circulars which are inconsistent with the Canadian requirements. In such circumstances, the provincial Securities Commissions have the discretion to make an order exempting a foreign individual or company from complying with the proxy solicitation or information circular requirements of the relevant provincial securities legislation.

Trading Rules

Securities Offerings

In General. As stated above, as a general proposition, absent an exemption, to sell securities to the public, an issuer must prepare and clear a preliminary and final prospectus, and sales may only be made through registered dealers.

13 See, for example, Ontario Securities Commission Policy 7.1, 'Application of Requirements of the Securities Act to Certain Reporting Issuers' (1980), OSCB 46.

Securities qualified under a prospectus are issued outside the closed system and, subject to the issuer's continuing compliance with the continuous disclosure obligations described above, trade freely on stock exchanges or through registrants. In the international context, it may be useful to consider three types of securities offering structure, namely:

- Public offering, with full conformity with Canadian rules;
- Public offering, with partial conformity with Canadian rules under special regulatory schemes; and
- Private offering, with minimal conformity with Canadian rules.

Each of these types of offerings will require differing levels of compliance with Canadian securities legislation, both at the time of the offering (ie, prospectus disclosure and other offering rules), and on a going-forward basis (ie, continuous disclosure).

Full Canadian Offering. Like domestic issuers, foreign companies can undertake an offering to the public in Canada by complying in full with Canadian securities legislation. This option might be attractive to an issuer with significant operations in Canada or in an industry, such as precious metals or forest products, where Canada forms a significant part of the global market.

The Canadian public offering rules are broadly similar to those in the United States, although there are some important differences, as outlined below. The fundamental statutory principle is that no securities may be offered or sold to the public until a preliminary prospectus and a final prospectus have been prepared and filed in those Canadian jurisdictions where the offering is to be extended, and the Securities Commissions in those jurisdictions have issued a receipt for the preliminary and final prospectuses.

The 'receipt' concept merits some additional explanation. In Canada, the provincial Securities Commissions have the ability to refuse to issue a receipt, notwithstanding that a prospectus has been filed. This refusal would have the effect of prohibiting marketing and solicitations (in the case of the preliminary prospectus) or confirmation of sales (in the case of the final prospectus). While a formal receipt would only be withheld in unusual circumstances, offering participants need to be aware that 'receipting' of a Canadian prospectus is an important regulatory procedure, and not merely an acknowledgement that documents have been filed.

The Canadian preliminary prospectus corresponds to the United States 'red herring' prospectus, and it typically omits information relating to the size and pricing of the offering. Similar to United States practice, there is a waiting period after the filing and receipting of the preliminary prospectus to allow for the Canadian Securities Regulators to comment on the prospectus, which period usually corresponds with marketing efforts for the public offering. After those comments have been cleared (typically 20 to 30 days), a final prospectus is prepared and filed in Canada. Once the final prospectus has been receipted, the Canadian offering has reached a stage corresponding to 'going effective' in the United States, and the final prospectus is sent to prospective purchasers.

Prospective Canadian purchasers have a 'cooling-off' period of 48 hours after receiving the final prospectus, during which they can withdraw from their commitment to buy securities for any reason. After expiry of this period, the issuer and underwriters proceed to closing of the offering.

Canadian public offerings are generally done on an underwritten basis for senior issuers, although best-efforts agency offerings also are possible. As in other jurisdictions, underwriters (or selling agents) typically participate in determination of the offering structure and preparation of the prospectus and co-ordinate the marketing efforts for the offering.

A Canadian prospectus is required by statute to contain 'full, true and plain disclosure of all material facts', and civil liability (for damages or rescission) arises where a prospectus contains a misrepresentation, which is defined as an untrue statement of a material fact (or an omission to state a material fact). A number of parties involved in the offering can be liable for a misrepresentation resulting in a loss to an investor, including:

- The issuer and its directors;
- Any selling security holder;
- The underwriters; and
- Various advisers.

Other than the issuer or selling shareholder, these parties have a 'due diligence' defence available under the Canadian securities legislation and, therefore, extensive due diligence is undertaken in preparation of the Canadian prospectus.

A Canadian prospectus is required to comply with form requirements prescribed under the Canadian securities legislation, although the forms also contain a general provision that the prospectus disclose all material facts. The issuer and underwriters are required to provide a certificate that the prospectus contains full, true, and plain disclosure of all material facts relating to the securities offered as required by the securities laws of all the provinces of Canada and that it does not contain any misrepresentation likely to affect the value or the market price of the securities to be distributed.

The underwriters certification is qualified by their knowledge. Canadian prospectuses that are filed with the securities regulators also are required to be manually signed by the senior officers and directors of the issuer and by representatives of the underwriters, although the SEDAR electronic filing system (the Canadian equivalent of the United States EDGAR system) has recently alleviated many of the paper filing requirements for domestic issuers.[14]

Canadian prospectuses are required to contain financial statements of the issuer, generally comprising five years of historical information, audited and prepared in accordance with (or reconciled to) Canadian generally accepted accounting principles. A Canadian prospectus may require interim unaudited or pro forma financial statements, depending on the timing and circumstances of the issuer and the offering.

Legislation in the Canadian province of Quebec (home to approximately one-quarter of Canada's population and a number of institutional investors) generally requires translation of prospectuses (including financial statements) into the French language. As French translation is typically done by the Quebec office of an issuer's auditors (for financial statements) and by special Quebec counsel to the issuer (for the balance of the disclosure), this can add substantially to the cost of undertaking a full public offering in Canada.

A foreign company completing an offering in Canada on the basis of a full public offering becomes a reporting issuer in all jurisdictions where it files a final prospectus, and generally becomes subject to the continuous disclosure obligations described in the text, above, relating to 'Periodic Disclosure'. The costs and ongoing obligations created by doing a full Canadian offering, as well as alternative procedures available for many foreign companies under the Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System and National Policy Statement 53 (see text relating to 'Public Offering under Special Regulatory Schemes') make a full Canadian offering an unlikely option for most foreign companies seeking access to the Canadian public capital markets.

While of limited relevance in the international context, two elements of the Canadian capital markets and regulatory regime should be noted for non-Canadian readers, namely:

- The Prompt Offering Qualification (POP) System;[15] and
- The 'bought deal' financing technique.

The Prompt Offering Qualification System is a regime available to issuers that meet certain reporting history (generally 12 months) and substantiality (generally Cdn $75 million in public float) criteria. The Prompt Offering Qualification System allows these issuers to offer securities to the public using a short-form prospectus (similar to a Form S-3 or F-3 filing in the United States), which incorporates by reference the issuer's continuous disclosure filings. The Prompt Offering Qualification System has increased flexibility and decreased transaction costs for many issuers in Canada, as the waiting period between the preliminary and final prospectus effectively decreases to approximately five days.

The Prompt Offering Qualification System also means that offerings for senior issuers can be completed in a matter of days after launch. These and other factors have given rise to the 'bought deal', an offering where an underwriter will approach an issuer and offer to purchase a specified number of securities immediately at a negotiated price, with the underwriter (usually supported by a syndicate) taking the market risk of successfully completing the distribution.

Public Offering under Special Regulatory Schemes. Prior to the 1990s, a full public offering in Canada was the only option to sell securities to Canadian retail investors. In the context of increasing internationalisation of securities markets, two Canadian regulatory developments have created alternate offering structures which give certain qualified foreign companies access to the public markets without having to comply in full with Canadian offering rules and continuous disclosure obligations.

Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System. In 1991, the Securities Exchange Commission and the provincial Securities Commissions in Ontario and Quebec, two of the principal Canadian jurisdictions, entered into a bilateral memorandum of understanding creating the Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System. The intent of this new regime was to reduce duplication in cross-border securities transactions in the United States and Canada. The Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System was subsequently adopted as a policy by all of the Canadian Securities Regulators.[16]

Under the Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System, Canadian or United States issuers that meet certain reporting history (generally 12 months) and substantiality (generally US $75 million in public float) criteria may make certain offerings of securities to the public in the other country on the basis of 'home country' prospectus disclosure requirements and under home country regulatory review procedures and timing. Issuers completing a Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System offering become subject to periodic disclosure requirements in the other country, but these can generally be satisfied by simply re-filing home country disclosure documents in the other country. The Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System has been a successful development in bilateral co-operation between Canada and the United States, although it has typically been used more often by Canadian issuers seeking access to the United States capital market than United States issuers seeking access to the Canadian capital markets.

National Policy Statement 53. In 1993, the Canadian Securities Regulators released a draft policy statement proposing a new Foreign Issuer Prospectus and Continuous Disclosure System.[17] National Policy Statement 53 permits substantial non-Canadian issuers (issuers who currently have, or expect to have on a post-offering basis, a market capitalisation of at least Cdn $3 billion) who are undertaking a fully registered United States offering to access the Canadian public capital markets on the same timetable as the United States offering, using essentially identical documents as those filed with the Securities Exchange Commission (with a few supplemental Canadian pages). The Canadian prospectus is generally not subject to substantive review by the Canadian authorities.

In particular, the Canadian supplement, or 'wrap', used in connection with a National Policy Statement 53 offering, consists largely of prescribed legends and disclosure items, as well as signed certificates essentially identical to those described in the text, above, relating to 'Full Canadian Offering'. The only non-prescribed disclosure in the Canadian wrap, other than a brief summary of the offering on the cover page, is optional disclosure of income tax considerations relevant to Canadian holders. The financial statements in the prospectus used in Canada are not required to be reconciled to Canadian generally accepted accounting principles.

As described above, on completion of an offering under National Policy Statement 53, an issuer can satisfy its Canadian continuous disclosure obligations by filing its United States disclosure documents contemporaneously in Canada. Although a fairly recent development (and still, as of early 1998, a draft policy instrument, although several offerings have been completed on the basis of the draft), National Policy Statement 53 is an adaptation of the Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System model in that it permits access to the Canadian public capital markets on compliance with the United States rules.

Private Placement in Canada. The Canadian private placement market is well established, and it is generally possible for an international offering, particularly if it includes a United States registered offering or Rule 144A offering, to be extended to a number of significant Canadian institutional and sophisticated investors through the delivery to investors of the United States offering document with a brief Canadian wrap which generally consists of one or two pages.

The Canadian wrap summarises the terms of the Canadian private placement, but it consists mostly of representations acknowledged by the prospective purchaser as to its ability to invest without being provided with a prospectus. The types of purchasers who will be in a position to make these representations are financial institutions, purchasers who have applied to the Canadian securities regulators and received a designation as exempt purchasers and, in some cases, other purchasers who are prepared to purchase more than a prescribed amount of securities (typically Cdn $97,000 or Cdn $150,000, depending on the jurisdiction).

Under Canadian securities legislation, use of an offering memorandum for private placements which are not advertised is purely optional. However, market practice has developed such that an offering memorandum, usually in the form described above, is typically provided to investors. If an offering memorandum is used, generally the only substantive requirement under securities legislation in some provinces is that the issuer provide investors purchasing under certain specified exemptions with a right of action against the issuer for rescission or damages where the disclosure document contains a misrepresentation. This right, which corresponds to the rights Canadian investors would have in a public offering by prospectus, is generally called the 'contractual right'. In Ontario, a Rule provides that a contractual right need not be given to private placement investors in certain types of offerings, including an offering where the disclosure document is based on a United States or United Kingdom prospectus.[18] In other provinces, some sophisticated investors are permitted to purchase notwithstanding the absence of a contractual right.

18 Ontario Securities Commission Rule 71-5B, 'Certain International Offerings by Private Placement', (1997), 20 OSCB 1219, although this rule is scheduled to expire on 1 July 1998 and may be extended.

Private placements are usually extended to institutional investors in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, and Alberta, where the majority of the potential institutional investors are located, but they can be made in more or fewer Canadian jurisdictions. Private placements have proved to be a cost-effective and timely way for a foreign issuer to have access to Canadian institutional investors. Significant expenses incurred in public offerings such as printing and translation are avoided. In addition, no regulatory review (and, in some circumstances, limited and readily obtainable consents) is required by the Canadian Securities Regulators.

However, by extending an offering to Canada on a private placement, sales are limited to certain specified institutional investors. In addition, there are restrictions on the dealers who may sell securities into Canada on this basis. In Ontario, for example, the offering may be made only by those non-Canadian dealers with an international dealer registration, or through appropriately registered Canadian-resident dealers, although no such restriction exists in most other provinces. Canadian securities legislation also imposes restrictions on the resale of securities sold by way of private placement. However, these resale restrictions may not apply to resales made outside of Canada. Finally, issuers completing a private placement in Canada do not become subject to Canadian continuous disclosure obligations.

Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings

The Canadian rules regarding disclosure of the acquisition of substantial holdings (which are commonly referred to as the 'early warning' rules) are contained in the provisions of Canadian securities legislation governing public take-over bids. The relevant acquisition threshold for disclosure is 10 per cent (although other provisions of the take-over bid rules do not apply until the 20 per cent level is reached; see the text, above, relating to 'Trading Rules', and below, relating to 'Public Take-Over Bids'); purchases up to 10 per cent can be made anonymously.

Acquisition of beneficial ownership, control, or direction (by any means) of 10 per cent of any class of issued voting or equity securities of a Canadian reporting issuer triggers the early warning rules. It is not necessary that the 10 per cent be acquired in a block: acquisition of a single share that, when added to any other shares of that class already owned, crosses the 10 per cent threshold will activate the rules. Acquisition of securities convertible into voting or equity securities is considered to be acquisition of the underlying securities.

Securities owned or acquired by any person acting 'jointly or in concert' with an acquiror are relevant to the early warning rules (and the formal take-over bid rules). The 'joint actor' concept is intended to force disclosure of accumulations of securities by separate acquirors sharing a common intent. The determination of whether any person is a joint actor with a given acquiror is a question of fact. However, the Canadian securities statutes presume the following to be joint actors:

- Associates of the acquiror;
- Affiliates of the acquiror; and

- Anyone subject to any agreement or understanding with the acquiror regarding acquisition or voting of the acquired securities.

Calculation of the 10 per cent figure can become further complicated in the case of options, warrants, or conversion and subscription rights, as the underlying securities are required to be counted in certain circumstances. Once the early warning rules have been triggered, the acquiror is required to do the following:

- Immediately, it must issue a press release containing certain information described below;
- Within two business days, it must file a further report containing this information;
- Every time the acquiror (and joint actors, if any) acquires a further two per cent or more of the securities which triggered the early warning rules, the acquiror must again issue and file the documents referred to above; and
- Observe a one-day waiting period after dissemination of the documents referred to above before acquiring any further securities of the class.

Several of the concepts set out above merit further explanation. The information to be disclosed in the press release and report is intended to identify the acquiror and the details of the acquisition (ie, number of securities acquired and presently owned and purchase price) to the market and to inform the market of the acquiror's purpose of the acquisition and future intentions regarding the subject company. So long as the acquiror identifies joint actors, the latter are not required to file separate reports and press releases. Finally, the waiting period requirement also applies to joint actors with the acquiror, but does not apply once the acquiror (and joint actors, if any) has crossed the 20 per cent threshold, although the formal take-over bid rules (see the text, above, relating to 'Trading Rules', and below, relating to 'Public Take-Over Bids') will apply.

Although not specifically part of the early warning rules, acquisition of a 10 per cent holding in a class of voting securities (but not of equity securities without voting rights) of a public company in Canada also would confer 'insider' status on the acquiror (see text, above, relating to 'Periodic Disclosure').

There have been a number of proposals in recent years to revise the early warning rules, particularly given the five per cent trigger under equivalent United States rules. However, none of these proposals have been adopted.

Because of the objective nature of the triggering events and the apparent extraterritorial application of the obligations, the Canadian early warning rules, like the take-over bid rules, can lead to unintended take-over bids or early warning disclosure obligations. Acquirors of substantial holdings in public companies in Canada, whether or not the acquiror is Canadian, need to take care in this regard.

The securities legislation in each province generally prohibits individuals who are in a special relationship with a reporting issuer from trading in the securities of the issuer on knowledge of material information that has not generally been disclosed to the public. This prohibition is based on the notion that trading should be based on equal access to information. Those having a 'special relationship' with the issuer include essentially everyone whose relationship with the issuer gives them access to information that the investing public does not have access to. This 'special relationship' would include the insiders described above in the discussion of insider reporting obligations but also would include:

- Officers and employees of the reporting issuer;
- Employees, affiliates, or associates of persons proposing to engage or engaging in certain business transactions with a reporting issuer, such as a reorganisation, amalgamation, arrangement, or take-over bid;
- Persons proposing to engage in business or professional activities on behalf of a reporting issuer where they are given access to information necessary to perform the business or professional function; and
- Anyone who, through their dealings with the issuer, has access to information about the issuer to which the investing public does not have access.

The prohibition on trading using undisclosed information extends beyond the duration of the relationship and the prohibition applies until the information has been made available to the investing public. The definition of 'special relationship' also extends to individuals who are not directly dealing with the issuer but obtain the information through someone who is in a special relationship (ie, a tippee).

The prohibition on insider trading extends to all individuals in a special relationship with a reporting issuer regardless of territorial boundaries. The sanctions for insider trading include penal sanctions, civil action, actions on behalf of the reporting issuer, or certain administrative sanctions, such as cease trade orders, removals of exemptions, or the prohibition from acting as a director or officer of a reporting issuer. All of these sanctions are difficult to impose on an individual residing outside of the jurisdiction. The administrative sanction are only effectively enforceable to securities market participants who are being regulated in Canada.

Public Take-Over Bids

Territorial Application (Foreign Bidder and Domestic Target). Take-over bids in Canada are regulated by provincial securities legislation and, for federally incorporated companies, the Canada Business Corporations Act (CBCA).[19]

Public take-over bids must be structured to comply with the securities legislation of each Canadian jurisdiction in which shareholders reside. A foreign bidder for a domestic target, therefore, must comply with the take-over bid requirements of each jurisdiction in Canada in which shareholders reside unless an appropriate exemption or other relief is available.

Procedural Requirements. Under Canadian take-over bid rules, a take-over bid must generally be made to all holders of each class of voting and equity (participating) securities being purchased, and the same price per security must be paid to each holder of any class. The legislation also imposes minimum standards relating to disclosure, timing, and fairness.

A formal bid (referred to as a 'circular bid') is made pursuant to a take-over bid circular, which must contain prescribed information about the offer, the offeror and the target company. When the consideration for the bid consists (in whole or part) of securities of the offeror, the take-over bid circular must include prospectus-level disclosure about the offeror. It is generally not necessary to pre-clear the contents of a take-over bid circular with the provincial Securities Commissions. By filing a take-over bid circular where securities are offered as consideration, the offeror becomes a reporting issuer (if not one already) and is subject to the on-going disclosure requirements for Canadian public companies (see text, above, relating to 'Periodic Disclosure').

The determination of whether a take-over bid exists is based on the number of voting or equity securities owned and acquired. Under Canadian securities legislation, the take-over bid threshold is 20 per cent of any class of voting or equity securities. If the target company is incorporated under the Canada Business Corporations Act , the threshold is 10 per cent of any class of voting securities. There are special rules which must be taken into account when determining whether a threshold has been crossed, including rules relating to parties acting jointly or in concert.

Circular bids must be open for acceptance at least 21 calendar days. Where all the terms and conditions of the bid have been complied with or waived, the offeror must take up and pay for all deposited securities not later than 10 days after expiry of the bid. Shares deposited to a bid may be withdrawn for 21 days from the date of the offer and, if not taken up and paid for, after 45 days from the date of the offer. As well, deposited shares which have not been taken up may be withdrawn for 10 days from any variation in the offer unless the variation consists solely of the waiver of a condition to a cash bid, or solely of an increase in price and the bid (or extended bid) is open for a further 10 days.

Many Canadian public companies have adopted United States-style shareholder rights plans ('poison pills') which, in a take-over bid context, have the effect of enhancing the bargaining power of the target company's board of directors in dealing with the offeror. In particular, such plans provide the board with a means of requiring the offeror to extend the bid period beyond the statutory minimum, allowing the board additional time to explore alternatives to the bid.

Where a circular bid is made for cash, adequate arrangements are required to be put in place prior to launching the bid to ensure that required funds are available to effect payment, and these arrangements must be disclosed in the offering circular. Therefore, a bid cannot be conditional on obtaining financing. However, any other condition may be included in a circular bid. For example, it is common to provide that a bid is conditional on there being no material changes to the target. Furthermore, if a separate regulatory approval is required (see text, below), the bid will usually be conditional on obtaining such approval. Other than conditions imposed by the bidder itself (which can be waived), there are no requirements that a specified minimum level of acceptance, such as 50 per cent, be obtained. Partial bids are permitted.

Any circular bid must be at the same price and for the same percentage as any purchases made by the offeror within the previous 90 days from any holder, unless those purchases were made on a basis available to all security holders of the class (for instance, on a securities exchange). As well, the purchaser under a circular bid is generally prohibited from any further purchases within 20 business days after the expiration of a circular bid unless such purchases are made on a basis available to all security holders of the class.

In addition, once a circular bid is announced, the offeror is generally prohibited from making any purchases outside the bid except where the intention to make such purchases is stated in the take-over bid circular, the purchases are made through the facilities of a major Canadian securities exchange in accordance with exchange rules, the purchases aggregate no more than five per cent of the class being acquired, and the offeror issues and files a daily press release disclosing the number of securities purchased. The rules also contain an 'early warning' reporting system described in the text, above, relating to 'Trading Rules' and 'Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings'.

If, pursuant to a circular bid, an offeror acquires more than 90 per cent of the shares (other than those it previously held), Canadian corporate statutes generally provide a procedure for the compulsory acquisition of the balance of the shares. Where an offeror does not obtain the required percentage or is otherwise unable to use these rules, the offeror must comply with a detailed set of provisions relating to 'going private transactions' to acquire the balance of the shares (eg, by way of statutory amalgamation or arrangement).[20]

Such provisions can require the approval of a majority of the minority shareholders, as well as an independent valuation of the corporation. It is common for a circular bid to attempt to achieve the 90 per cent threshold but to indicate that the offeror will proceed to a second stage going private transaction to obtain 100 per cent if the 90 per cent is not achieved in the first instance.

Depending on the nature of the target and the size of the transaction, it also may be necessary to comply with other Canadian legislation. There are pre-merger notification requirements under competition rules which are broadly similar to the approach under the United States anti-trust legislation. In addition, for foreign bids over a certain threshold it may be necessary to obtain approval from Investment Canada under the general foreign investment rules. Furthermore, depending on the areas of business of the target (eg, broadcasting or utilities), it may be necessary to obtain approval under other specific legislation. The need to comply with these requirements is usually dealt with by specific conditions in the circular bid which generally extend the minimum time periods.

20 See, for example, Ontario Securities Commission Policy 9.1, 'Disclosure, Valuation, Review, and Approval Requirements and Recommendations for Insider Bids, Issuer Bids, Going Private Transactions, and Related-Party Transactions' (1977), OSCB 253.

Exemptions. There are various exemptions which, in certain circumstances, can be utilised in lieu of complying with the formal circular bid procedures.

Stock Exchange Bids. The major Canadian stock exchanges (Toronto, Montreal, Alberta, and Vancouver) have each developed a set of rules relating to cash take-over bids for listed shares through the facilities of the exchange.[21] Offerors that comply with these rules are exempt from the circular bid requirements. The stock exchange rules include requirements relating to equal treatment of shareholders, disclosure, and minimum time periods, which are substantially the same as for a circular bid. Securities exchange bids are now rare, however, since the applicable rules are more restrictive than for a circular bid in several respects, including in relation to consideration (cash only), withdrawal of the bid, permitted conditions, and availability of second stage transactions.

Normal Course Purchases. There is an exemption from provincial take-over bid rules which permits the holder of more than 20 per cent (10 per cent if the target is a Canada Business Corporations Act company) of a class of equity or voting shares (or a person acting jointly or in concert with such a person) to purchase up to an additional five per cent of the outstanding shares of that class in a 12-month period.

If there is a published market in the shares, the offeror may not pay more than the 'market price' of the securities (based on recent market activity), plus reasonable brokerage commissions actually paid. Provincial take-over bid legislation also provides a parallel exemption for normal course purchases of listed shares through the facilities of Canadian stock exchanges in accordance with stock exchange rules, which also impose a five per cent per 12-month limit.

Private Agreements. Private agreement purchases which result in the purchaser exceeding the take-over threshold are permitted in limited circumstances. The agreement must be with five sellers or less, and the sellers may not receive more than 115 per cent of the 'market price' of the securities. Collateral agreements cannot be used to indirectly provide increased consideration.

Other Relief. In addition to the foregoing specific exemptions, the provincial Securities Commissions will often grant discretionary exemptions from the take-over bid rules in appropriate cases. These can include circumstances where the holdings of securities in a jurisdiction are minimal, even if the terms or de minimis threshold of a relevant statutory exemption are not strictly met. In addition, the provincial Securities Commissions also have broad power to grant relief in other circumstances where they can be convinced it is in the public interest to do so.

21 See, for example, Appendix F to the Toronto Stock Exchange Company Manual, 'Take-Over Bids and Issuer Bids through Toronto Stock Exchange Facilities'.

Recognition of Foreign Take-Over Regulation. The take-over bid rules in most Canadian provinces include an exemption from formal bid requirements if the number of holders resident in that jurisdiction are minimal and the offer is made in accordance with the rules of a specified foreign jurisdiction. In most provinces, in order for this exemption to apply, there must be fewer than 50 holders in the jurisdiction, holding less than two per cent of the outstanding securities of that class.[22] The foreign rules recognised for the purpose of this provision generally include United States securities laws, and (in Ontario, Quebec, and Alberta only) the United Kingdom City Code. As well, the provincial Securities Commissions will often grant discretionary exemptions from the take-over bid rules in cases where the holdings of securities in that jurisdiction are minimal, even if the terms of the relevant statutory exemption are not strictly met.

Jurisdictional Conflicts

Multilateral Solutions

Canadian jurisdictions have not been parties to any true multilateral solutions to jurisdictional conflicts in international securities regulation. While many of the Canadian securities regulators are active participants in multilateral organisations, such as IOSCO and COSRA, as well as the drive for international accounting standards, these efforts have had limited substantive effect to date.

There are a variety of explanations for this result at the international level. In the case of Canada, there are further complications to multilateral solutions due to the provincial nature of securities regulation and a relatively high degree of regulation for a market the size of Canada's.

Bilateral Solutions

At a bilateral level, there have been some successes between securities regulators in Canada and the United States. The most evident is the Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosure System (see text, above, relating to 'Trading Rules-Securities Offerings-Public Offerings'), which has been in effect since 1991 and which has proved to be a workable substantive law solution.

Given the relatively small size of the Canadian capital market, and the many similarities between the Canadian system and that of other countries, particularly the United States, unilateral approaches by some or all of the Canadian securities regulators have perhaps met with the most success. Two notable examples in the international context are National Policy Statement 53 which, in essence, represents deference by the Canadian Securities Regulators to the Securities Exchange Commission and to United States laws relating to public offerings and periodic disclosure, and the Ontario Securities Commission private placement rule, which currently provides partial relief from the otherwise applicable requirements where an issuer complies with applicable United States rules.

Procedural solutions in the absence of a multilateral or bilateral substantive law solution are generally not a part of the Canadian environment. To some extent, market participants may be able to structure transactions involving Canadian companies and investors off-shore, and they may be able to deal with Canadian institutional investors with limited application of Canadian securities laws.

However, the comprehensive and pervasive nature of Canadian securities regulation, together with the broad discretion of the Canadian securities regulators to intervene in capital markets matters, generally require that Canadian securities laws be complied with, or an available exemption be relied on, in transactions involving Canada or its residents.

Introduction

Regulatory System

Chilean securities markets are principally regulated by the Securities and Insurance Superintendency (Superintendencia de Valores y Seguros) under the Securities Markets Law[1] and the Corporations Law.[2] These provide for disclosure requirements, restrictions on insider trading and price manipulation, and protection of minority investors.

The Securities Market Law sets forth requirements relating to public offerings, stock exchanges, and brokers, and it outlines disclosure requirements for companies that issue publicly offered securities. The Corporations Law sets forth the rules and requirements for establishing open stock corporations, while eliminating government supervision of closed (closely held) corporations. Open stock (public) corporations are those with 500 or more shareholders, or companies in which 100 or more shareholders own at least 10 per cent of the subscribed capital and all other companies that publicly offer their stock.

Authorities

The Chilean regulatory authorities relating to securities include:

- The Securities and Insurance Superintendency;
- The Banking and Financial Institutions Superintendency (Superintendencia de Bancos e Instituciones Financieras); and
- The Pension Funds Superintendency (Administradora de Fondos de Pensiones).

Procedures

As provided in General Regulation Number 30, a register application must be submitted to the Stock Exchange and Insurance Superintendency. Its contents must include:

- General, economic, and financial background;
- Significant or substantial facts; and
- Other antecedents.

A letter signed by the general manager (or the person acting on his behalf), containing all the required information required in the present section and indicating the reasons for the application, must be enclosed. Once the issuer has provided all the information required and has complied with all formalities determined by the Securities and Insurance Superintendency, it will proceed to the registration in the Register of Stock. The Securities and Insurance Superintendency will issue a registration certificate once the process already mentioned has been completed. While the registration process is in progress, any change in the information provided must be submitted to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency.

Domestic Exchanges. The Chilean stock market, which is regulated by the Securities and Insurance Superintendency under the Securities Market Law, is one of the most developed among the emerging markets, reflecting the particular economic history and development of Chile. The Chilean government's policy of privatising state-owned companies, implemented during the 1980s, has led to an expansion of private ownership of shares, resulting in an increase in the importance of stock markets. This policy of privatisation extended to the social security system, which was converted into a privately managed pension fund system. These pension funds have been allowed — subject to certain limitations — to invest in stocks and are currently major investors in the stock market. Certain elements in the market, including pension funds administrators, are highly regulated with respect to investment and remuneration criteria, but the general market is less regulated than the United States market with respect to disclosure requirements and information usage.

The Santiago Stock Exchange was established in 1893 and is a private company whose equity consists of 48 shares held by 46 shareholders. As of 31 December 1995, 282 companies had accounts for 80.6 per cent of all amounts traded in Chile. Approximately 17 per cent of equity trading is conducted through the Chilean Electronic Stock Exchange, an electronic trading market which was created by banks and non-member brokerage houses. The remaining 2.4 per cent of equity is traded in the Valparaíso Stock Exchange.

Equities, closed-end funds, fixed-income securities, short-term, money-market securities, gold, and United States dollars are traded on the Santiago Stock Exchange. In 1991, the Santiago Stock Exchange initiated a futures market with two instruments, namely:

- United States dollar futures; and
- Selective Shares Price Index futures.

Securities are traded primarily through an open-voice auction system, a firm-offers system, or the daily auction. Trading through the open-voice system occurs on each business day in three sessions, from 10:30 a.m. to 11:20 a.m., from 12:30 p.m. to 1:20 p.m., and from 4:00 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. The Santiago Stock Exchange has an electronic system of trade (telepregón), which operates continuously for high volumes from 9:30 a.m. to 10:20 a.m.; 11:30 a.m. to 12:20 p.m.; and 1:30 p.m. to 3:50 p.m. Telepregón operates for low volumes from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. The Chilean Electronic Stock Exchange operates continuously from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. on each business day.

There are two share price indexes for the Santiago Stock Exchange, the General Share Price Index (IGPA) and the Selective Shares Price Index (IPSA). The General Share Price Index is calculated using the prices of more than 160 issues, and it is divided into five main sectors, namely:

- Banks and finance;
- Farming and forestry products;
- Mining;
- Industrials; and
- Miscellaneous.

The Selective Shares Price Index is a major company index, currently including the Stock Exchange's 40 most active stocks. Shares included in the Selective Shares Price Index are weighted according to the value of the shares traded and account for more than 80 per cent of the entire market capitalisation. Securities exchanges are regulated by the Securities Market Law; additionally, regulations affecting open stock corporations also may be applied.

According to the Securities Market Law, securities exchanges are entities whose purpose is to provide their members the means required to carry out their transactions of securities efficiently, through continuous mechanisms of competitive auction, and to make possible for them to bring about other security trading activities that are proper according to law. The work performed by the securities exchanges is basic in the development of the financial market since, by authority of the Securities Market Law, they are bound to establish regulations for their activities and those of stock brokers and oversee the enforcement of those regulations in such a way as to ensure the existence of a fair, competitive, orderly, and transparent market.

Banks and financial institutions are not compelled to be registered in the stock brokers or securities brokers' registers to carry out trading activities, in accordance with the rights vested by the General Banking Law. However, they are subject to all other regulations set forth in the Securities Market Law. Stock brokers and securities dealers are responsible for the identity and legal capability of the persons hired through them, the authenticity and soundness of the securities they trade, the registration of the latest holder of such securities in the issuer's registers, whenever necessary, and the authenticity of the latest endorsement. The use of appellations such as 'stock broker' and 'securities dealer', or similar designations that involve the capacity of security trading, is restricted to persons and entities authorised to act as such according to the present law.

Transborder Electronic Trading Systems. Transborder electronic trading systems are not yet regulated in Chile.

Off-Market Transactions. Off-market transactions are not yet regulated in Chile.

Securities

National Treatment and Reciprocity. In general, no treaty exists between Chile and other countries for the reciprocal enforcement of foreign judgments. Chilean courts, however, have enforced, for example, judgments rendered in the United States by virtue of legal principles of reciprocity and comity, subject to the review in Chile of the foreign judgment to ascertain whether certain basic principles of due process and public policy have been respected without reviewing the merits of the case. However, there is doubt as to the enforceability, in original actions in Chilean courts, of liabilities predicated solely on foreign securities laws and as to the enforceability in Chilean courts of judgments of foreign courts obtained in actions predicated on the civil liability provision of the foreign securities laws.

The Corporations Law provides that all disputes arising among the shareholders in their capacity as such or among shareholders and a company or their administrators must be submitted to arbitration in Chile. Notwithstanding the foregoing, a plaintiff has the right to submit the dispute to the ordinary courts of Chile. These provisions are mandatory, and they supersede the general rule described above. In addition, the Civil Code indicates that '[t]he Law is mandatory for all those who inhabit the Republic, including foreigners'.[9]

The Civil Code states that:

> . . . [g]oods located in Chile are liable to the Chilean laws, even if their owners are foreigners and do not reside in Chile. This provision must be understood notwithstanding the stipulations contained in legally sufficient contracts issued in a foreign country. However, for those contracts issued in a foreign country to be legally sufficient in Chile, they must be amended according to the Chilean laws.[10]

Issuer and Securities Requirements. The Securities Market Law regulates public offerings of securities and their respective markets and brokers, comprised of the stock market, stock brokers, securities dealers, issuers of instruments of public offerings, and secondary markets of such securities within and outside the stock markets. The Securities Market Law is applicable to all transactions in securities originating in public offerings and traded by brokers or dealers.

The Securities Market Law also regulates the stock market of companies and limited partnerships in which at least 10 per cent of their capital belongs to a minimum of 100 shareholders or that have 500 or more shareholders. Transactions of securities not mentioned in the foregoing paragraphs must be considered private in nature and will not be included among the provisions of the Securities Market Law, except in those cases in which it specifically cites them.

The Securities and Insurance Superintendency supervises the enforcement of the provisions of the Securities Market Law. Securities are understood as any transferable instruments, including stocks, stock options, bonds, debentures, mutual funds shares, savings plans, and negotiable instruments and, in general, any credit and investment instrument. Provisions included in the Securities Market Law do not apply to securities issued or guaranteed by the state, centralised or decentralised public institutions, or the Central Bank of Chile.

Public offerings of securities are those intended for the public in general, or for certain specific groups or areas within it. Should the need arise, the Stock Exchange and Insurance Superintendency is empowered to determine, by means of a general resolution, if certain types of securities offerings do constitute public offerings. The Superintendency may excuse certain public offerings from compliance with certain requirements by means of general resolutions.

Issuers that are undergoing the settlement of financial affairs will only be allowed to carry out public offerings of securities if they are holders of their own shares. According to General Rule Number 30 of the Securities and Insurance Superintendency, issuing entities must provide information on:

10 Civil Code, art 16.

- General, economic, and financial background of the applicant entity;
- General, economic, and financial background on affiliates and related entities; and
- Significant or substantial facts having, or that may have, a future impact on the development of the business of the entity, its financial statements, its securities, or their offer.[11] The registration application also must include the following documents and additional information.

Corporations. Corporations must provide:

- Authenticated copies of corporation deeds and their amendments;[12]
- Certificate from the corresponding Real Estate Registry, issued no more than 15 days after the date of application;
- Notice of any amendment or change regarding the corporation's bye-laws or the list of directors or liquidators and general manager, while the registration is still in process, together with the relevant documents; and
- Copy of the deeds modifying the bye-laws before their authentication, when the term for such a formality is still in effect.

Partnerships. In the case of partnerships, the following is required:

- Authenticated copies of the partnership deed and amendments;[13]
- Certificate from the respective Real Estate Registry, issued no more than 15 days after the date of application;
- Notice of any amendment or change regarding the corporation's bye-laws or the list of directors or liquidators and general manager or his representative, while the registration is still in process, to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency, together with the relevant documents;
- Affidavit in which all partners commit themselves not to dissolve the partnership, without prior authorisation from the Securities and Insurance Superintendency;[14] and
- Copies of deeds modifying the bye-laws before their authentication, when the term for such a formality is still in effect.

11 Securities Market Law, art 9. 'Substantial information' is that which a judicious person would consider important with regard to his investment decision.

12 The current text must be submitted, including relevant information from the past 10 years. Should such updated text not be available, the last one in existence must be submitted, together with the amendments made from the date of its emission until the date of application.

13 The current text must be submitted, including relevant information from the past 10 years. Should such updated text not be available, the last one in existence must be submitted, together with the amendments made from the date of its emission until the date of application.

14 In cases involving limited partnerships, if the managing partner is another partnership, an affidavit of the nature above described is to be presented by it. The affidavit must be subscribed by all partners.

Additional Information. The following information is required from all applicants:

- A list of shareholders or partners arranged in alphabetical order at the date of application, indicating the number of shares or percentage of the rights held by each;
- A copy of the facsimile of the stock certificates that must be registered;
- The latest annual report presented to the shareholders or partners of the entity being registered;
- Notice of any changes in the information presented.

Registration Procedure. Once the shares to be issued have been registered by the Securities and Insurance Superintendency, the same information provided for the purposes of that registration must be delivered to all of Chile's stock markets within three business days after execution of the relevant certificate. The certificate must be delivered to the intermediate underwriters of such issuance before the date of initiation of the marketing process. The information must be permanently available to the public.

The register must make a distinction between those issues directed to the general public and those directed solely to the shareholders or those resulting from debt-equity conversions or mergers. In these last cases, a prospectus is not necessary, and a letter directed to the shareholders, in which the circumstances of the issuance are transmitted, will suffice. The application for registration must consist of a letter signed by the general manager or the person acting on his behalf.

A public offering of stocks that represents a debt with a term of over a year can only be carried out by means of bonds and subject to the general provisions established by law. Banks and financial institutions operating in the country are not subject to this limitation. When the registration of issued bonds is required, the issuer must present copies of the public instrument, together with the representative of the future bondholders, to the Superintendency. The representative must be appointed by the issuer in the same instrument, and he may be replaced at any time by the bondholders' general directorship.

Public offerings of stocks involving a debt and which expires in less than a year can only be carried out by means of a promissory note or other credit or investments instruments in compliance with the law and the requirements established by the Securities and Insurance Superintendency through the promulgation of general rules.

Prospectus Requirements. Prospectus and brochures providing information, employed for the promulgation and as advertising material of securities issuance, must contain all the information that the Securities and Insurance Superintendency determines, and they may be promulgated only after delivery to the Register of Securities. In general, the prospectus must provide information relating to:

- The intermediaries participating in the issue;
- The issuer;
- The legal background of the issue;
- The characteristics of the issue;

- The description of the placement; and
- The certificate of the issue registration.

Registration of Public Offerings. The Securities and Insurance Superintendency keeps a public register of securities. That register must include:

- Issuers of publicly offered securities;
- Securities that are subject to public offerings;
- Shares belonging to corporations and limited partnerships in which at least 10 per cent of their subscribed capital belongs to a minimum of 100 shareholders, or that have 500 or more shareholders; and
- Shares issued by corporations that voluntarily request to be registered.

Public offerings of securities can only be made when they and their issuers have been included in the Register of Securities. The registration of the securities and the corporation must be carried out within the 60 days following the date on which any of the aforementioned requirements have been fulfilled. Any corporation may choose to voluntarily register its shares. Voluntary registration subordinates the registered corporation to all the provisions and complementary regulations of this law.

The Securities and Insurance Superintendency must proceed to the registration in the Securities Register once the issuer has provided all the information required, regarding its legal status, economic situation, and financial standing.

The Securities and Insurance Superintendency may suspend the offering, negotiations, or transactions relating to any securities for up to 30 days if the public interest or that of the investors so require. The suspension may be extended to 120 days. The Superintendency also may annul the registration. No public offerings of securities can be carried out by issuers who cannot demonstrate their financial stability. The emission of publicly issued securities will be suspended if the issuer is found to be financially unstable.

Registration of Placements and Secondary Trade. The shareholders of a company, acting at an extraordinary shareholders' meeting, have the power to authorise an increase in such company's capital. When an investor subscribes for issued shares, the shares are issued and registered in such investor's name, even if not paid for, and the investor is treated as a shareholder for all purposes except with respect to receipt of dividends and the return of capital. The investor becomes eligible to receive dividends once he has paid for the shares (if he has paid only a portion of such shares, he is entitled to receive a corresponding pro rata portion of the dividends declared with respect to such shares, unless the company's bye-laws provide otherwise).

If an investor does not provide for shares for which he has subscribed on or prior to the date agreed on for payment, the company is entitled to auction the shares on the stock exchange where such shares are traded, and it has a cause of action against the investor for the difference, if any, between the subscription price and the auction proceeds. However, until such shares are sold at auction, the subscriber continues to exercise all the rights of a shareholder (except the right to receive dividends and return of capital). Article 22 of the Corporations Law states that the purchaser of shares of a company implicitly accepts its bye-laws and any agreements adopted at shareholders' meetings.

The Corporations Law provides that, when a Chilean company issues new shares for cash, it must offer its existing shareholders the right to purchase a sufficient number of shares to maintain their existing ownership percentages in the company. Pre-emptive rights are exercisable or freely transferable by shareholders during a period which cannot be less than 30 days following the grant of such rights. During such period (for shares as to which pre-emptive rights have been waived), and for the ensuing period (up to the term fixed by the shareholders' meetings to pay the increase in capital, which cannot exceed three years), a Chilean open stock corporation is permitted to offer any unsubscribed shares for sale to third parties on terms which are equal to or less favourable to such purchasers than those offered to its shareholders. At the end of a 30-day period following the pre-emptive rights period, a Chilean open stock corporation is authorised to sell non-subscribed shares to third parties on more favourable terms to such purchasers, provided they are sold on a stock exchange.

Periodic Disclosure

In General

The registration in the Register of Securities compels the issuer to reveal in a reliable, sufficient, and timely manner all substantial information about itself, the offered securities, and the offer. 'Substantial information' is the information that a judicious person would consider important regarding his investment decisions.

Publicity, advertisement, and propagation made in any way by issuers, securities brokers, stock markets, securities brokers' corporations, or any other person or entities that play a role in issuing or in placing securities, may not contain statements, references, or representations that might lead to mistakes, ambiguities, or confusion about the nature, prices, feasibility, liquid assets, guarantees, or any other characteristic pertaining publicly offered securities or their issuers.

The Securities and Insurance Superintendency must keep a public register of presidents, directors, managers, administrators, and liquidators of the entities subject to its supervision. For that purpose, such entities, before the end of the third business day, must give notice regarding any appointment, vacancy, or replacement in the above positions. All appointments that are formally registered in the record will be understood as valid and in force for all the judicial and extrajudicial effects regarding stockholders and third parties in good faith.

Securities issued by banks or financial institutions operating in Chile need not necessarily be registered with the Securities and Insurance Superintendency, unless those securities consist of the institution's own shares, bonds, or other instruments as defined by the Banking and Financial Institutions Superintendency. The Securities and Insurance Superintendency also maintains a public register of risk-managing agencies.

Issuers of Registered Securities

The entities included in the Register of Securities must present to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency and to the public in general the same information that open stock corporations are compelled to provide.

American Depositary Receipts Disclosure

The regulations related to the emission of American Depositary Receipts are found in chapter XXVI, title I, of the Compendium of Norms on International Exchange of the Central Bank of Chile, under Conventions on the Purchasing of Company Stock and the Emission of Titles for their Transaction in Official Foreign Stock Markets or other Forms, and in Circular Letter Number 1375 of 12 February 1998 of the Securities and Insurance Superintendency. This norm regulates the issues that address the precise definitions of the entities that intervene in the operation.

Holders of American Depositary Receipts are subject to certain provisions of the rules and regulations under the Exchange Act relating to the disclosure of interests in shares of common stock. Any holder of American Depositary Receipts who is or becomes, directly or indirectly, interested in five per cent (or such other percentage as may be prescribed by law or regulation) or more of the outstanding shares of common stock must, within 10 days after becoming so interested and thereafter on certain changes in such interests, notify the company as required by such rules and regulations. In addition, holders of American Depositary Receipts are subject to the reporting requirements contained in articles 12 and 54 and title XV of the Securities Market Law, which provision may apply when a holder owns an amount of American Depositary Receipts that represents 10 per cent or more of the common stock or has the intention of taking control of a company.

The open companies that are registered in the Record of Stock that qualify according to the legislation of the United States and that carry out American Depositary Receipt operations must:

- Inform the Securities and Insurance Superintendency regarding the initiation of activities related to investment banks or legal consulting firms, with the purpose of studying the possibility to place their stock in foreign markets;
- Provide an estimate of the number of shares involved in the American Depositary Receipt program, the shares currently registered in the Record of Stock, the registered shares, and the registered and paid stock;
- Provide information as to the minimum price of the placement;
- Indicate if the American Depositary Receipts are a result of public or private offer;
- Remit to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency, on the first work day after its registration, a copy of the deposit contract;
- Remit to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency a copy of all the services contracts made before the Securities and Exchange Commission with the purpose of registration of the emission of the American Depositary Receipts, as well as all the follow-up information after registration, in the same manner and on the same date when it was formalised;

- Compile, on a permanent basis, all information related to the emitter and given to third parties and remit it to the Securities and Exchange Commission within the following 48 hours;
- Report the registration of American Depositary Receipts with the Securities Exchange Commission, the stock markets, or any other system of transaction;
- Deliver to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency a genuine copy of the unused American Depositary Receipts, which must contain on one of its pages, in a highlighted fashion, a warning to all the holders of American Depositary Receipts of the main obligations that the stockholders have in Chile, especially those provided in articles 12 and 54, title XV, of the Securities Market Law;
- Include copies of the underwriting contracts and other documents that subscribe the American Depositary Receipt placement;
- Give notice of the initiation of the operations of the American Depositary Receipt placement in the foreign stock markets, providing price, amount, and conditions in the American Depositary Receipt placement;
- Inform the Securities and Insurance Superintendency of the name of the entity that functions as custodian and that remits the agreement that has been formalised between it and the deposit bank;
- Provide a monthly presentation to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency of the information of the transaction of American Depositary Receipts, including the price and number of units that were transacted; and
- Provide a quarterly presentation to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency of a list of all the stockholders of American Depositary Receipts that was provided to the deposit bank, within the first three days of the following month after this information was reported.

Article 36 of the General Banking Law states that no person may acquire, directly or indirectly, more than 10 per cent of the shares of a bank without the prior authorisation of the Superintendency of Banks. The prohibition also applies to beneficial owners of American Depositary Receipts. In the absence of such authorisation, any person or group of persons acting in concert will not be permitted to exercise voting rights with respect to the shares or American Depositary Receipts acquired. In determining whether to issue such an authorisation, the Superintendency of Banks considers a number of factors enumerated in the General Banking Law, including the financial stability of the purchasing party.

Article 84(2) of the General Banking Law imposes certain restrictions on the amounts and terms of loans made by banks to related parties. This presumption applies to beneficial owners of American Depositary Receipts representing more than one per cent of the shares.

Proxy Disclosure

The quorum for a shareholders' meeting is established by the presence, in person or by proxy, of shareholders representing at least an absolute majority of the issued voting shares of the company; if a quorum is not present at the first meeting, the meeting can be reconvened and, on the meeting having been reconvened, shareholders present at the reconvened meeting are deemed to constitute a quorum regardless of the percentage of the voting shares represented. The shareholders' meeting passes resolutions by the affirmative vote of an absolute majority of those shares or represented at the meeting. Additionally, a vote of two-thirds majority of the issued voting stock is required if a shareholders' meeting is called for the purpose of considering:

- A change of organisation, merger, or division of a company;
- An amendment to the term of duration or early dissolution;
- A change in corporate domicile;
- A decrease in corporate capital;
- The approval of capital contributions in kind and an assessment of such assets;
- A modification of the powers of shareholders or limitations on the powers of the board of directors;
- The transfer of all corporate assets and liabilities of the company or of all its corporate assets; or
- The form of distributing corporate benefits.

Chilean law does not require an open company to provide the level and type of information that United States securities law requires in connection with a solicitation of proxies. However, shareholders are entitled to examine the books of the company within the 15-day period before the ordinary annual shareholders' meeting. A notice of a shareholders' meeting, listing matters to be addressed at the meeting, must be mailed not fewer than 25 days prior to the date of such meeting and, in cases of an ordinary annual meeting, shareholders holding a prescribed number of shares must be sent an annual report of the company's activities, including audited financial statements. Shareholders who do not fall into this category, but who request it, also must be sent a copy of the company's annual report.

The Corporations Law provides that, when shareholders representing 10 per cent or more of the issued voting shares so request, a company's annual report must include such shareholders' comments and proposals in relation to the company's affairs. Similarly, the Corporations Law provides that when the board of directors of an open company convenes an ordinary meeting of the shareholders and solicits proxies for that meeting or distributes information supporting its decisions or other similar material, it is obligated to include as an annex to its annual report any pertinent comments and proposals that may have been made by shareholders owning 10 per cent or more of the company's voting shares who have requested that such comments and proposals be so included.

Only shareholders registered as such with a company at least five business days prior to the date of a meeting are entitled to attend and vote their shares. A shareholder may appoint another individual (who need not be a shareholder) as his proxy to attend and vote on his behalf. Every shareholder entitled to attend and vote at a shareholders' meeting has one vote for every share subscribed.

Trading Rules

In General

Under article 12 of the Securities Market Law, certain information regarding transactions in shares of companies must be reported to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency and the stock exchanges. Shareholders are required to report the following to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency and the stock exchanges:

- Any direct or indirect acquisition or sale of shares that results in the holder's acquiring or disposing, directly or indirectly, of 10 per cent or more of an open stock corporation's share capital; and
- Any direct or indirect acquisition or sale of shares or options to buy or sell shares, in any amount, if made by holder of 10 per cent or more of an open stock corporation's capital or if made by a director, general manager, or manager of such corporation.

Insider Trading and Fraud

No person who, through his occupation, position, activity, or relationship, has access to privileged information may use such information for his own benefit or may purchase stocks of which he has privileged information, for himself or for third parties, directly or indirectly. In addition, it is forbidden to employ privileged information to obtain benefits or to avoid losses. It is equally forbidden to communicate such information to third parties or to recommend the purchasing or selling of affected stocks, directly or through subordinates or third parties.

Public Take-Over Bids

Under Article 54 of the Securities Market Law, persons or entities intending to acquire control, directly, of a corporation are required to inform the public of such acquisition at least five business days in advance through a notice published in a Chilean newspaper. The notice must disclose, among other information, the person or entity purchasing or selling, and the price and conditions of any negotiations. Prior to such publication, a written communication to such effect must be sent to the Securities and Insurance Superintendency and to the Chilean stock exchanges. Title XV of the Securities Market Law sets forth the basis to determine what constitutes a 'controlling power', a 'direct holding', and a 'related party'.

Jurisdictional Conflicts

The Civil Procedures Code provides that:

> . . . resolutions pronounced in any foreign country will have in Chile the authority granted by the corresponding treaties, and their performance will comply with the

> Chilean laws, unless these have been modified by the aforementioned treaties. Should there be no corresponding treaties on this matter with the country where the resolutions are originated, they will be given the same force that are granted to those verdicts that are > pronounced in Chile. If the resolution proceeds from a country that does not comply with the verdicts of the Chilean legal courts, these will have no force in Chile.

Where none of the above cases can apply, resolutions of foreign courts will have in Chile the same force as that of Chilean judgments, as long as:

- They do not conflict with Chilean law;
- They do not conflict with Chilean jurisdiction;
- Proper notice has been provided to the defendant; and
- They have been formalised in compliance with the laws of the country where they were pronounced.

Introduction

In General

China started to develop its securities markets at the beginning of the 1980s.[1] The primary purpose of creating and developing a local stock market was to facilitate and deepen the modernizing reform of long-term financially troubled state-owned enterprises (SOEs). Along with the privatization of SOEs, SOEs have also been corporatized to become modern enterprises in terms of corporate governance, structure, and operation. As the capital markets were largely used by the Chinese government as a tool to rescue and finance the troubled SOEs, at least in its very initial stage, raising capital by listing on the Chinese stock markets was largely restricted to state-owned enterprises in the early 1990s, and privately held Chinese entities had little access.

More significantly, a stronger level of government involvement in the development of the capital markets is one of the key features of Chinese stock market. The regulatory mode of the securities market in China is a hybrid model of 'top down' and 'down top'. At the economic level, it was enterprises that make use of the capital markets to raise capital and attract investors, domestic or foreign. However, on the regulatory side, it is the central government that maintains a higher level of control over the listing process of prospective listing enterprises and the regulatory regime of the entire capital market. The opposite economic and regulatory forces led to severe competition between local governments to support their local entities to be listed first.

The Chinese securities market re-emerged in the mid-1980s when the Shanghai and Shenzhen municipal governments opened the stock exchanges in Shanghai and Shenzhen, respectively. These two stock exchanges became national securities markets in mainland China on 19 December 1990 and 3 July 1991, respectively.[2] Two stock exchanges apply the same listing rules and function as the single market. The securities market grows very fast in China. At the end of 1991, the first year of the formation of the Shenzhen Stock Exchange, there were twenty listed companies and the value of their shares was RMB 3.5 billion.[3] Both A shares and B-shares can be traded on the main boards of the Shanghai Stock Exchange and Shenzhen Stock Exchange. When the stock market was established, the first batch of listing companies were only 14 joint-stock companies with a total equity capital of RMB 600 million, and a total market value of approximately RMB 11 billion.[4]

1 The listing of state-owned enterprises on domestic stock exchanges emerged in the 1980s. The Joint Investment Company in Baoan County of Shenzhen issued the first public share certificates in 1983. Shanghai Feiyue Hi-Fi Corporation floated 10,000 shares at Renminbi 50 per share in November 1984. Tan Yanzhong Realty Co issued 100,000 shares two months later. These issues were handled by the Trust and Investment Company of the Shanghai Branch of the PBOC.

The Securities Commission also was formed under the State Council in 1992 as the regulatory body of the stock market. The securities market experienced a high speed of expansion in the first several years of the 1990s. By the end of 1994, the number of listed companies on Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges rose to 181 and 291, respectively, and the total market value of the stock market amounted to RMB 354.2 billion.[5] After two years' market downturn, the stock market moved towards another new phase of explosion in 1996–1998. By the end of 1998, the number of listed companies rose to 745 with the market value of RMB 2 trillion.[6]

The China Securities Regulatory Commission (CSRC) decided in January 2000 to establish a high-tech board so as to create separate indexes of the shares of high-tech companies. Along with the Silicon Valley success in the beginning of the 21st century, high-tech shares also boomed in China during the same period. Remarkable progress has been made in both the market size and value since 1991. By September 2002, the number of listed companies on both the Shanghai Stock Exchange and Shenzhen Stock Exchange surged to 1,212, and the market value of these securities was equal to 50 per cent of the GDP.[7] By 2004, the combined capitalization of the Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges reached US $447.7 billion as the thirteenth largest stock market in the world.[8]

2 A secondary market emerged along with many 'trading centers' scattered across the country in major cities by the late 1980s. These trading centers were under the supervision of local governments. In February 2008, the Shanghai Stock Exchange had 861 listed companies and 1,130 listed securities, and their market value reached RMB 233.4 trillion[9] while the Shenzhen Stock Exchange had 680 listed companies and 878 listed securities with the market value of RMB 55 trillion.[10]

Even in the global financial crisis and economic downturn, Chinese stock bourses in the amount of US $66.9 billion and the Hong Kong bourse with US $52.8 billion have raised almost triple the amount of money secured by initial public offerings (IPOs) across the United States in 2010, underscoring China's rise as a global financial powerhouse.[11]

Stocks are classified into four types based on the nature of their ownership: state shares, legal person shares, individual shares, and special shares. State shares are shares held by state-owned units (danwei) designated by the government. The sale and assignment of state shares are subject to government approval.

Legal person shares are shares held by a company or a legal entity with the status of a legal person. Individual shares are held by individual public investors or the staff of a company. These three types of shares are referred to as A-shares and, subject to recent developments, can only be purchased by Chinese nationals. By contrast, B-shares refer to special shares held by foreign investors (originally restricted to such investors, although PRC nationals are now also permitted to purchase B-shares).

Chinese capital markets are now open to companies funded through foreign investments. Both Chinese enterprises and foreign-invested enterprises (FIEs) are now allowed to list on either of the two stock exchanges. Listings by FIEs are subject to approval by the Ministry of Commerce and the CSRC. Although there was no specific prohibition against public offerings by FIEs, very few FIEs were actually able to conduct an IPO as the listing rules only covered local companies. In practice, FIEs have had very limited access to the A-share market in practice.

Regulatory System

At the initial stage, the regulatory authority was dispersed among a variety of ministries and commissions at the central government level. A dual regulatory regime evolved. The Securities Commission was responsible for macro control while the CSRC exercised specific regulatory functions. The principal regulatory authority regulating securities in China now is the CSRC with the support of the self-regulatory stock exchanges and securities industry association.

11 Robert Cookson, 'Chinese Offerings Outpace Value of US IPO's, Financial Times, 13 December 2010, p. 18.

The CSRC became the sole regulator of the securities market in charge of approving and supervising the securities listing and trading in late 1997.[12] However, it was not regarded as an administrative agency until 1998 when the Securities Law 1998 came into effect and made the CSRC the sole regulator of the securities market. Thereafter, the CSRC rules were made administrative rules.

The day-to-day supervision and regulation of the securities market is delegated to the CSRC. The CSRC is empowered to supervise and administer participants in the securities industry, including securities issuers, listed companies, securities exchanges, securities companies, securities registration and settlement institutions, securities investment funds management institutions, securities investment consultancy institutions, credit rating institutions and professionals.

The CSRC is granted broad investigatory powers to enter the premises where illegal acts have been committed to investigate and obtain evidence; to question people, units and individuals involved in illegal acts; to check and duplicate records of securities transactions, financial accounts and other relevant documents and seal up and retain documents and materials; and to check funds accounts and securities accounts of people involved in illegal acts and apply to judicial institutions to freeze or to grant 'injunctions' where there is evidence that funds and securities, the subject matter of illegal acts, may be transferred or hidden.

Legal Sources

The Chinese securities market did not re-emerge until the mid-1980s after 40 years of non-existence. In great need of growing and regulating its securities market, China made great efforts to 'transplant' legal concepts and principles from other jurisdictions.

In this transplanting process, China learned a great deal from the United States and Hong Kong. Japanese and European experience has been less significant partly because these markets are less advanced than the United States market or much farther from Hong Kong, which is closer to China.[13] The legal transplant, however, may not be as effective as anticipated as some foreign legal concepts or principles simply do not suit the Chinese environment.

It is important to acknowledge the hierarchy of legal sources of securities regulations in China, from the upper to lower level: the constitution and laws passed by the National People's Congress and its Standing Committee; administrative regulations and local regulations; ministerial rules (including a variety of commissions of the State Council); and local administrative rules. In addition, the listing rules of the Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges also play a critical role in securities regulations.

China's securities sector has been undergoing continuous and dramatic changes as part of China's transition from a planned economy into a 'socialist market economy'. China is at an epochal juncture, where the regulatory infrastructure over Chinese banking, securities and insurance industries is still in the progress of evolution. It is anticipated that there will be a steady stream of new laws and regulations in these industries in the future.

Laws Governing the Securities Sector

Company Law

Comprehensive company law legislation did not exist in China until the adoption of the PRC Company Law in 1994, which applies to all types of company ownership including listed companies. The new PRC Company Law came into force on 1 January 2006, which substantially amended the Company Law 1994.

The significance of the Company Law in regulating the securities market reflects its established principles of fiduciary duty imposed on the directors. Under the Company Law, a director is not allowed to make use of his position to make personal gains. In addition, a director is under legal obligations not to conduct the same business as the company's business for their personal interests or for other people's personal interests.

The duty of loyalty also is imposed on directors, supervisors and senior executive officers as a general rule. The directors, supervisors and officers of the listed joint-stock company have the duty of information disclosure.

The new amendments to the Company Law only relax the regulatory regime by simply stipulating that the listing and trading of a company's stock on the stock exchanges shall be in accordance with the Securities Law, relevant regulations and listing rules of the stock exchanges.

Securities Law

The PRC Securities Law promulgated on 29 December 1998 and further amended on 27 October 2005 by the National People's Congress is the most comprehensive securities legislation issued in China. The Securities Law covers a wide array of matters ranging from domestic share issuances and trading to takeovers of companies limited by shares.

The new Securities Law is more market-orientated and substantially changed the administration of securities listing as well as lowered the criteria for stock to be listed on the stock exchanges. The new Securities Law replaced the old approval system (where the stock listing must be approved by the CSRC) with a new regime which provides that listing applications should be submitted to the stock exchange for approval according to law. The new Securities Law also lowers the capital requirements for stock listing by a company from RMB 50 million to RMB 30 million,[14] and eliminates such restrictions as the three-year operating history, three-consecutive-year profit making history, and at least 1,000 shareholders holding shares of more than RMB 1,000 face value.[15]

The new Securities Law enhances the minority shareholder protection regime (by empowering shareholders to directly bring a lawsuit to the court in their own names if the board fails to take back stock illegally held by defined persons within a certain period of time upon request by the shareholders),[16] strengthens the disclosure rules (by requiring directors and officers to sign written confirmations on periodic reports),[17] and improves the legal liability regime concerning the misconduct of market actors and grants more administrative powers to the CSRC in enforcement.[18] These amendments indicate a more market-oriented approach taken by the government towards an infant but vibrant stock market.

The new Securities Law, however, lacks details in some respects. For instance, it only applies to A-shares and company bonds but not to B-shares, H-shares, N-shares, red-chips, and other securities listed outside China, government bonds, futures, and derivatives.

The Securities Law was not accompanied by a comprehensive review of previously adopted regulations, so that in many instances it remains unclear whether the new law supersedes earlier provisions. Concerns about the protection of minority shareholders' interests have not been adequately addressed in the Securities Law.

Securities Regulations

Apart from the Securities Law, a large number of regulations govern foreign investment in China's securities sector. For example, the Establishment of Securities Companies with Foreign Equity Participation Rules were promulgated on 1 June 2002 and amended on 28 December 2007, and the Administration of Securities Investment in China by Qualified Foreign Institutional Investors Procedures were promulgated on 24 August 2006 jointly by the CSRC and the PBOC.

The Administrative Measures for IPOs and Listings of Shares further improved the stock issue and listing rules by introducing detailed rules based on the relaxed criteria and market-oriented approach taken by the new Securities Law.

17 Securities Law 2005, art 68.

Fund Regulations

The key regulations in this sector are the State Council's Administration of Securities Investment Funds Tentative Procedures, effective as of 11 November 1997. The CSRC has elaborated on the Tentative Procedures by enacting some 20 regulations. In addition, the Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges and the state Administration of Taxation also have adopted some rules regulating the funds industry.

China agreed to allow foreign investment into its funds sector on a restrictive basis. Since World Trade Organization (WTO) accession, joint venture fund management companies have been allowed with foreign investment up to 33 per cent, and pursuant to China's WTO commitments permitted foreign investment would eventually increase to 49 per cent within the following three years. Several of the world's leading financial firms have responded, establishing foreign-invested fund management companies with Chinese partners. Approval was granted by the CSRC in 2004 to ABN AMRO Asset Management to acquire a 33 per cent stake in Xiangcai Hefeng Fund Management.

Securities Investment Funds Law

The National People's Congress adopted the PRC Securities Investment Funds Law on 28 October 2003, which was effective as of 1 June 2004. The Securities Investment Funds Law is expected to be revised shortly. Possible amendments include:

- Formally allowing PRC funds to invest in offshore funds (this is what the QDII regime allows, but the Funds Law has not yet been revised to reflect this change in practice);
- Enlarging the scope of shareholders at fund companies;
- Boosting stock incentive programs for employees of FMCs;
- Allowing the establishment of corporate-type funds (to supplement the current portfolio of contractual-type funds);
- Expanding investment channels of mutual funds (to permit investment in private equity, real-estate investment trusts, and open-end funds); and
- Enhancing protection of public fund investors.

Governing Authorities

For a long time, the two stock exchanges were under the supervision of their local municipal governments, and the issuing and trading rules were set by the municipal governments with the approval of the People's Bank of China (PBOC).[19] The PBOC and other ministries issued a large number of rules on the issuing and trading of shares. The national regulatory body was established in October 1992, when the State Council established the CSRC and the Securities

19 Shenzhen Interim Measures for Share Issue and Trading 1991.

Commission, which was the national authority in charge of formulating securities policy on a unified basis and was subsequently made a part of the CSRC. Thereafter, the stock exchanges were under the administration of the local governments while being supervised by the CSRC.[20]

This dual-regulatory model was further confirmed in the Interim Measures of Administration of Stock Exchanges in July 1993. In 1998, the CSRC took over regulatory powers over the mainland securities market from the Securities Commission. Nevertheless, other ministries and commissions of the State Council may still exert varying level of influence over the company's business operation and management.

Each ministry or commission may set its own rules regulating one or more aspects of the securities market. For instance, supervision and control of market intermediaries such as securities companies, fund management companies, financial asset management companies, and trust investment companies has now been divided among the CSRC, the China Banking Regulatory Authority, and the China Insurance Regulatory Authority.

Although relevant ministries and commissions also may issue joint decrees,[21] there is not an effective coordination mechanism among these authorities. Local government also may be involved in the share issuance and trading if the listed company is transformed from an SOE. The very existence of multiple regulators does not necessarily improve the regulatory regime. Rather, it may increase the transactional costs and harm efficiency of the securities market as different authorities may have different policy concern, regulatory focus, legislative agenda, and monitoring tools.

China Securities Regulatory Commission

The Securities Law expressly confirms the CSRC's status of a centralized independent governing body. The functions of the CSRC include:

- Formulating laws and regulations in relation to the securities industry and exercise of the approval powers under the laws and regulations;
- Supervising and administering the issuance, trading, registration, custody, and settlement of securities;
- Supervising and administering participants in the industry including securities issuers, listed companies, securities exchanges, securities companies, securities registration and settlement institutions, securities investment funds management organizations, securities investment consultancy institutions,

- Formulating qualifications and codes of conduct for securities professionals;
- Supervising the proper disclosure of information on securities issuance and transactions;
- Supervising the conduct of the Securities Trade Association; and
- Investigating any conduct that violates laws and administrative regulations.

It is clear that the CSRC has the dual power of overseeing and managing the securities market and of standardizing existing law and regulations on a uniform and centralized basis. This centralization movement suggests that local and municipal governments have been removed from the law-making or IPO approval and selection process. The CSRC is granted broad investigatory powers to take the following actions:

- Entering premises where illegal acts have been committed to investigate and to obtain evidence;
- Questioning people and entities involved in illegal acts and requiring them to make statements;
- Checking and duplicating records of securities transactions, financial accounts, and other relevant documents and sealing up and retaining documents and materials that may be removed or concealed; and
- Checking funds accounts and securities accounts of people involved in illegal acts and applying to judicial institutions to freeze or to grant 'injunctions' where there is evidence that funds and securities, the subject matter of illegal acts, may be transferred or hidden.

The new Securities Law has apparently expanded the scope and nature of the securities under the CSRC's regulations, and granted more significant powers for the CSRC to exercise. The CSRC is now able to conduct on-the-spot investigations, including the power to freeze the accounts under investigation without an order from a judicial organ.[23] Nevertheless, in reality, the CSRC may have to coordinate with various authorities at different levels throughout China. In most cases, the CSRC must share regulatory authority over any potential listed company with both local authorities where the company is based and the ministry or commission in charge of the industrial sector in which the company operates. This indicates that the CSRC does lack the capacity to investigate and oversee all the aspects of the listed company's business operation, financial management, and regulatory compliance.

The new Securities Law also spells out a number of offences and penalties which the CSRC may impose (in conjunction with the exchanges and local authorities) on the relevant parties.[24] One commonly used sanction is to publish criticism, issued by the stock exchange on which the company is listed, against the company and/or any party found guilty of acts or omissions affecting the company's shares. Public criticism may be used together with the imposition of penalty such as a fine or other administrative penalty. The CSRC can also place the relevant company or person under judicial investigation. A company may be delisted and a professional's licence to operate in securities-related areas in the event of severe violations of law. Criminal actions have been more often used by the CSRC for combating securities market malfeasance, which may help strengthen the CSRC's enforcement.

Securities Companies

Under the Securities Law 1998, only securities companies can act as brokers and are classified as comprehensive and brokerage securities companies.[25] Securities companies must apply for a business license. Comprehensive securities companies might engage in the following businesses: (a) brokerage; (b) securities business as a principal; (c) securities underwriting; and (d) other businesses approved by the CSRC.[26] Brokerage securities companies were not allowed to conduct other types of business except brokerage business.[27]

This restriction was removed in the Securities Law 2005. Accordingly, the scope of business of securities companies has been broadened to include not only acting as brokers and principals, but also financial and investment consultants, securities managers, as well as listing sponsors.[28]

Joint Venture Sino-Foreign Securities Company

China committed itself to, within three years after accession to the WTO, permitting foreign securities institutions to establish Sino-foreign joint venture securities companies in China, with up to one-third of the total equity interest being held by foreign investors. Nevertheless, China made no commitment as to when, or if, it would permit foreign companies and banks to increase their equity interest in joint venture securities companies above one-third, or to establish wholly foreign-owned securities companies in China.

Prior to China's accession to the WTO, ad hoc approvals had already been issued. Thus, China International Capital Corporation Limited, a joint venture set up by Morgan Stanley International Incorporated and China Construction Bank, had already been in operation for approximately six years. Another joint venture securities company, BOCI Securities Co Ltd, was set up in March 2002 with 49 per cent owned by Bank of China International Holdings Co Ltd. At present, Sino-foreign securities companies are allowed to:

- Underwrite A-share offerings;
- Underwrite and trade B-shares, H-shares (ie, Hong Kong-listed but non-Hong Kong registered), and government and corporate bonds; and
- Launch managed funds.

Joint venture securities companies can engage in business directly without any Chinese intermediaries but may not engage in trading of equity shares for their own accounts. Foreign investors can now participate in the Chinese securities sector in a variety of ways, including through:

- The Qualified Foreign Institutional Investor (QFII) Program (which allows a QFII to bring capital into China and purchase A-shares and listed bonds directly, subject to various limitations);
- The establishment of foreign-invested fund management or securities companies; and
- The purchases of B-shares, H or N (ie, New York-listed) shares, or shares of red chips (ie, Hong Kong-registered and listed companies whose principal business assets and operations are inside China).

In addition, a foreign entity may be engaged by a QDII security institution to act as an investment advisor if it satisfies such qualifications as having participated in the investment management business for more than five years and having securities assets in the most recent fiscal year valued at no less than US $10 billion.

An emerging funds industry has been developing in China for several years. As at December 2006, China now has 58 fund management companies that have developed more than 300 securities investment funds under the umbrella of eight fund custodians. It is estimated that the total assets of the existing Chinese funds are worth in excess of RMB 856 billion, which accounts for merely 11 per cent of the capitalization of the A-share market. Investment funds is a growing part of the China's securities markets. Foreign securities firms are encouraged to joint venture with Chinese securities companies or acquire a stake in Chinese securities companies. The qualification requirements for foreign investor include:

- Being a securities firm licensed to conduct securities business in its country of incorporation and a record of operating in the financial sector for more than 10 years;
- Having not been subject to any material sanction imposed by any securities regulatory body or judicial department during the previous three years;

- Having a sound internal control system;
- Having a good reputation and good business achievements in the international securities market and its various risk control targets for the previous three years and having met the legal requirements in the country of incorporation; and
- For a joint venture securities company, having registered capital of no less than RMB 500 million with the equity interest held by the foreign party not exceeding one-third of the total registered capital of the joint venture.

In the life insurance sector, foreign insurance firms are entitled to establish Sino-foreign joint ventures with up to 50 per cent foreign ownership. In the non-life insurance sector, foreign firms are permitted to establish branches and subsidiaries in China. The threshold for being registered as a Sino-foreign joint venture is 25 per cent foreign equity. A foreign insurer which applies to set up insurance business in China must have been in the insurance business for more than 30 years at the time of application and total assets at year-end prior to submission of the application must be greater than US $5 billion (or US $500 million for insurance brokerage business applicants). The applicant must have had a representative office in the PRC for more than two years.

Stock Exchanges

There are only two securities exchanges in China, one in Shanghai and the other in Shenzhen. Both are non-profit entities. Only securities companies which are registered as members of a securities exchange may participate in the trading of securities by centralized bidding. Two stock exchanges have primary control over the daily trading of domestic shares, and also scrutinize listing applications.[29]

A stock exchange may impose more specific or stringent listing conditions in addition to the listing conditions in the Securities Law as long as the prior approval is obtained from the CSRC. Securities exchanges are empowered to suspend, resume, or terminate the listing or trading of company shares[30] and bonds in accordance with law.

This seems a decentralizing move, a departure from the CSRC to a more autonomous stock exchange-based regulatory regime. The CSRC delegated authority to the stock exchanges as to the decisions on suspending the listings of companies that turn into consecutive losses.[31] Securities exchanges are required to make allocations to a risk fund from membership fees and transaction levies.

Admission

When joining the World Trade Organization (WTO), China promised that licensing criteria in the financial services sector would be solely prudential and there would be no economic needs test or quantitative limits on licences. The base requirements imposed on the foreign investors in the banking industry include being of ongoing profitability; having a good credit rating; having no record of major violation of laws and regulations; having experience in international financial activities; and having effective policies on anti-money laundering activities.

In order to qualify to invest, the foreign investor's total assets at the end of the preceding year must, in principle, have been at least US $10 billion if the target is a commercial bank or a municipal or rural credit union and at least US $1 billion if the target is a non-bank financial institution such as a finance company. According to China's WTO Agreement, China is committed to open its securities industry based on the following timetable:

- By 2001: representative offices in China become Special Members of PRC Stock Exchanges; joint venture (33 per cent) to conduct domestic securities investment fund management business; foreign securities institutions may directly trade B-shares; and
- By 2004: joint venture (49 per cent) in fund management business; joint venture (33 per cent) in underwriting A-shares and underwriting and trading of B- and H-shares as well as government and corporate debts, and launching of funds.

Although foreign companies may trade Chinese shares, they cannot issue shares in the Chinese securities market. Foreign investors can invest in Chinese stock exchanges via various routes. The most common way is to subscribe for B-shares, which are available to foreign investors, including investors from Hong Kong, Macau, and Taiwan. Another route is to invest through the QFII scheme.

Authorization and Registration Process

The approval for the establishment of a Sino-foreign joint venture securities company involves a two-phase process. The first phase entails the filing of an application with the CSRC by a representative jointly appointed by the shareholders, the review of the application by the CSRC, a decision by the CSRC on whether or not to approve the application, and registration with the state Administration of Industry and Commerce (SAIC) if approval is granted by the CSRC.

The second phase involves the filing of an application with the CSRC for the Securities Business Operation Permit. A foreign investor may choose to acquire a stake in an existing Chinese securities company and to apply for the conversion of the domestic securities company into a foreign investment securities company, which requires approval of the CSRC.

Securities

Types of Securities

A-Share vs. B-Share. A-shares are domestically listed shares of Chinese companies while B-shares, often known as 'domestically listed foreign investment shares' or 'special RMB-denominated shares', are ordinary shares of Chinese listed companies that are listed on the domestic stock exchanges but traded in either Hong Kong dollars or United States dollars. A publicly listed company in China may artificially have two or more classes of shares, A-share, B-share, and H-share (or N-share, S-share).[32] Both A and B-shares are domestic shares (as they are traded in domestic stock exchanges) while H, N and S-shares are foreign capital shares (denominated in foreign currency) and are listed on the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong, New York Stock Exchange, and Singapore Stock Exchange, respectively. Upon the approval of the CSRC, an A-share company listed either on the Shanghai or Shenzhen Stock Exchange may simultaneously issue B-shares to foreign investors on the same stock exchange.[33]

B-shares, however, carry the same voting rights and claims on the company's earnings and assets,[34] even though B-shares are quoted in RMB but are settled in a foreign currency, typically United States dollars on the Shanghai Stock Exchange and Hong Kong dollars on the Shenzhen Stock Exchange. Similarly, B-share dividends are paid in United States dollars for Shanghai-listed stocks and in Hong Kong dollars for Shenzhen-listed stocks. H, N, and S-shares are listed on the Hong Kong, New York, or Singapore Stock Exchanges and the trading of them is denominated in Hong Kong dollars, United States dollars and Singapore dollars, respectively.

The issuing and trading of B-shares was as early as 1988 when the Shenzhen Development Bank issued and traded B-shares in Hong Kong dollars, before the release of B-share trading rules issued by the Shenzhen Interim Measures Concerning Administration of RMB Special Shares on 5 December 1989, and the nation-wide rules, that is, the Provisions on Listing of Foreign Investment Shares Inside China by a Shareholding Company issued by the State Council on 32 The share capital of a listed company in China also is segmented depending on who owns or can lawfully own the shares. For instance, legal person shares are listed and eligible for trading on domestic or overseas stock exchanges while non-legal person shares such as state-owned shares cannot be traded on stock exchanges and can only be transferred pursuant to private transactions and government approval is required.

33 According to the Measures for the Administration of Securities Investments in China by Qualified Foreign Institutional Investors ('QFII'), issued by the CSRC, People's Bank of China and State Administration of Foreign Exchange on 24 August 2006, under the QFII scheme, foreign investors can also participate in China's debt and equity markets by acquiring A-shares in China's domestic stock exchange.

34 In most countries where restrictions are imposed on foreign investment, foreigners pay a premium above the price paid by local investors. Nonetheless, this is not the case in China where B-shares held by foreign investors trade shares at a substantial discount relative to A-shares held by local investors.

25 December 1995 as well as the Provisions on Listing of Foreign Investment Shares Inside China by a Shareholding Company Implementing Rules of 3 May 1996. The B-share market has not been formally open to domestic residents with certain limitations until February 2001.[35]

These limitations include that a domestic resident may open B-share trading accounts and trade B-shares if he deposits his foreign exchange at a bank located within China, and the trading of B-shares must be through a broker. Nevertheless, given the existence of a black market for foreign exchange, domestic residents participated in the B-share market much earlier and their illegal participation also triggered the passing of the Circular Number on Strict Control of Opening of B-share Trading Accounts by the CSRC in June 1996 with the purpose of cracking down on the trading of B-shares by domestic residents. However, given the number of eligible investors for B-shares, the size of B-shares was once only five per cent of the tradable capitalization of the A-share market[36] and remains small and, more importantly, the market remains illiquid. By November 2006, among 1,396 listed companies, merely 109 companies issued B-shares, while 1,345 companies issued A-shares.[37]

As A-shares and B-shares are different in that they have different issuing purposes, objectives, and trading currencies, there are separate and common rules regulating their IPOs. The purpose of differentiating B-shares from A-shares was mainly to encourage investment from outside mainland China while RMB is not freely convertible.[38] Although B-shares are freely traded, they were prohibited from being converted into A-shares.

The underlying rational of this restriction is to isolate A-shares from inflows of foreign capital so that the domestic market can be protected from international market volatility. The differentiation of A and B-shares resulted in a separate set of forces of demand and supply, thereby producing different prices and earnings ratios. As a result, the same share may be priced differently in A and B-shares market. For example, between 1992 and 1993, the index for A-shares received positive returns while the index of B-shares received negative returns, which in turn affected the pricing and trading volume of each share.[39] In effect, B-shares were traded at a discount to A-shares even though they are both issued by the same listed company.

The defects of segregating the stock market are well recognized by practitioners, scholars, and government officials. China has started to unveil legislation with the goal of dismantling the dichotomy between shares reserved for citizens and those reserved for foreigners. The latest movement is the implementation of the Administration of Securities Investments in China by Qualified Foreign Institutional Investors Tentative Procedures and the Notice on Relevant Issues Concerning the Transfer to Foreign Investors of Listed Company state-owned Shares and Legal Person Shares. Accordingly, foreign investors are now able to participate in both the A-share market as well as B-share and H-share markets. Meanwhile, domestic investors also are able to open trading accounts for B-shares.[40]

Purchase of A-Shares. The CSRC and the People's Bank of China jointly issued the Interim Measures Concerning Administration of Investment Inside China by Qualified Foreign Institutional Investors (the 'QFII Tentative Measures'), which became effective as of 1 December 2002. Under the QFII scheme, foreign investors that satisfy prescribed qualifications are able to invest in A-shares,[41] state bonds, corporate bonds, and other financial instruments subject to the approval by the competent authorities.[42] A foreign investor must open a RMB bank account with a Chinese bank and Chinese securities companies for trading purposes. However, a single QFII cannot hold more than 10 per cent of the aggregate A-shares in a single listed company. The aggregate limit of all QFIIs' investment in a single listed company may not exceed 20 per cent of the company's total A-shares.[43]

The CSRC, PBOC, and SAFE jointly issued the Administration of Securities Investments in China by Qualified Foreign Institutional Investors Procedures ('New QFII Rules') in August 2006, which came into effect on 1 September 2006. The new QFII Rules lower the threshold of being a QFII, in particular, to insurance companies and fund management companies.[44] Accordingly, pensions, charitable funds, donation funds, trust companies, government investing management companies can now apply for the QFII qualification.[45] The lock-up period for QFII investment is shortened to three months for pensions, insurance capitals, and mutual funds. In addition, QFII is allowed to open securities accounts under their own names instead of jointly opening accounts with domestic securities companies and custodian banks.[46] Every QFII can appoint three domestic securities companies for securities trade on two stock exchanges in China.[47]

Purchase of B Shares. A Chinese company limited by shares, subject to the CSRC approval, may issue shares to designated or non-designated investors overseas, and the shares may be listed overseas (including being transferable on overseas stock exchanges.[48] If a company plans to do so, it should lodge a written application, together with relevant supporting documents, to the CSRC for approval.[49]

The State Council regulated the issue and trade of B-shares by issuing the Foreign Capital Shares Provisions in December 1995. Foreign capital shares entitle shareholders to the same rights. Similarly, the holders of foreign capital shares also bear the same obligations that the holders of RMB shares do.[50] The Foreign Capital Shares Provisions also define the scope of investors capable of investing in foreign capital shares, and outline the requirements that a company must satisfy in order to apply for approval to issue foreign capital shares.

The State Council Securities Commission in 1996 released the Listing of Foreign Capital Shares Inside China by a Company Limited by Shares Provisions Implementing Rules, which provide for the issue, listing, trade, registration, and clearing of B-shares, disclosure information, and accounting and auditing issues related to B-share issue and trade. A company limited by shares may issue foreign capital shares to specified or unspecified investors inside China and list shares on the stock exchanges.[51] Subject to the approval of the CSRC, foreign capital shares listed inside China may be circulated and transferred outside China.[52]

Types of Shares in a Shareholding Company Converted from SOEs. Shares in China can be classified into four categories: state shares, legal person shares, employee shares, and public individual shares in a shareholding company transformed from an SOE. In companies that are established by share issue, there are state shares, legal entity shares, and public individual shares.

Both state shares and legal person shares are state-owned shares. The percentage of state-owned shares in an SOE is subject to the government's decision, ranging from 40 per cent to 80 per cent. The key feature of the state-owned shares was its non-transferability, which resulted in a low liquidity of the securities market. This situation has recently improved due to the passage of the State Council's Regulations on Division of state-owned Shareholding. The non-transferability of state-owned shares leads to the unique phenomenon of 'a dominant single shareholder', which suggests that the state has the dominant holding of shares with voting rights.

It was reported that listed companies with state control once made up 80 per cent of the stock market in China.[53] By June 2002, 6five per cent of the listed companies had the state as their largest shareholder.[54] The existence of state-owned shares involves the government in the operation of SOEs or holding companies after their transformation, and may harm the rights of minority shareholders, in most cases, individual shareholders.

The existence of a large portion of state-owned shares reduced the liquidity of the securities market. The CCP decided to reduce part of the state-owned shares in the Fourth Meeting of the Fifteen Congress in September 1999. The reduction place had two steps: to reduce the state-owned shareholding to 51 per cent; and to further reduce the state shareholding by need.[55] Two companies were chosen by the CSRC to conduct an experiment of the share reduction plan through share allotment in October 1999. In these experiments, state-owned shares were sold to the holders of transferrable shares in the same company at a price higher than the company value but 10 times less than the issue price.[56] In June 2001, the Ministry of Finance, with the approval of the State Council, released the Measures on Reduction of state Shareholding.

Due to the market plunge, the CSRC had to stop the experiment by issuing the administrative directives with the State Council's approval on 23 October 2001. While the CSRC was seeking public feedback on the share reduction plan, it formally stopped the experiment in June 2002. The state-owned shareholding reduction was not resumed until 2005 when the CSRC started to implement the shareholding division plan.[57]

Legal person shares are the shares purchased by the companies and legal entities, as opposed to natural persons. By June 2002, 31 per cent of the Chinese listed companies had a legal person as their largest single shareholder.[58] Legal person shares can be further divided into five sub-groups. Shares owned by a legal person that are owned by the state are named state-owned legal person shares. Together with state shares, they are together called state-owned shares. If the issuing entity is a shareholding company transformed from an SOE, many legal person shares are acquired by the senior officers of the company. If the issuing entity is not an SOE, most legal entity shares are acquired by other enterprises. Shares owned by collective enterprises (which can be established by a local government, derived from the state, or invested by individuals but attached to an administrative department for tax benefits) are collective enterprise legal person shares.

Private enterprises also may own shares. In this case, these shares are called private enterprise legal person shares. Similarly, shares owned by foreign-invested enterprises such as equity joint ventures, cooperative joint ventures, and wholly foreign-owned enterprises are named foreign-invested enterprise legal person shares. Investment funds and pensions (with legal person status) also may own shares.

Thus, these shares are institutional legal person shares. Similar to state shares, legal person shares are not freely transferrable. Both legal person shares and state shares were prohibited from being traded freely in the stock market. Moreover, both state shares and legal person shares were not available to foreign investors due to the regulatory restrictions such as the Notice on the Suspension of Transfer State Shares and Legal Person Shares of Listed Companies to Foreign Investors in 1995.[59] Legal person shares could only be traded through a separate electronic network.[60]

As the majority of a Chinese listed company's issued and outstanding shares are non-publicly tradable state shares and legal person shares, the purchase and acquisition of these shares are important in the acquisition of corporate control. As discussed above, given their uniqueness, the rules applicable to the purchase and acquisition of state shares and legal person shares are separate from those to freely tradable shares. A number of regulations and rules regulate the purchase and acquisition of state or legal person shares by the foreign investors. For instance, the Ministry of Finance issued the Notice on the Issues Relating to the Administration of State-owned Shares in Companies Limited by Shares on 1 July 2000, according to which approval from the Ministry of Finance is needed for the acquisition. The Notice on Relevant Issues Concerning the Transfer to Foreign Investors of State-owned Shares and Legal Person Shares in the Listed Companies was issued jointly by the CSRC, the Ministry of Finance, and the State Economic and Trade Commission in November 2002.

59 This was not changed until 2002 with the Notice on the Relevant Issues Concerning the Transfer to Foreign Investors of Listed Companies State Shares and Legal Person Shares.

Thus, a qualified foreign investor[61] is technically able to become a controlling shareholder in a listed company. The transfer of state shares and legal person shares in listed companies to foreign investors should not only comply with the Foreign Investment Industrial Guidance Catalogue [62] but also the CSRC regulations and listing rules.[63] State or legal person shares should be transferred through public bid.[64] Foreign investors who acquired state or legal person shares are subject to a 12-month lock up period after full payment of the entire transfer price is made.[65] However, the listed company whose state or legal shares have been transferred to foreign investors are not qualified to be a foreign-invested enterprise. In other words, such a listed company should be operated as usual.[66]

Individual Chinese citizens may own shares. These shares are termed individual shares, and can be further divided into two sub-groups: internal employee shares and public individual shares. Public individual shares are offered to the general public. By contrast, internal employee shares are the shares that the company issues internally to its employees as staff benefits. These shares are usually sold at a minimal price, which is much lower than that for publicly issued shares. Directors and senior managers may receive more employee shares than other employees. However, in the early stage, employee shares were not freely transferrable even though holders of employee shares were entitled to dividends and new share allotments. In 1992, employee shares were allowed to be traded on the capital market as shares issued to and traded by the general public.

When these shares are sold in the market, the employees will receive a premium due to the difference between the issue prices of different types of shares, which further forms a black market. In response to the problems in connection with the employee shares, the Urgent Circular Number Concerning Immediate Prohibition on Non-standard Issue of Employee Internal Shares was distributed by the State Council on 3 April 1993. According to this Circular Number, the issuance of new shares would not be approved; employee shares could not be transferred within three years after their issue; these shares could only be transferred between company employees three years after the issue; these shares could only be traded in the market three years after their listing; and the black market of share trading must be cracked down on.

The State Commission of Restructuring the Economic System (SCERS) subsequently issued a series of regulations strengthening the regulatory regime: the Regulations Concerning Employee Shareholding in Companies Issuing Shares to Designated People of 5 July 1993 (which imposed limitations on the issuing and trading of employee shares); and the Circular Number Concerning Correction of Irregular Practices of Employee Shareholding by Joint-Stock Companies Issuing Shares to Designated Companies of 5 July 1993 (requiring companies which issued employee shares after 3 April 1993 to cancel such share issues and refund the capital and interest to employees). From 1994 onwards, the employees were no longer able to subscribe to shares before IPOs. Instead, the employees may be granted with the stock options. The issuance of employee shares was formally put to an end in 1998 when the CSRC issued the Circular Number Concerning the Stoppage of Issuing Company Employee Shares. This was a substantial step to moving towards a free and uniform securities market.[67]

The segregated share structure and impossibility of cross-trading between different share markets de facto protected the infant securities market in China and, more importantly, kept private investors, foreign or domestic, from acquiring corporate control of listed companies. State control remains a strong Chinese characteristic in the stock market. In 2002, for instance, fewer than 200 listed companies out of the total 1,200 companies did not have state ownership.[68]

The immediate consequence is the low liquidity, small market scale and excessive speculation in the marketplace. The dominance of state control in the Chinese stock market indicates that the market itself is not designed as a tool to deprive the state of control in SOEs or to promote Western capitalism. By contrast, it appears that the market is devised to enhance a socialist economic or market order. The share classification and segment also added more difficulty in regulation and operation of stock markets as various shares are governed by separate trading and issuing rules.

H-Shares. H-shares are issued by PRC-incorporated companies listed on the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong and are subscribed for and traded in the foreign currency by Hong Kong and foreign investors (without restrictions). The abbreviation of H represents Hong Kong. Due to the listing activities in Hong Kong, the issuing companies must comply with Hong Kong Companies Ordinance and listing rules of the Hong Kong Stock Exchange even though they are incorporated in the PRC and have to comply with PRC Company Law and other laws and regulations. The face value of H-shares is denominated in 67 However, the listing rules of the Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges still contain provisions concerning the employee shares.

Renminbi but subscribed for and traded in Hong Kong dollars. The issuer of H-shares must operate according to two separate and different legal systems: on the one hand, the mainland Chinese legal system, which is widely viewed as a relatively underdeveloped regime and, on the other, the Hong Kong legal system, a common law originated and well-developed regime.

In this sense, H-share firms inevitably reflect combined dimensions and tensions of both Chinese and Hong Kong systems.[69] The availability of H-shares suggests that the Chinese market and legal system may not necessarily economically satisfy the needs of foreign investors as well as domestic companies. Foreign investors want to invest into Chinese portfolio companies but the investment of B-shares may encounter some practical difficulties due to the non-convertibility of Renminbi. For performing domestic companies, the vulnerable and weak Chinese securities market may not satisfy these companies' financial needs. Therefore, the Hong Kong securities market is a natural option.

The listing of H-shares must be approved by the State Council. The first Chinese company listed in Hong Kong was Tsingtao Brewery Company, which was one of nine companies approved by the State Council to be listed in Hong Kong.[70] The selection of the first batch of nine firms by the Chinese government represented a range of different industry sectors and regions.[71] Most early H-shares were issued by the foreign-listed arms of large state-owned enterprises. More recent years saw more and more private companies and small or medium-sized enterprises listed in Hong Kong and other offshore stock exchanges.

The main requirements that should be satisfied for the purpose of the CSRC approval are, among others, in the Special Regulations of the State Council Concerning Floating and Listing of Shares Overseas by Companies Limited by Shares, issued by the State Council on 4 July 1994.[72] By mid-2007, the number 69 The Hong Kong Stock Exchange, the Hong Kong Securities and Futures Commission, and the CSRC entered into a Memorandum of Regulatory Co-operation on Regulation of Mainland Enterprises Listed in Hong Kong on 19 June 1993.

70 Li Zhangzhe, Finally Successful: The Report of the Development of Chinese Share Market, 270-271. Other eight companies were Shanghai Petrochemical Co., Ltd., Beiren Printing Machinery Holdings Ltd., Guangzhou Shipyard International Co., Ltd., Maanshan Iron and Steel Co., Ltd., Kunming Machine Tool Co., Ltd., Yizheng Chemical Fibre Co., Ltd., Tianjin Bohai Chemical Industry (Group) Co., Ltd., and Dongfang Electrical Machinery Co., Ltd.

71 H-shares were initially approved in 'batches'. The approval authority released the list of the successful applicants for listing approval periodically. By the end of the 1990s, applications were reviewed and decided upon separately rather than in batches.

72 Also, the Special Assessment Guidelines, the most recent of which were issued by the State Council on 14 July 1999 and 21 September 1999, also regulate the listing of Chinese companies on Hong Kong's main board and growth enterprise market.

of Hong Kong-listed Chinese companies rose to 143, 35 of which had domestic A-shares listed on one of the mainland stock exchange.[73]

The price gap between domestic and foreign share values of dually listed Chinese companies has narrowed in recent years, from 380 per cent in 2001 to about 30 per cent at the end of 2005.[74] The price gap was once the most difficult challenge to overcome for a dual listing of the company as the PRC Company Law contains a 'same share same rights' principle. The technical solution to this challenge is to stagger the listing of the same company in Hong Kong, usually several to 12 months after the listing in China first.

The applicant enterprise must also satisfy Hong Kong legal requirements in order to be listed in Hong Kong. For instance, the listing company must amend the articles of association in accordance with the Hong Kong Companies Ordinance. A listing application must be submitted to the Hong Kong Stock Exchange. Hong Kong listing requirements must be satisfied.

An H-share company may be also subject to the de facto control of its parent company, which often is an unlisted or listed state-owned enterprise in China. Some subsidiaries of state-owned enterprises have been trying to spin off from their parent companies and list in Hong Kong. The CSRC in August 2004 released the Certain Issues Concerning the Regulation of Offshore Listing of Subsidiaries of Domestic Listed Companies Circular Number to regulate the spin-off listing in Hong Kong by the PRC-listed companies.

Accordingly, a listed Chinese company can apply to the CSRC for the listing of a subsidiary in Hong Kong. The major concern of the CSRC is that a minimum level of value still remains with the parent company after the spin-off. For instance, the entitlement of the listed parent company to the distribution of the net profit of the controlled subsidiary should not account for 50 per cent or more of the total net profit of the listed parent company reflected in its consolidated financial statements. The entitlement of the listed parent company to the net assets of the controlled subsidiary should not account for 30 per cent or more of the total net assets of the listed parent company reflected in its consolidated financial statements.[75]

Red Chips. Some companies incorporated in Hong Kong are funded by the Chinese government. These companies are generally termed as 'window companies' of the Chinese government. The shares of these companies are called 'red chips'. The issuance of shares by these companies must comply with Hong Kong law rather than Chinese law.

N-Shares. N-shares are the shares that are listed by Chinese companies on the New York Stock Exchange to foreign investors.[76] N-shares are denominated in Renminbi but traded in United States dollars. The first N-shares were issued by Shenyang Jinbei Automobile Company through one of its controlled companies. N-shares also may be issued through American Depository Receipts.

Bonds. Apart from A-shares and B-shares, bonds are traded on the two domestic stock exchanges. Bonds include corporate bonds, treasury bonds repurchases, convertible bonds, financial bonds, construction bonds, and state treasury bonds (T-bonds).

Treasury bonds are securities with fixed interest rates, issued by the Ministry of Finance, and are floated to cover budget deficits as well as to raise funds for large construction projects. The issuance of state treasury bonds is subject to a quota issued by the Ministry of Finance each year with the approval of the State Council.[77] The term of state treasury bonds vary from 20 years, 10 years, eight years, five years, three years, and one year to six months, which provides more flexibility and incentives to investors.

The state treasury bonds market was further opened in 1988 with non-financial institutions being underwriters, [78] and being traded over the counter. Construction bonds are issued by the Ministry of Finance to finance major construction projects or infrastructure projects.[79] Financial bonds are issued by banks and other non-banking financial institutions as an additional source of funds and are usually used for specific financial projects.

Corporate bonds are issued by trading enterprises to supplement their general capital needs.[80] The first batch of enterprises issued corporate bonds in 1984.[81] The term of corporate bonds is often shorter. The bonds are usually available to Chinese investors who reside in China. Overseas Chinese are not eligible to invest in bonds.

Funds. Funds appeared before the emergence of B-shares. China Oriental Company set up the China Oriental Fund in Hong Kong and London in December 1985.[82] Bank of China and China International Trust and Investment Corporation set up mutual funds in 1987.[83]

The early stage of mutual funds was on a small scale with the aim of attracting foreign investment.[84] The first fund targeting domestic investors was set up in July 1991 with the approval of the Shenzhen Branch of the People's Bank of China.[85] More than twenty funds, open-ended or close-ended, were launched for the wide institutional and retail investors in 1992.[86] The fund management companies are set up by the government.

Issuance of Shares

The first regulations at national-level regulating the formation of and issuance of shares by joint-stock companies was the Standard Opinion for Joint Stock Limited Companies, issued by the State Council Restructuring Commission on 15 May 1992. The issuance of shares by a joint-stock company is now subject to both the Company Law and the Securities Law. One thing in common under these two laws is the government's involvement.

Under the Company Law, the establishment of a joint-stock company must be approved by the competent government authority under the State Council or a local government.[87] Under this system, the government controls the number and type of the enterprises that could issue shares to the public and list in the stock market. The quota system not only reflects the cautious attitudes of the government towards growing the securities market but also the feature of the planning economy where China's economic reform started from. The State Development Planning Commission maintained an annual national shares issuing scheme, which set out the total number of shares to be issued, the types of shares, the category of issuers, and the way to issue shares.[88]

The quota was then allocated among ministries, at the central level, and provincial governments, at the local level.[89] The ministries and local governments selected SOEs and recommended them to the State Development and Planning Commission. A company which wants to issue shares to the public market must apply to the relevant authority. In this process, it was up to local leadership to determine which firm can be listed. Although some performance tests must be satisfied, the authorities' selection was largely politically driven and bore little resemblance to market forces. The local government may have used scare quotas for companies which were caught with financial difficulties (other than being financially healthy) or economically important to the local economy. The CSRC conducted the final review of these recommended ones and decided what shares could be issued.

The approval from the competent government authority is compulsory for the incorporation of a joint-stock company. In the approval process, the government authority will not only review the form of application documents but also the substance of the application, including the accuracy, completeness, and truthfulness of the application documents, creditworthiness, business operation, price of shares, and future of the company. The government's heavy involvement in the share issuing process was a key feature of China's securities market. The quota system, however, may not be fair to all the market players. For instance, private enterprises were placed in a more disadvantageous position due to their lack of affiliation with the central or local government, without which the quota may be difficult to be allocated to them. The quota system did not have a sufficient level of transparency and the market players were not aware of the exact thresholds which need to be satisfied in order to obtain the quota. The quota system was revoked in March 2001.

The approval and quota system only made sense when China was still in a transitional stage moving from a socialist planning economy to a socialist market economy. The Securities Law 1998 abolished the quota and approval system[90] by requiring that a share issue by means of a public offer be verified by the CSRC as well as in compliance with other requirements under the Company Law 1993.[91] This verification system 'shall be made public,[92] and shall be subject to supervision according to law'.[93] In practice, the verification system subjects the new issuance of shares to an initial review of the application by the Public Offering Supervision Department of the CSRC, and a subsequent review by the Share Issue Examination and Approval Committee (or sometimes translated as Public Offering Review Committee) under the CSRC.[94] The Committee is composed of 25 members, and the CSRC's chief investigator, chief counsel, chief accountant, and the general managers of the Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges are automatic members.[95]

Other members in the Committee are drawn from a wide range of interest groups including government agencies, financial intermediaries, institutional investors, stock exchanges, academic institutions, and overseas professionals.[96]

Persons involved in the approval of applications to issue shares may not have a material connection with, or accept gifts from, the applicant or hold shares of the applicant or have any private contact with the applicant.[97] A recommendation will be made by the Committee to the CSRC. In most cases, the CSRC will accept the Committee's recommendation making the Committee a de facto decision-making body for public offering applications.

Under the verification system, the CSRC no longer reviews the substance of the application as the applicant ensures the truthfulness, completeness, and accuracy of the application documents.[98] In effect, the CSRC will only look at the forms of the application documents and then make a decision on an application. The sponsors, in order to issue shares, must provide the CSRC with the application documents, including the business operation of the company, financial report, accounting report, list of directors, creditability of key managers, the means of public offer, the price for shares, and the usage of fundraising. Although the purpose of the adoption of the verification system is to simplify the share issuing process, the share issuing system has not been streamlined due to the involvement of the CSRC and looser de facto use of the quota system.[99] The selection of companies to be listed is to some extent made by the state instead of the market as the CSRC may be still concerned about (i) the control over the total amount of capital raised on the market; (ii) the proportion of listed companies from different industrial sectors and localities if the listing decisions are made; and (iii) favorable market reaction to the listing of companies. Consequently, the process probably becomes more complicated than before, and the selection of companies to be listed publicly is still to some extent made by the state other than the market.

The applicants and the public are protected by the Securities Law in that the CSRC must reach a decision on listing applications within three months from receiving the listing application documents; and in, addition, that reasons must be given if an application is rejected.[100] Nevertheless, the applicant or the public does not have any avenue for complaint if the CSRC rejects the application.[101]

101 The Administrative Law may make the CSRC accountable for its listing decisions. Under the Administrative Law, companies are more able to launch administrative litigations against the CSRC. The CSRC lost a lawsuit to Hainan Kaili Central Development & Construction Co. in 2000 for the CSRC's rejection of its listing application from 1998. Beijing Number 1 Intermediate Court ordered the CSRC to re-review the company's listing application within two months. This, however, may not be unusual as, for example, the Hong Kong Stock Exchange rarely provides any reasons for its decisions on listing-related matters.

The CSRC issued the new Measures on the Public Offering Review Committee, which came into effect on 9 May 2006, and outlined a three-stage approval process. In the first stage, the sponsor files the application documents and the CSRC's Issuance Department preliminarily examines and verifies the application documents. The second stage involves an ad hoc meeting by an issuance verification commission consisting of seven members, who examine the application documents prepared by the issuer, lawyers, accountants, financial advisers, and valuation institutions. The last stage is that the CSRC will make a final decision based on the recommendation made by the commission.

The new Measures for the Administration of Initial Public Offerings of Shares and the Listing thereof were issued and became effective on 18 May 2006 with the key purpose of reshaping the shareholder structure of the listed companies. Meanwhile, the new listing rules were issued by the Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges to implement the new Measures as well as the Company Law and Securities Law. Under the new Measures, the minimum registered capital requirement for listed firms remains at RMB 50 million, which must be paid up before the listing.

25 per cent of the issuer's total issued share capital is a minimum public float for the most listed companies. However, for the listed company with a total share capital of more than RMB 400 million, the standard for a minimum public float is changed from 15 per cent to 10 per cent of the total share capital. According to the new Measures, the issuer should be independent from its controlling shareholder and other companies controlled by that shareholder, in respect of its ownership of operating assets, financial system, personnel, business system and organization.

Issuer Requirements

- In order to issue shares by public offer, a company must satisfy the following conditions:
- Production and management of the company must conform to the industrial policies of the state;
- Only one kind of ordinary shares may be issued with equal shares for equal shares;
- The promoter's share capital may not constitute less than 35 per cent of the total share capital;
- The promoter's shares may not be less than RMB 30 million of the total shares issued by the company, except otherwise provided for by the state;
- The shares offered to the public may not be less than 2five per cent of the total share capital to be issued. Of these shares, the company employee-owned shares may not exceed 10 per cent of the number to be issued to the public; if the total number of shares to be issued is in excess of RMB 400 million, the CSRC may reduce the portion to be issued to the public; however, the minimum portion must be more than 10 per cent of the total shares;

- The promoters have no major violations of the PRC law in the past three consecutive years; and
- Other requirements set by the CSRC must be met.[102]

These requirements are applicable to the incorporation of new joint-stock companies. For an SOE to be transformed to a joint-stock company, the following requirements must be satisfied:

- The net assets account for more than 30 per cent of the total assets and the intangible assets account for no more than 20 per cent of the net assets at the end of the year prior to the year when the issue takes place, except otherwise provided for by the CSRC;
- The company has been making profits for three consecutive years; and
- Other requirements provided for by the CSRC must be met.[103]

Prospectus Requirements

The issuer needs to publicize the prospectus when issuing new shares[104] as well as the share listing notice. As far as the content and format of prospectus are concerned, the CSRC issued Rule Number 1 on Content and Format of Prospectus, which set out a standard format for a prospectus:

- The cover page of a prospectus, the catalogue of a prospectus, the appendix, a reminder of reading the auditing report, and interpretations of key concepts;
- Names of the issuer, shareholders, and purpose of share issue;
- General information about the issuing, such as the classification of shares, the issuing price, and the face value per share; the shareholding structure of the company; the usage of the capital to be raised; and distribution of profits;
- Investment risks;
- Detailed information about the issuer;
- The scope of business and technical support;
- Competition and related party transactions;
- Details of directors, supervisors, senior managerial staff, and major technical staff;
- Corporate governance scheme;
- Accounting and finance information;

Trading Rules

Procedure for IPOs. National level rules governing the issue and trading of domestic A-shares were the Administration of the Issuing and Trading of Shares Tentative Regulations, promulgated by the State Council on 22 April 1993. The current procedure for IPOs is outlined in the CSRC's Procedures for Verification of Share Issue 2000. A company needs to follow a five-step in order to be listed:

- The company must prepare and submit application documents to the CSRC after obtaining the approval from the provincial or ministerial authority. The CSRC will make a decision on whether to accept or reject the application within five working days after the application is lodged.
- The CSRC will have a preliminary review of the application documents after the application is accepted. A preliminary review opinion will be notified to the company and its underwriter within 30 days of accepting the application. The applicant may have to submit supplementary application materials. The CSRC may seek opinions from the State Development Planning Commission (the predecessor of the State Development and Reform Commission) and the State Commission of Economics and Trade (which was later merged into the Ministry of Commerce).
- The CSRC will transfer the application documents and its preliminary review results to the Share Issuing Verification Commission within 60 days after the acceptance of the application documents.
- The Share Issuing Verification Commission makes the decision on whether or not the share issue application is verified with reasons within three months after the application documents are received.
- The applicant whose application has been rejected may apply for an administrative review of the decision by the Share Issuing Verification Commission within 60 days after receiving the written decision. The CSRC should make a decision on whether an administrative review is to be conducted within 60 days after receiving the review application.

This five-step procedure is still time-consuming and bureaucratic. The whole procedure may take 155 days, which may harm the efficiency of the IPO process. Furthermore, the Securities Law 2005 requires the applicant company to have sponsors, which was first introduced by the CSRC's Provisional Measures on Securities Issuing and Listing Sponsorship System. The Securities Law 2005 makes a list of documents the applicant must submit to the CSRC for the IPO application. Among others, a prospectus is the major disclosure document.

Securities offering may be carried out through offline placement organized and completed by the underwriters or online issuances (via the electronic system of securities exchanges). If both are used, they should be conducted simultaneously.[105] This requirement may guarantee the equal access to the securities market by individual investors.

When the distribution of domestic A-shares is made through the securities companies, underwriting agreements should be signed for a period of no longer than 90 days.[106] An underwriting agreement can be either a 'firm commitment underwriting agreement' or a 'best efforts underwriting' agreement.[107] Securities underwritten on a best efforts or firm commitment basis must be first sold to subscribers and should not be set aside or retained by underwriters. Securities offered to the public with a total face value exceeding RMB 50 million must be distributed by a distribution syndicate comprising a securities company as the chief underwriter and participating security companies.

The follow-on issues are now mainly regulated by the Measures for the Administration of Securities and Offerings by Listed Companies, effective as of 8 May 2006. The follow-on issues offer the listed companies more funding options via private placements and secondary sales to the public. Consequently, the listed companies may increase the size of outstanding shares.

The follow-on issue may be subject to some restrictions. For instance, when a follow-on public offering is made to existing shareholders, the value of the issued shares should not exceed 30 per cent of the issuer's share capital. The issue price of shares in a follow-on issue should not be less than the average of the issuer's shares in the 20 trading days prior to the publication of the prospectus.

The CSRC on 8 May 2006 issued the revised versions of some guidelines on the format and content of application documents and prospectuses for public offerings of shares: ie, Listed Companies Public Offerings Information Disclosure Contents and Formats Guidelines Number 10 and 11; Guidelines for the Contents and Formats for Information Disclosure by Companies That Offer Securities to the Public (Number 10); Application Documents for Public Offers of Securities by Listed Companies; Guidelines for the Contents and Formats for Information Disclosures by Companies That Offer Securities to the Public (Number 11); and Prospectus for Public Offers of Securities by Listed Companies.

As far as the private placement is concerned, a listed company issues shares to a limited number of designated investors.[108] Although no formal offer document is required for a private placement, there is supposed to be a private placement memorandum. The requirements are less stringent than those applicable to public follow-on offerings. For example, no qualification requirements are imposed on designated investors to a private placement except for 'foreign strategic investors'.[109] New shares issued through private placement are subject to a one-year lock-up period. The period will be extended to three years if new shares are subscribed for by a controlling shareholder or a de facto controller.

The issue price of the newly issued shares should not be less than 90 per cent of the average price of the issued shares within the last 20 transaction days before the date of pricing.[110]

Application Documents for IPOs. For the purpose of public share offerings, the issuer must submit application documents and other supporting documents to the CSRC as follows:

- Application for share issue;
- The resolution of the promoter's meeting, or the shareholders' meeting on share issue by public offer;
- The approval documents of establishment of the joint-stock company;
- The business license or the establishment registration of the issuer granted by the Administration of Industry and Commerce;
- The articles of association or the draft articles of association of the joint-stock company;
- The prospectus;
- A feasibility study report on utilization of the funds and documents of approval issued by the relevant government departments concerning investment projects on fixed assets;
- The company's financial report for the last three years or since its establishment, which has been audited by an accounting firm, and the auditing report which has been signed by two registered accountants and sealed with the seal of the accounting firm;
- Legal opinions signed by at least two lawyers and sealed by their law firm;
- An assets appraisal report signed by at least two professional appraisal personnel and sealed by their offices, a capital rating report signed by at least two registered accountants and sealed by their offices, and the confirmation document by the state assets management department if state-assets are involved;

109 The qualification requirements for a strategic foreign investor are imposed in the Measures for the Administration of Strategic Investments in Listed Companies by Foreign Investors. Accordingly, an investor must comply with quantitative requirements (owning at least US $100 million of offshore assets or managing at least US $500 million of offshore assets; obtain an 'in principle' approval from the Ministry of commerce prior to subscribing for new shares issued through the private placement; and satisfy a range of prudential conditions.

- The underwritten plan and the underwriting agreement; and
- Other documents required by the CSRC.[111]

Price-Setting Process

The CSRC has relaxed its control over the price-setting process for new A-share issues.[112] A listing company and its lead underwriter are free to set the issue price, within the scope confirmed by the CSRC, through the book-building method.[113] This changed the previous practice prior to 1999 when private placement in conjunction with a public offering was not allowed. Under the new Circular Number on Further Improving Methods of Issuing Shares, qualifying companies are allowed to conduct A-share issues through a combination of private placement to Chinese legal persons and public offerings to ordinary investors, which has been further confirmed by the 2005 Securities Law.

Although the CSRC attempts to withhold approval for IPOs whose price falls outside permissible limits,[114] the problems of price instabilities and fluctuations still remain as the key method of setting the issue price is through the negotiation between the listing applicant and the securities regulatory authorities. The lack of fairness and transparency for IPO pricing was one of the factors that led to a dramatic decline in the value of the domestic stock exchanges in 2004 and the subsequent one-year suspension of new share issues and sales.

The offering and underwriting of shares, in addition to the Securities Law, is subject to the Measures for the Administration of the Offering and Underwriting of Securities effective as of 19 September 2006. The Measures represent a great effort taken by the CSRC to improve the transparency and fairness in IPO pricing. The Measures leave the pricing to be decided through a two-stage pricing inquiry process via qualified institutions (termed as 'inquiry recipients'), 113 Circular Number on Further Improving Methods of Issuing Shares, issued by the CSRC on 28 July 1999. By way of background, 'book-building' is a process used monthly in America under which the lead investment bank in an IPO or share placement discusses with the clients, issues a prospectus, and goes on a road-show with the transaction. Institutions are asked to make a non-binding bid for stock within a given price range. New discussions will begin after the marketing is completed. In the new round of discussions, clients, institutional investors, and other brokers may agree upon an offer price. Firm undertakings are taken at this stage, and the final price is set ahead of the transaction going forward. The final price, however, may be lower than the previously set one which may give the investors some benefits. For details, see 'A Close Look at US Book Building', South China Morning Post, 28 July 1993.

such as securities investment fund management companies, securities companies, trust and investment companies, finance companies, insurance institutional investors, and foreign institutional investors.[115] The purpose of designing this process is to improve the weaknesses and shortcomings of such mechanisms as fixed pricing and price-earnings-based pricing. The first stage of the pricing inquiry process is the preliminary inquiry which will determine the offer price range.

The second stage is book-building, that is, the determination of the specific offering price. In IPOs involving more than 400 million publicly offered shares, at least 50 inquiry recipients should participate and provide valid quotations. If the IPOs involve fewer than 400 million publicly offered shares, the number of inquiry recipients is at least 20. An inquiry recipient is not allowed to participate in the initial price inquiry or off-line placement if it has not participated in the initial price inquiry or if it did not make a valid quotation notwithstanding its participation in the initial price inquiry.[116] The issuing price is usually determined through negotiations between the underwriter and issuer.[117]

In order to maintain the price stability, the listing rules of Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges extend the lock-up period for general shareholders to 36 months whenever an IPO takes place. As far as the general shareholders (who acquire the shares within 12 months prior to the IPO) are concerned, the lock-up period commences from the date on which the shareholder is registered as a shareholder of the issuer. To the controlling shareholders, the lock-up period begins on the listing date. The signing of the lock-up agreement is one of the conditions to the approval for IPO.

B-Share Issuing Procedure

B-shares were once only available to foreign companies, foreigners, and companies and residents from Hong Kong, Macau, and Taiwan. The primary purpose of issuing B-shares is to attract foreign capital. Chinese citizens living inside China are allowed to invest in B-shares from February 2001. In this sense, there is no longer a difference between A and B-shares. The governing legislation as to the issuance of B-shares is the State Council's Provisions Concerning Listing of Foreign-Invested Shares by Joint-Stock Companies Inside China of 1995 and its Implementing Rules Concerning Listing of Foreign-Invested Shares by Joint-Stock Companies of 1996. The requirements for incorporating a company by public offer of B-shares are:

- The capital to be raised by B-share offers must be used in line with state industrial policies;

115 Measures for the Administration of the Offering and Underwriting of Securities, art 5.

116 Measures for the Administration of the Offering and Underwriting of Securities, art 30.

117 Securities Law 2005, art 34.

- B-share issue must comply with the state regulation on fixed-assets investment;
- At least 35 per cent of the shares to be issued should be subscribed for by the promoter and at least RMB 150 million of total capital must be invested by the issuer;
- The shares to be issued to the public must account for 25 per cent or more of the total capital. The percentage can be lowered to 15 per cent if the share capital is more than RMB 400 million;
- The company has not conducted any illegal acts in the past three consecutive years; and
- The company has made profits in the past three consecutive years.

The procedure of issuing B-shares is as follows:

- The issuer lodges an application to the local government or central government and has recommendation to the CSRC from either the local government or the relevant department of the central government. However, it is not clear when the application should be submitted to the central level.
- If the face value of the proposed shares is less than US $30 million, the issue of B-shares needs to be approved by the CSRC. If the face value is more than US $30 million, the issue application must be lodged with the CSRC and then passed to the State Council by the CSRC for approval.[118]
- The total number of B-shares to be issued should be within the quota.
- The CSRC and other departments under the State Council select and approve companies for B-share issuance.
- The company approved to issue B-shares must submit the prescribed documents to the CSRC for verification. It is not clear why this verification is necessary as the company is first approved and selected by the CSRC anyway.

The approval process requires the company to submit the following documents:

- The application report;
- The name of the issuer, the number of shares subscribed for by the issuer, the types of investment and the capital verification report;
- The resolution of the promoters in favor of B-share issue;
- The approval document of the State Council authorized department or the local government;
- The recommendation by local government or the department in charge of enterprises under the State Council;
- The approval notice of the enterprise named by the State Administration of Industry and Commerce;

118 State Council, Provisions Concerning Listing of Foreign-invested Shares by Joint-Stock Companies Inside China 1995, art 2.

- The draft articles of association;
- The prospectus;
- The report of feasibility of capital use;
- The financial reports of the enterprise in the past three years which are audited by a registered accountant and his accounting firm;
- An asset appraisal report signed by two professional appraisers and their institutions; if state-owned assets are involved, confirmation and approval documents on state-owned equity issued by the State Assets Supervision and Administration Commission (SASAC) must be provided;
- A legal opinion on relevant share issues signed by two or more lawyers and sealed by their firm;
- An underwriting proposal and underwriting agreement on B-share issue; and
- Other documents required by the CSRC.[119]

The approval process outlined above is complicated and time consuming. The heavy involvement of government authorities is clearly seen in this process. The government's participation in this process seems to suggest that the securities market as a whole is still in infancy. Regardless of the discretion the government authority may exercise, the approval process adds transactional costs to the listing activities in China. In a long run, drawing on experience from other jurisdictions, the level of involvement by the state and government authorities should be gradually reduced and let the market play an adjusting role in the market.

Securities Industry

Market Structure

Securities Companies

There are two types of securities companies in China: comprehensive securities companies and brokerage securities companies. A comprehensive securities company is allowed to carry out a range of services, including securities brokerage business, proprietary trading, underwriting of securities, securities investment consulting, and investment management, and its minimum registered capital requirement is RMB 500 million. A brokerage securities company is only allowed to conduct securities brokerage business and its minimum registered capital requirement is RMB 50 million.

The Securities Law makes it clear that securities business should be operated and managed separately from banking, trust, and insurance business. In other words, securities companies should be incorporated independently from banking, trust, and insurance companies. For the time being, foreign investors are not allowed to trade in A-shares, other than via the QFII scheme. Only Chinese nationals or Chinese legal persons may open a customer's trading account with securities companies.

Apart from the prohibition on providing financing and stock lending services to clients, securities companies also are prohibited from managing discretionary accounts under which the securities companies decide the quantities and prices of securities transactions for their clients, and from making any promise as to the losses or gains from securities transactions. Securities companies are only allowed to buy and sell securities on behalf of their clients in accordance with clients' instructions relating to the quantities and prices of shares. In addition, securities companies which are to engage in proprietary trading must separate their proprietary accounts from their brokerage accounts and must enter into securities transactions in their own name. They cannot conduct proprietary securities transactions using other persons' names. The securities companies, whether engaging in proprietary trading or brokerage trading, are prohibited from disposing of the securities which they have acquired on the same date.

The securities companies are required to contribute to a Transaction Risk Fund from their after-tax profit. In addition, the securities companies are required to comply with certain financial indicators, including meeting a prescribed ratio between current liabilities and assets. The CSRC has not yet specified the percentage of contribution and the ratio. Under the QDII regime, the QDII seems to be allowed to manage discretionary accounts on behalf of clients provided that it ensures the quality of transactions including but not limited to seeking the best transactions and proceeding accordingly, endeavouring to minimize transaction costs, and using the holders' trading commissions to procure returns for the holders.

Joint Venture Securities Companies

Foreign securities firms are now permitted to joint venture with Chinese securities companies or to acquire a stake in Chinese securities companies. The qualification requirements on the foreign shareholder are as follows:

- Its securities regulatory body has signed a memorandum of understanding with the CSRC with respect to co-operation in the area of securities regulation and has maintained an effective regulatory co-operative relationship;
- It is a securities firm licensed to conduct securities business in its country of incorporation and has been operating in the financial sector for more than 10 years;
- It has not been subject to any material sanction imposed by a securities regulatory body or judicial department during the past three years;
- The various risk control targets for the past three years have met the legal requirements and the requirements of the securities regulatory body of the country of its incorporation;

- It has a sound internal control system;
- It has a good reputation and good business achievements in the international securities market; and
- Other prudent conditions required by the CSRC.

According to the United States–PRC WTO Protocol, the criteria for the establishment of a securities joint venture may not include an economic needs test or quantitative limits. If there is only one Chinese shareholder in a securities joint venture company, the Chinese shareholder must be a domestically funded securities company. If there is more than one Chinese shareholder in the joint venture, the other Chinese shareholder does not have to be a domestically funded securities company. However, this other party needs to possess the qualifications in respect of a shareholder of a securities company as required by the CSRC. These requirements are set out in the Administration of Securities Houses Procedures, issued by the CSRC with effect from 1 March 2002.

The registered capital of a joint venture securities company must be no less than RMB 500 million. The equity interest held by the foreign party may not exceed one-third of the total registered capital of the joint venture (Article 10 of the Securities Joint Venture Rules, and the Foreign Investment Industrial Guidance Catalogue, promulgated on 11 March 2002 and effective as of 1 April 2002). The scope of business of a securities joint venture firm is limited to:

- Underwriting of shares (including A and B-shares) and bonds (including government and corporate bonds);
- Dealing in foreign investment shares (B-shares) as a broker;
- Dealing in bonds (including government bonds and corporate bonds) as a broker and for its own account; and
- Other businesses approved by the CSRC.

The approval for the establishment of a securities joint venture company involves a two-phase process. The first phase entails the filing of an application with the CSRC by a representative jointly appointed by the shareholders, the review of the application by the CSRC, a decision by the CSRC on whether or not to approve the application, and registration with the SAIC if approval is granted by the CSRC. The second phase involves the filing of an application with the CSRC for the Securities Business Operation Permit. If the CSRC does not issue the Permit, the securities joint venture company may not engage in securities business.

A foreign investor may choose to acquire a stake in an existing Chinese securities company and to apply for the conversion of the domestic securities company into a foreign investment securities company. The limitations on equity ratio, the scope of business, the qualification requirements in respect of the shareholders and the requirement of at least one domestic shareholder holding no less than one-third of the equity interest will continue to apply.

Trust Investment Companies

Under two pieces of PBOC regulations, that is, the Administration of Trust and Investment Companies Procedures (with effect from 5 June 2002) and the Administration of the Business of Holding Funds in Trust of Trust and Investment Companies Tentative Procedures (with effect from 18 July 2002), a trust investment company may launch investment funds or fund management companies, which may underwrite government and corporate bonds and may indirectly engage in the underwriting and trading of stocks. They may offer private placement financing by setting up a collective trust from 200 investors with each investor contributing no less than RMB 50,000. This 200-investor hurdle may be removed by offering more than one trust for the same purpose.

It is worth noting that the CSRC issued a circular in 2001 which permits domestic securities companies to engage in trust investment businesses. However, it is unclear whether the CSRC intends to eventually allow foreign-invested securities companies and foreign-invested fund management companies to offer these services. Under the CSRC's Establishment of Securities Companies with Foreign Equity Participation Rules effective as of 1 January 2008, a securities company offering trust investment services can only manage cash and securities, and can only invest in publicly traded securities and their 'derivatives'.

Securities Registration and Settlement Institution

The establishment of a Securities Registration and Settlement Institution must be approved by the CSRC and it must have a minimum of RMB 200 million self-owned capital. The functions of such institutions are:

- Establish securities accounts and settlement accounts;
- Undertake custody and transfer of securities;
- Register holders of securities;
- Clear and settle securities listed on the securities exchanges; and
- Distribute rights and entitlements in respect of the securities as entrusted by the securities issuers.

These institutions are not allowed to lend or pledge the securities of clients to third parties and are required to maintain original documents in relation to the registration, custody, and settlement of securities for a period of 20 years. A Clearing Risk Fund needs to be established by such institutions for compensating losses and damages arising from technical problems, mistakes in operations, and force majeure events. The Clearing Risk Fund is to be collected from the income of the institutions and levied as a certain percentage of the transaction volume of securities companies, and allocated to a separate account.

Securities Transactions Services Institutions

The Securities Law provides for the establishment of securities investment consultancy institutions and credit rating institutions. The CSRC has not yet set out detailed requirements and procedures for the establishment and operation of these institutions. On the other hand, it is clear that the personnel of securities investment consultancy institutions are prohibited from:

- Investing in securities as agents;
- Making any commitment or undertaking as to the sharing of gains or losses resulting from securities investment; and
- Buying and selling securities of companies to which their employer consultancy institutions have provided services.

Securities Investment Funds

The Securities Investment Funds Law still distinguishes between closed-end and open-ended funds whilst holding open the possibility that funds in other forms may be possible in the future. Closed-end funds are funds that exist for a fixed term and that permit no additional investment beyond a pre-determined amount. In 2001, open-ended funds were launched. Like mutual funds in the United States, an open-ended fund allows new investors to participate in the funds at any time, without limits on the maximum capital or participation time frame of a particular fund. Among the 87 approved funds by 2004, around 54 were closed-end funds, most of which were listed on the PRC stock exchanges.

Both types of funds have a fund manager who organizes establishment of the fund and makes investment decisions within the range in accordance with PRC law and fund contracts. A fund custodian handles fund assets and executes the instructions of the fund management company concerning investments. Fund management companies may appoint the CSRC-approved sales agents to handle subscriptions, redemptions, and record keeping concerning individual investors.

A fund management company must have at least RMB 100 million in registered capital. The principal shareholder must have at least RMB 300 million in registered capital and experience in the financial sector. Fiduciary duties are imposed by Chinese law on fund management companies and custodians.

The function of a fund management company is to manage capital but not to provide it. Funds assets must be invested in accordance with the fund contract, but special allocations are not mandated. Fund investments are confined to listed company stocks and bonds. The funds are not allowed to invest in other funds, which suggests that the fund of funds (FoF) is not allowed in China. The State Council is empowered to alter this prohibition. However, the QDII regime has rendered such prohibition on investment by PRC funds in offshore funds under the Securities Investment Funds Law meaningless.

The CSRC and the CBRC share oversight of fund custodians, which must be commercial banks (Article 25 of the Securities Investment Funds Law). The CSRC plays a more important role in the funds sector. For instance, the CSRC is authorized to investigate and adjudicate violations of the law. In addition, the CSRC has approval authority over the licensing of fund management companies and appointing executives to fund management companies and custodians.

Securities Trade Association

The function of the Securities Trade Association is to assist the CSRC by educating and organizing its members in compliance with securities regulations, reflecting the demands and interests of its members, facilitating exchanges between the members, resolving disputes among members and between members and their clients, researching the development and operations of the securities industry, and disciplining members violating laws and regulations.

Financial Futures Industry

The modern history of financial futures in China dates back to 1993, when the Shanghai Stock Exchange introduced futures contracts in China's treasury bonds. Following a period of aggressive growth and a series of market abuse, the number of futures exchange plummeted from over 40 to just three, the Shanghai Futures Exchange, the Dalian Commodity Exchange, and the Zhengzhou Commodity Exchange, each engaged only in the trading of commodity futures. The CSRC's Measures for the Administration of Futures Companies effective on 5 April 2007 represents an important step forward in regulating China's futures industry.

Although the 'Industrial Guidance Catalogue for Foreign Investment' 2007 has removed 'investment in futures companies' from the 'prohibited' category and placed it under the 'restricted' category, which suggests that with the requirement that any foreign investment in a futures company in China be subject to the majority shareholding of the Chinese party(ies), the Futures Companies Measures do not allow foreign investment in futures companies in China, except for those from Hong Kong and Macau. The Futures Companies Measures explicitly require shareholders of a futures company to be a China-incorporated entity, except for investors from Hong Kong and Macau, who are allowed to have up to a 49 per cent interest in a futures company in China.

According to the Securities Law, only spot securities may be traded and futures trading is not permitted. Securities companies are prohibited from providing financing and stock lending to their customers. Employees of the CSRC, securities exchanges, securities companies, securities registration, and clearing institutions are prohibited from directly holding or dealing in shares, or accepting gifts of shares from other persons. These employees also are prohibited from holding or dealing in shares in the names of other persons. Any trust arrangements by the employees on these aspects are illegal under the Securities Law.

A shareholder of a company limited by shares is required to report to the company if its shareholding amounts to five per cent of the issued shares of the company. Upon receiving the report, the company may notify the CSRC and the relevant securities exchange (if the company is a listed company). If that shareholder purchases or disposes of shares in the company and sells or repurchases these shares within six months thereafter, the profits generated from such sale and purchase belong to the company and the board of the company is responsible for recovering the profit from the shareholder. If the board does not recover the profit from the shareholder and a loss to the company results, the directors may have to compensate the company. This restriction does not apply to securities companies which acquire five per cent or more of the shares in the company as part of an underwriting arrangement for the securities of the company. The approach outlined above was adopted to attack speculative trading of shares but is restrictive and may have the effect of discouraging bona fide transactions.

Disclosure

In General

The primary goal of securities regulations is to achieve transparency of the securities market. The basic economics theory supports the view that better protections can be provided to the investors if all the aspects of the securities market are fully and fairly disclosed. Therefore, one key aspect of the securities regulations is to ensure accurate and full disclosure of relevant information. The investors therefore are able to make informed decisions.

The Chinese laws and regulations conventionally placed more emphases on the requirements for securities issuing and the liabilities for contravention of these rules. The first piece of legislation addressing the issue of disclosure is the Provisional Regulations on the Administration of Share Issue and Trading 1993, which, however, only embodied a few general provisions concerning information disclosure.

Duty of Disclosure

It was not clear who owes the duty of disclosure, either the company or the directors or both, under the Chinese law before the Criminal Law was amended in 1997. For instance, the Company Law 1993 only refers to the duty of disclosure to the company rather than to the directors, officers and supervisors.[120] No authoritative literature can be found to explain why this legislative or regulatory loophole came into play. This loophole was filled in by the Criminal Law (amended in 1999), which, for example, provides that companies making omissions or making false statements in the prospectus, the subscription of shares, or the materials in bonds issuing be fined 1 per cent to five per cent of the illegally raised funds; and that individuals engaged in the same conduct be penalized for imprisonment of no more than five years or detention.[121]

The companies and directors with inside information leaking such information which fundamentally affects the prices of securities and causes serious effects will be subject to detention or imprisonment of no more than five years.[122] In addition, these companies and directors will be fined between one to five times the amount of the illegal gains made through this conduct. In more severe circumstances, they will be sentenced to imprisonment of between five and ten years and will be required to pay a fine between one and five times the amount of the illegal gains from their misconduct. The amended Criminal Law imposes the penalty of imprisonment or detention on the directors if they are involved in the information leakage. The Company Law 2005 further confirms the general principle that both the company and directors are liable for the leakage of sensible information to the market. Compensatory liabilities, for instance, are imposed by the amended Company Law 2005 on the company directors and other senior managers for breaches of laws and rules when the company violates laws and rules.[123]

The CSRC issued the Provisional Enforcement Rules of Information Disclosure by Listed Companies in 1993. This piece of regulations primarily deals with the content and format of information disclosure by a listed company.[124] Among others, it laid down the principle that both the issuing company and the directors of the company must ensure that no false or seriously misleading information or gross omission is in disclosure documents, the failure of which will make both the company and directors jointly liable for violations.[125] These early attempts of the CSRC indicated it pays great attention to information disclosure while it continuously administers and standardizes securities transactions and markets. The information disclosure regime, after almost 20 years' development, is now in a relatively stable shape. By mid-2009, the CSRC in total released 29 pieces of rules dealing with the content and form of information disclosure.

Major Disclosure Laws, Regulations, and Rules

Company Law. The Company Law 1993 was the first piece of national law regulating limited-liability companies and companies limited by shares. As the key purpose of the legislation is to lay down a foundation for the modern enterprise system reform, most provisions in the Company Law 1993 are more about the formation, operation, and termination of companies.

125 CSRC's Provisional Enforcement Rules of Information Disclosure by Listed Companies (1993), art 5.

There were only a few provisions requiring a listing company to satisfy the prospectus requirement. Even with the prospectus provision, no operative criteria for disclosure were outlined.[126]

Securities Law. The Securities Law 1998 was the first national law incorporating clear disclosure rules even though it was passed 10 years after the launch of the stock exchanges in China. The Securities Law was further amended in 2005.

The Securities Law 1998 prohibits fraud, insider trading, and securities manipulation.[127] The issuer is required to publish share issuing documents by public notice and display these documents at public places.[128] The share issuing documents should be true, precise, and complete.[129] The underwriter is under legal obligation to examine the authenticity, precision, and completeness of the issuing documents.[130] Disclosures should be timely and made in a manner prescribed by application laws and regulations.[131]

The continuous disclosure, as a concept, appears first in the Securities Law 1998,[132] which is materialized in the requirement of the issuing company's presenting an annual report,[133] a half-yearly report,[134] and an interim report.[135] However, these requirements may be difficult to be implemented. For instance, an interim report is required when a listed company is in any major event that may materially affect the share price of that company to the CSRC, the relevant stock exchange, and the public.[136] However, the Securities Law 1998 does not define 'major events', which leaves loopholes to the listed companies for compliance. In addition, there is no timeline for timely disclosure.

Criminal Law. Criminal punishment of securities-related offences was introduced into the Criminal Law in its 1997 amendments, which contain some articles that impose criminal liabilities on companies and their employees who are directly involved in various forms of securities fraud.[137]

Accordingly, companies and individuals that have omitted material information or made false statements in the prospectus or the subscription of shares will be heavily fined; individuals who have engaged in the same type of conduct and are directly in charge of company business will be given detention or imprisonment of up to five years.[138]

Those with inside information who leak information and materially affect the prices of securities and cause serious effects will be sentenced to detention or an imprisonment of up to five years. They will be fined between one to five times the amount of the illegal gains made by this conduct. The penalty of imprisonment or detention applies to the individuals who are responsible for a company's affairs, including company directors. The conduct of forging and passing false information affecting securities transactions will be fined between RMB 10,000 to 100,000, and the individuals involved will be given criminal detention or imprisonment of up to five years, and/or a fine between RMB 10,000 to 100,000.

The imprisonment will increase to five to 10 years, and a fine between RMB 20,000 to 200,000 in very severe circumstances.[139] While the imprisonment may be a severe punishment, the amount charged on the liable individuals is actually not large enough to block violations. When criminal offences are committed, detected, and tried, offenders found guilty are subject to punishments by criminal courts.

Provisional Measures on Prohibition of Securities Fraud. The Provisional Measures on Prohibition of Securities Fraud were introduced by the State Council Securities Committed on 2 September 1993 to deal with insider trading, market manipulation, false disclosure of information, and other forms of securities fraud.

Provisional Regulations on Share Issuing and Trading. The State Council promulgated the Provisional Regulations on Share Issuing and Trading on 22 April 1993. It is clarified that the director's duty of information disclosure is one aspect of directors' fiduciary duties to the company.[140]

The regulations identify three types of false statement (ie, false recording, misleading statement, and material omission) but failed to provide detailed definitions of these false statements. Article 77 is the only provision dealing with the issue of civil liability and compensation and states that 'where the provision of this regulation is violated and losses are caused to others, it shall bear liabilities for civil compensation according to law'. Those who commit insider trading are subject to a fine between RMB 50,000 to 500,000 in addition to confiscation of illegal gains.[141] and Listing outside China by Listed Company in August 1994. The purpose of this piece of regulations is to standardize the issuing of H-shares and N-shares. Along with the regulations, there was a set of the Compulsory Provisions in the Articles of Association of Companies Seeking Listing outside China in August 1994.

Accounting Standards — Disclosure. The Ministry of Finance is indirectly involved in the building up of the disclosure regime by setting accounting standards.

It first released the Accounting Standards of Joint-Stock Companies as early as in 1992, adopted the Accounting Standards — Disclosure in 1997, and announced the System of Enterprise Accounting Rules and the System of Enterprise Auditing Rules.

Rules Concerning Disclosure by Listing Companies. The CSRC assumes its day-to-day duty to administer and supervise the development and operation of the securities market in China. The CSRC released several rules governing information disclosure before the Company Law was enacted in 1993. For instance, the first piece of rules was the Implementing Rules on Information Disclosure by Listed Companies (for trial). The minimum required disclosure documents include the prospectus, the listing announcement, the annual and semi-annual reports, as well as the interim report.[142]

The duty to disclose is clearly imposed on the directors who are required not to disclose false or misleading statements or make gross omission in the disclosed documents.[143] The directors and promoters are jointly liable for misconduct or violation. Some detailed requirements appeared for the first time as part of the disclosure rule. For example, in the takeover announcement, personal details and shareholding of directors must be disclosed.[144]

Regulations on the Issue of Foreign Shares by Listed Companies in China. The State Council in December 2005 issued the Regulations on the Issue of Foreign Shares by Listed Companies in China to standardize the issuance of B-shares. Listed companies seeking B-share issuance must disclose information to the public.[145]

However, it is not clear who is liable for violation though it can be argued widely that directors, supervisors, and senior managers may be liable as the duty to disclose may be part of the fiduciary duty owed by the directors, supervisors, and senior managers to the company.

Rules on Content and Format of Information Disclosure by Listed Companies. The CSRC issued in total 24 sets of Rules on Content and Format of Information Disclosure by Listed Companies from 1993 to mid-2009.

The rules cover main issues surrounding information disclosure, including initial public offering prospectus, annual reports, semi-annual reports, reports of changes in shareholding, share listing announcements, and prospectuses of issuing new shares. These rules are the core of the disclosure regime.

Making and Reporting Rules Concerning Disclosure by Listed Companies. The rules were issued by the CSRC in 2000 for the purpose of standardizing disclosure in the implementation of the Content and Format Rules in specific industries, such as real estate property, energy, and finance. These rules are detailed enough to cover specific industries, takeover, and acquisition activities.

Other CSRC Rules, Directives, and Opinions Concerning Disclosure. The CSRC from time to time issued circulars or measures to regulate the disclosure regime. For example, it issued the Circular Number Concerning Engagement of Accounting Institutions by Companies to Issue Shares, which requires the issuing companies to provide profit-making forecasting materials.

The CSRC also released the Questions and Answers Concerning Disclosure Standards by Listed Companies in April 2001. The nature of such documents is directives on particular questions raised by the listed companies. Although these documents are not necessarily legally binding, they are still important in guiding the listed companies in their business conducts. In order to enforce compliance, the CSRC also published its administrative decisions on the cases in breach of disclosure rules in 2001. These decisions increased transparency of law enforcement and interpretation.

Listing Rules and Business Rules of the Stock Exchanges. Listing Rules and Business Rules of both the Shanghai Stock Exchange and Shenzhen Stock Exchange contain disclosure provisions.

The first batch of listing rules of these two local stock exchanges was made by the local governments and was approved by the People's Bank of China. Now the listing rules mirror the disclosure requirements in the Securities Law.

Disclosure in IPOs

In General. There are two ways to set up a joint-stock company: either by means of sponsorship or a share offer.[146] While the former means to incorporate a company by subscription from the sponsors of all the shares to be issued by the company, the latter means to incorporate a company through the sponsor's subscription of a portion of the shares with the rest to be offered to the public by a public offer.[147] As far as an SOE is concerned, the transformation of an SOE to a joint-stock company must be conducted by means of a public offering.[148]

There were three forms of share issuing: a public offer, pre-decided share issuing, and an internal offer. In a public offer, the general public had the equal rights to decide whether to accept the offer, and if so, they get public shares and would be able to transfer these shares freely. In a pre-decided offer, the shares were offered to particular entities or government departments, which get legal entity shares or state-owned shares. These shares were not freely transferrable until late 1999. An internal offer was made to employees at a discounted price. Shares obtained in this way were called internal employee shares.

Issuing shares must meet the information disclosure requirement. For instance, a company issuing B-shares is required to have detailed clauses concerning information disclosure in the articles of association, including the place of disclosure and the means of disclosure.[149] The disclosure must satisfy the requirement of accuracy, truthfulness, and completeness.[150]

Continuous Disclosure. Continuous disclosure is dealt with by the Securities Law 2005.[151] Continuous disclosure also is required by the Code of Corporate Governance in Listed Companies,[152] which requires the listed companies to timely disclosure all the information with a material impact on the decision-making of shareholders and other stock holders in listed companies.[153] Corporate governance also is part of the content of information disclosure.[154] The information must include (i) the directors and supervisors of the company; (ii) the work of the board of directors and the supervisory board and the evaluation on their work; (iii) the work of independent directors and their evaluation; (iv) the structure of the committees of the company and their work; and (v) the plan and measures for improving corporate governance.[155] Companies with shares or bonds listed on Chinese securities exchanges are required to publicly announce and submit a report to the CSRC and the relevant securities exchange in the following circumstances:

- Submission of an interim report containing the following details within two months of the first six months of the financial year of the company: (a) the financial and accounting report and the operations of the company, (b) major litigation involving the company, (c) changes regarding the issued shares and bonds of the company, (d) other important matters submitted for shareholders' approval, and (e) other matters prescribed by the CSRC; and

- Submission of a final report containing the following details within four months after the end of the financial year of the company: (a) the business conditions of the company, (b) the financial and accounting report and operations of the company, (c) details relating to shareholdings in the company of its directors, supervisors, and management personnel, (d) details relating to the issued shares and bonds of the company and the shareholdings of its 10 major shareholders, and (e) other details required by the CSRC.

Submission of an extraordinary report upon the occurrence of material events which may have a significant impact on the price of its shares and which are not yet known to its shareholders should be made on the following occasions:

- Significant changes to the business policy and business scope of the company;
- Decisions on major investment or asset acquisition by the company;
- Entry into contracts which may have a material impact on the assets, debts, rights, and operation results of the company;
- Incurring of material debts by the company and failure to repay material debts on time;
- Incurring of serious losses or losses which exceed 10 per cent of net assets of the company;
- Significant changes to the external business conditions of the company;
- Changes in the chairman of the board, or in over one-third of the directors or management personnel of the company;
- Significant changes to the shareholdings of shareholders which hold more than five per cent of the shares in the company;
- Reduction in registered capital, merger, division, dissolution, and application for bankruptcy of the company;
- Material litigation involving the company and the setting aside of board or shareholders' resolutions of the company by the court;
- Where the company is involved in any crime, which has been filed as a case as well as investigated into by the judicial organ or where any director, supervisor or senior manager of the company is subject to compulsory measures as rendered by the judicial organ; or
- Other matters as prescribed by law or administrative regulations.

The requirement of continuous disclosure is materialized in the requirement of documents, such as the annual report,[156] half-yearly report, quarterly report, and interim report. The annual report must include the report of the chairman of the board of directors or the general manager.[157] The chairperson must in his report address such matters as the achievements, financial statements, investment activities of the company and its subsidiaries or holding companies, a statement of employees, a statement regarding the problem in the operation of the company and the resolutions to these problems, and other related issues.

The annual report also needs to include a report of the board of directors.[158] This report should include information such as the company's shareholding and shareholders (at the beginning and end of each year) and any changes to the shareholding or shareholders; directors (ie, biographical details and remuneration information), supervisors, and senior managerial staff; and lawsuits and arbitration cases the company is involved in.

The requirement to release the semi-annual report first appears in the Company Law 1993 and reappears in the Company Law 2005.[159] The main items included in the semi-annual report are listed in the 1993 Interim Regulations.[160] The CSRC Rule Number 3 on Content and Format of Information Disclosure by Listed Companies, regulating the content of the semi-annual report, was issued in 1994 and was further amended in June 1996 and June 2000.

Listed companies also are required to make disclosures in the interim reports for any event that may affect the trading price of shares. In terms of the timing, the Securities Law 2005 provides that a listed company immediately disclose any major event that may have a material impact on the share price immediately after it takes place.[161]

No definition or interpretation has been provided to the term 'immediately' in this provision, which, in practice, leaves a loophole for a company to delay the disclosure process.

Content of Disclosure. The disclosure regime in China only requires the issuer to disclose such information that may have a material effect on the share price. Such information may include:

- Major contracts entered into by the company which may have substantial effect on the company assets, debts, interest, and/or operation;
- Major changes to the operation policy or projects of the company;
- Major investment or purchase of expansive long-term assets;
- Major debts;
- Breach of contract, ie, failure to pay outstanding debts;
- Major losses;
- Major damage to the assets;
- Major changes to the operational environment;

- Newly released laws, regulations, and rules, which may have a material effect on the business operation;
- Change to the chairman of the board, 30 per cent of the board members, or the general manager;
- Increase or decrease of one class of shares held by a shareholder holding more than five per cent of the shares;
- Major lawsuits involving the company; and
- Liquidation or insolvency of the company.[162]

Other disclosure requirements are scattered in other laws, regulations, and rules. Rule Number 1 requires listed companies to disclose risks, related-party transactions, and the corporate governance structure of the companies.

Related-Party Transactions. Related-party transactions also are termed as affiliated transactions or connected transactions, which refer to transactions between a company and its related companies or persons. A related party refers to a related legal person or a natural person. Related-party transactions are discouraged or prohibited in order to avoid an improper diversion of the company's profits to its affiliates.

In takeovers, disclosure obligations are imposed on defined persons including holders of shares, persons in control of shares, and persons acting in concert.[163] The person who is under the legal obligation to make disclosures should follow the timeline, content, and form of disclosure so as to avoid insider trading during the process of changing the shareholding of the company.[164] A covered person needs to submit a report of shareholding change to the CSRC and the stock exchange. Meanwhile, the covered person should notify the issuer and make a public announcement when submitting the report.[165]

If approval is required from the competent authorities, the related parties should not make a public announcement until three days after such approval had been obtained.[166] A covered person is required to file the report when his shareholding reached the five per cent threshold, or for an existing five per cent holder, when his holding varies by five per cent of the company's total shares. The covered person is prohibited from participating in the share issuing transactions in the fixed periods.[167] Where the covered person's shareholding varied by one per cent by virtue of the transactions on the stock exchange, the public announcement should be made in relation to such a transaction.[168] An acquisition report needs to be submitted to the CSRC if the transaction results in a controlling stake of 30 per cent or more shareholding in the company.[169]

Under the Takeover Procedures 2006, investors taking control of five per cent of a listed company are required to make a public announcement. An investor holding a stake of more than 20 per cent is required to make a detailed disclosure of its financial status.[170] A shareholder who intends to purchase more than five per cent of shareholding must indicate its intention whether he plans to acquire more shares.[171] The disclosure regime is further strengthened under the Takeover Procedures 2006, which requires the disclosure of information, by ultimate owners of multiple listed companies.[172] Financial advisers are subject to a mandatory one-year duty to ensure the accuracy of information disseminated by the company within one year after the transaction.[173]

Remedies

In General. Civil, administrative, or criminal remedies may be available to the investors who suffer losses from any breach of disclosure duties. Under the Securities Law, any violation may result in civil compensation liability.[174] However, the Securities Law is silent on how to apply this general principle. Without legislative guidance, the courts indicate their reluctance to accept and rule on the civil compensation claims.[175] The Supreme Court released a judicial interpretation on 15 January 2002 entitled the Circular Number on Relevant Issues of Filing of Civil Tort Dispute Cases Arising from False statement on the Securities Market.[176] On the same date, the intermediate people's courts designated by the Supreme Court commenced to accept and hear civil compensation cases arising from false statements on China's stock markets. Nevertheless, the Circular Number is not practically useful as it set a prerequisite that the alleged false disclosure be investigated and handled by the CSRC first.

This prerequisite condition raised criticism in general public. The Supreme Court on 9 January 2003 released the Several Provisions on Hearing Civil Compensation Cases Arising From False Statement on the Securities Market ('False Statement Provisions'), which changed the prerequisite of the 2002 Circular Number so that the alleged false disclosure conduct must have been dealt with by the CSRC or have been tried by a criminal court. Together with the Civil Procedure Law and other relevant regulations and rules, intermediate people's courts finally have the guidance necessary to deal with compensation claims arising from securities-related false statements. The Securities Law 2005 reassured the civil compensation principle but left details untouched. The lack of detailed legislative and judicial guidance means civil remedies cannot be used as a tool for the protection of shareholders.

False statement, is defined in the False Statement Provisions as a false recording, misleading statement, material omission, or improper disclosure, all of which are made against the true fact of major events by those who have a duty to disclose information on the securities market.[177] Four types of false statements are covered by the False statement Provisions: (i) a false recording occurs when those who have a duty to disclose information present non-existing facts in disclosure documents; (ii) the misleading information is made by two wrongdoers in disclosure documents or announcement to the media which influences investors to act, resulting in significant detriment to their investments; (iii) a material omission is the failure to disclose, either wholly or partially, required information by one with the duty to have done so; (iv) improper disclosure occurs when one has a duty to disclose information, but fails to do so within an appropriate time frame or in the appropriate manner prescribed by law.[178]

The False Statement Provisions also indicate that false statements are related to material events.[179] The Supreme People's Court's False Statement Provisions filled in the gaps left by the Securities Law, which merely identified the first three types of false statement but failed to provide detailed definitions. Those who make false statements directly or indirectly may be liable to investors in a civil suit. The False Statement Provisions list a wide range of companies, organizations, and individuals, including (i) promoters, controlling shareholders, and the like who exercise actual control; (ii) issuers or listed companies; (iii) securities underwriters; (iv) securities listing sponsors; (v) professional intermediaries, including accounting firms, law firms, and valuation firms; (vi) responsible directors, supervisors, managers, and other senior management personnel of the issuers, listed companies, securities underwriters, or securities listing sponsors; (vii) directly responsible persons of professional intermediaries; and (viii) other organizations or individual persons who make false statements.[180]

This list is broad enough to cover companies or organizations involving foreign parties such as joint ventures, as well as promoters, controlling shareholders, and those who exercise actual control over the company. It is worth noting that this list is not an exhausted list and 'other organizations and individual persons who make false statements' also may be held liable.[181] This open-ended provision leaves more leeway to the courts, and sends a warning signal to those who are involved in the securities activities and participate in the disclosure of information. These individuals and companies may be sued by the investors as individual or joint defendants.[182]

The pre-condition for an investor to bring a claim to a court or for a court's exercise of its jurisdiction over the compensation claim is the existence of an effective administrative penalty decision or a criminal court judgment made against the wrongdoer for their false statements,[183] unless the CSRC or its regional office has already investigated the alleged false statement and imposed an administrative penalty on which investors could rely upon as a factual basis of their actions.[184] This prerequisite is relaxed only if the criminal judgments by the courts and administrative penalty decisions made by the authorities other than the CSRC or its regional offices are made.[185] This restrictive prerequisite, without a legislative or judicial basis, not only deprives the investors of the civil litigation right,[186] but also offers the makers of false statements more opportunities to escape their liabilities by using their social connections or bribery to influence relevant authorities not to take administrative actions.

Although the prerequisite procedure may save judicial resources and help investors collect evidence and reduce their burden of proof, the defect is apparent in that the investors may be unable to obtain remedies if an alleged false statement is not punished by administrative regulator or criminal court. In reality, the court may review a series of issues to determine its jurisdiction. These issues include the statute of limitation period, form of action, possibility of mediating the dispute, and losses suffered by the investor as a result of false statements. [187]

The form of action available to investors is limited to individual action or joint action.[188] The joint action resembles the class action under US law in some respects. Nevertheless, the differences between the two also are obvious in respect of the registration requirement, plaintiff's rights, representative's powers, and binding effect of the court rulings.[189] This suggests that class action is not an acceptable form of action for civil compensation cases arising from securities-related false statements even though the United States-style class action is more economic for this type of litigation.[190]

The Chinese characteristic with the securities-related civil litigation is that parties are encouraged to use mediation in the civil litigation process. [191] Mediation also may help reduce litigation costs and caseload. If mediation is conducted in conjunction with litigation, some civil procedures need to be followed. For instance, mediation must be conducted on a voluntary basis.[192] Mediation can be conducted by the court before trial or at any stage prior to judgement.[193] A mediated agreement comes into effect once it has been duly delivered to and signed by the parties.[194]

This means that any party may change his mind before the mediated agreement is signed and accepted. Even after the signing of the mediated agreement, the parties may still challenge the legal effect by arguing that the mediation violates the principle of voluntariness. As a result, the case may have to be retried.

How to determine the defendant's liability? Different rules apply: some defendants such as promoters, issuers, listed companies, and controlling shareholders or those who have actual control over issuers or listed companies are subject to strict liability while others, including underwriters, sponsors, intermediaries (accounting firms, law firms, and asset valuers), directors,

Investors must establish a causal link between false statements and losses.[196] To establish a causal link, the court must find that (i) the investments are securities directly connected with the false statement; (ii) the purchase date of the securities is between the date on which the false statement is made and the date on which the false statement is exposed or corrected; and (iii) that the investor suffers losses as a result of selling securities on or after the date on which the false statement is exposed or corrected, or as a result of continued ownership of the securities after the false statement is exposed or corrected.[197]

Not all the investors are able to claim losses. Only those investors who purchase securities after a false statement is made but before the false statement is exposed or corrected, and then sell the securities or continue to hold them after the false statement is exposed or corrected, are entitled to claim compensation for the losses they suffered. The investor may not be able to obtain compensation if the defendant is able to prove (i) the plaintiff purchases or sells the securities outside the period prescribed by the rules; or (ii) his loss was caused by other risk factors of the market; or (iii) he had knowledge of the false statement but made an investment anyway; or (iv) he made in the investment in bad faith with the aim of manipulating the market. Investor compensation for losses is limited to the amount of actual loss.[198] The actual loss has three aspects: (i) the difference of their investment; (ii) the commission, charge, and stamp duty in connection with the lost investment; and (iii) the interest lost for their investment as calculated according to the bank deposit rate for the relevant period.[199]

The CSRC has broad administrative powers to enforce securities laws and regulations, and may exercise its powers to supervise the securities market by imposing administrative liabilities on companies and management involved in misconduct or violations:

- Stop order: the CSRC has the power to order the company to stop issuing shares and to refund money to the subscribers of shares.[200] The CSRC may stop underwriters (without licenses) from trading in securities as brokers.[201]

- Confiscation: Profits generated from misconducts or illegal activities may be confiscated by the CSRC.[202]
- Order to correct false or misleading information and misstatements: the listed companies or its directors, officers, or supervisors may be ordered by the CSRC to correct false or misleading information and misstatements.[203]
- Administrative fine: the CSRC may impose administrative fine between RMB 30,000 and 300,000 on company officers, directors, or supervisors who are directly involved in obtaining approval for share issuance via false information.[204] Persons who forge and pass on false information will be fined between RMB 30,000 and 300,000.[205] Lawyers, accountants, or assets valuers giving false information or reports will be fined between RMB 30,000 to 100,000.[206]
- Warnings: the CSRC has power to issue warnings to company officers who are involved in obtaining approval for share issuance by giving false information, or giving false or misleading information or misstatements.[207]
- Disqualification: the CSRC has power to disqualify professional staff of stock exchanges, securities companies, securities registration, and settlement companies if they are involved in the disclosure of false or misleading information and misstatements.[208] The CSRC also may disqualify other professionals such as lawyers, accountants, or assets valuers together with competent authorities, such as the Ministry of Justice, Ministry of Finance or State Administration of State-owned Assets Commission. The CSRC also may disqualify securities companies from securities businesses for their being involved in giving false documents or fraudulent activities.[209]

Although the CSRC may exercise its administration power and impose various administrative liabilities, these will not directly benefit the party who suffers losses from false or misleading information. Even confiscated assets or administrative fines will be regarded as the state's revenue. Given the amount of illegal profits generated from the illegal market activities, the amount of administrative fine may be no longer effective as a regulatory tool.

The last resort available to the CSRC may be criminal remedies available under the amended Criminal Law, including criminal fines,[210] detention[211] and imprisonment,[212] which may be imposed separately or jointly. The range of criminal fines is one per cent to five per cent of false registered capital if a company manages to be registered with false documents.[213] The range of criminal fines is from two per cent to 10 per cent of the falsified registered capital if the company manages to be registered with false documents.[214] One per cent to five per cent of the illegally raised capital is subject to the criminal fine if the prospectus or other company documents contain any false information.[215] The directly responsible officers of the company will be fined RMB 20,000 to 200,000.[216] The amount of criminal fine is not large enough to discourage any violation. The term of imprisonment for misconduct or violation of securities regulations and laws is not long either, with the maximum term of five years.[217]

Inspection of Listed Companies. The CSRC is granted the power to inspect companies listed on the Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges but not overseas companies or companies whose stocks are traded on other stock exchanges. Chinese law authorizes the CSRC to assign this power to a body conducting inspections and employing registered and qualified accountants and lawyers when necessary to complete the task.

There are two types of inspections, routine and special. Routine inspections are conducted to assess the veracity of information, the integrity of management structures, the integrity of accounting procedures, company autonomy, and the conformity of actual capital expenditure to that proposed in the company prospectus. By contrast, special inspections are conducted to verify whether a problem exists within a company, and deal primarily with matters related to capital usage, stockholder complaints, and material asset restructuring.

The inspection is conducted on the basis of documents such as accounting reports, minutes of stockholder meetings and company staff, and explanations of company structures. The company will be informed by the inspecting body of any problems discovered, and a copy of the notification will be sent to the stock exchanges on which the company is listed. The company can appeal within 10 days of the notification to the CSRC. In any event, the company shall report any measures it has taken to the inspecting body within a month of receiving the notification. The CSRC has the right to publish a public or non-public criticism according to the gravity of the alleged breach. Companies under investigation are prohibited from co-ordinating with the accounting firm conducting an audit. Failure of an inspection to reveal illegal acts committed by company officers does not absolve the respective individuals of legal liability for those acts.

Gatekeepers. The ministries and commissions of the central government jointly or separately enact and implement laws, regulations, and rules to punish and prevent misleading, deceptive, and fraudulent conduct in the process of listing. Due to the lack of coordination and co-operation, the rules governing the gatekeepers and their market conducts are in conflict, which furthers inefficiency and malpractice in the securities market.

Acquisition of Listed Company

In General

Legal Framework

The legal framework prior to 2002 provided for forms and procedures for the acquisition of state-owned assets or stocks, and attached great importance to valuation of state-owned assets. The new regime lifted the ban on foreign investor involvement in the acquisition of state-owned stock. Acquisitions of listed companies in China are now subject to an array of regulations governing various issues relating to the acquisitions of domestic enterprises by foreign investors, such as application documents, approval procedures and timeframes, valuation of stock or assets to be acquired, capital increase of the target after merger and acquisition, and an antitrust regime. The main regulations are the Administrative Regulations on Acquisitions of Listed Companies and the Administrative Regulations on Information Disclosure for Shareholding Changes of Listed Companies, both effective on 1 December 2002 and both milestones in the development of the Chinese securities market, providing the first comprehensive regulation of the acquisition of listed companies in China.

These regulations were further superseded by the 2006 Amendment of the Measures for the Administration of the Acquisition of the Listed Companies in July 2006, the major objective of which is to increase disclosure and transparency (the promulgation of the Acquisition Regulation and the Disclosure Regulations has helped establish a relatively comprehensive system of information disclosure requirements), which is in line with the legal environment for mergers and acquisitions in post-WTO accession of China.

So long as the general corporate laws on foreign investment and applicable securities regulations are satisfied, foreign investors are allowed to acquire equity interests in Chinese companies, either domestic or foreign-invested according to the Provisions on Acquisition of Domestic Enterprises by Foreign Investors effective as of 8 September 2006. Acquisition of equity interests in FIEs must follow the regulations and rules governing FIE equity change, except that listed shares of FIEs are regulated in the same manner as other listed companies. Under the current legal framework, the acquirer can purchase a listed company by agreement, offer, or centralized competitive pricing at the securities exchanges, subject to relevant disclosure requirements.

Acquisition by Agreement

A purchaser may acquire a listed company from its shareholders by agreement for shareholding of up to 30 per cent. Once an acquisition agreement is made, the purchaser must file a listed company acquisition prospectus with the CSRC and the relevant securities exchanges within three days and make a public announcement.

The target also needs to publicize the opinion of the board, independent directors, and third-party advisers confirming that the acquisition is in the best interests of the company. The acquisition agreement may not be implemented before the public announcement. Parties to an acquisition agreement may appoint a securities registration and settlement institution to retain custody of the shares to be transferred under the agreement and deposit the required funds in a designated bank.

Acquisition by Offer

Once a shareholder holds 30 per cent of the issued shares of a listed company and intends to continue acquiring shares in the company, it can make an offer to all the other shareholders of the company. In this situation the proportion of the shares proposed for such acquisition may be no less than five per cent of the shares issued by the company.

A shareholder making an offer is required to submit an acquisition offer report to the CSRC and the relevant stock exchange. The report must contain particulars relating to the purpose, duration, price, number of shares, and total sum involved in the acquisition. The shareholder must then publicly announce the acquisition offer within 15 days of submission of the report.

The offer period may not be shorter than 30 days or longer than 60 days. During the offer period, the shareholder may not withdraw its offer or acquire shares in the company by any other method or on terms different from those of the offer. Any amendments to the offer require approval from the CSRC and the relevant securities exchange.

The shares of the listed company must be terminated from the stock exchange if the distribution of the equities amongst the shareholders fails to meet the listing condition after the expiration of the term of the takeover. However, before the completion of the takeover, holders of the remaining shares shall be entitled to require the shareholder to purchase their shares on the same terms as the offer, and the purchaser shall purchase such shares.

Acquisition of Shares through the Stock Exchange

For securities transactions made through the stock exchange, an acquirer may notify the CSRC, the relevant securities exchange, and the relevant company and make a public announcement within three days after its shareholders in a listed company reaches five per cent. The acquirer may not take any further action such as any dealings of the shares within the three-day period.

The reporting and announcement requirements apply in the relevant that the shareholder increases or decreases its shareholding in the company by five per cent. The acquirer may not have any further dealing in the shares in the listed company during the three-day reporting period nor the two-day period after the notification and public announcement. Currently, foreign acquirers are subject to restrictions on direct acquisition of shares through the Chinese stock exchanges.

Qualified Foreign Institutional Investor

The joint promulgation of the Administration of Securities Investments in China by Qualified Foreign Institutional Investors Tentative Procedures (the 'QFII Tentative Procedures') by the CSRC and PBOC on 5 November 2002 marked a substantial step in opening the securities markets to foreign investors and represented the dropping of yet another barrier to the full integration of the PRC securities market with international securities markets.

In order to implement the QFII regime, the Shanghai Stock Exchange and Shenzhen Stock Exchange issued the Shanghai Stock Exchange Qualifying Foreign Institutional Investors Investing in Domestic Securities Markets Securities Trading Implementing Regulations and the Shenzhen Stock Exchange Qualifying Foreign Institutional Investors Investing in Domestic Securities Markets Securities Trading Implementing Regulations, respectively (collectively, the 'QFII Implementing Regulations' promulgated on and effective from 1 December 2002). These regulations provide new investment choices, structures, and opportunities for foreign investors in China.

On 24 August 2006, the CSRC, PBOC, and SAFE jointly issued the new Measures for the Administration of Securities Investments in China by Qualified Foreign Institutional Investors, effective from 1 September 2006 (the 'New QFII Rules') to supersede the original QFII rules that have been in place since 2002 and to govern the QFII regime. The CSRC also issued a notice relating to the implementation of the New QFII Rules (the 'Implementing Notice') that took effect from the same date.

The QFII Tentative Procedures open the A-share and domestic bond markets to foreign investment for the first time as long as the investors meet the relevant criteria as QFII. QFIIs can invest within their approved investment limits in any of the following RMB-denominated financial instruments:

- Shares listed on the domestic stock exchanges (except for foreign investment, or B-shares, listed on a domestic exchange);
- Treasury bonds listed on the domestic stock exchange;
- Convertible bonds and corporate bonds listed on the domestic stock exchange; and
- Any other financial instruments approved by the CSRC.

The Implementing Regulations stipulate that QFIIs cannot participate in treasury bonds repurchase and corporate bonds trading because of 'technical reasons', which is unfortunate for prospective QFIIs as, given very high P/E ratios on which most A-shares are currently trading, treasury and corporate bonds markets were viewed as one of the more attractive parts of the QFII regime.

There is no substantial change in the permitted investments under the New QFII Rules except that it is now expressly stated that investments may be made in securities investment funds and warrants. The New QFII Rules also stress that the applications from qualifying institutional investors that are pension funds, insurance funds, mutual funds, charitable funds, and other long-term asset management institutions will be given priority with a view to encouraging mid- to long-term investments in China.

According to the QFII Tentative Procedures, a QFII must be a fund management institution, an insurance company, a securities company, or another type of asset management institution. The CSRC and PBOC require the securities houses and insurance companies to have been operating for 30 years or more, while there is no track record requirement for commercial banks. The QFII applicant must satisfy various criteria:

- An applicant must be financially stable, enjoy good credit, satisfy the asset size test and other CSRC requirements, such as a certain amount of paid-up capital and a certain level of assets under management;
- An applicant's risk control and monitoring standards must meet the legal requirement and the relevant securities markets regulators' requirements in its country or region of establishment;
- An applicant's professional staff who engage in the business must hold the relevant professional qualifications in the relevant country or region. The applicant must have a sound corporate governance structure and a comprehensive set of internal controls, its operations must be carried out in accordance with applicable law, and in the last three years it may not have been subject to any material sanctions by any regulator in the relevant country or region where it is established; and
- There must be a comprehensive legal and supervisory system in place in the applicant's country or region of establishment, its securities supervision and management institutions must have entered into a memorandum of understanding on co-operation in matters of supervision and management with the CSRC, and it must have maintained an effective regulatory co-operation relationship with the CSRC.

Under the New QFII Rules, the qualifying criterion in terms of assets-under-management (AUM) for QFII applicants that are fund management institutions, has been reduced from US $10 billion to US $5 billion in the most recent financial years, although the requirement to have operated fund management business for more than five years remains. This will enable more fund management companies to apply on their own for QFII approval and QFII quota instead of relying on third-party QFII quotas for their China-focused funds or investing indirectly through structured products.

Furthermore, the qualifying criterion for insurance companies is changed from at least US $10 billion in AUM to at least US $5 billion in securities assets held in the most recent financial year. There is no change to the qualifying criteria for securities companies and commercial banks. In the Implementing Notice, other financial investors such as pension funds, charitable funds, donation funds, trust companies, and government investment companies are subject to the qualifying criterion of having been established for at least five years and having AUM or having a securities portfolio with at least US $5 billion in the most recent financial year.

An applicant must, through the custodian, first submit a standard application form and a specified list of documents to the CSRC and SAFE, respectively, in order to gain approval as a QFII. The CSRC will examine the application materials, seek the opinion of SAFE, and render its decision on whether or not to grant its approval within 20 working days from the date of receipt of the complete set of application documents. If the CSRC decides to grant approval, it will issue a securities investment business permit. Within one year from the date of receipt of the securities investment business permit, the applicant shall apply through the custodian to SAFE for an investment quota. SAFE will examine the application materials, seek the opinion of the CSRC, and render its decision on whether or not to grant its approval within 20 days from the date of receipt of the complete set of application documents.

If SAFE decides to grant approval, it will render a written official reply and issue a foreign exchange registration certificate. Under the SAFE's Administration of Foreign Exchange for Securities Investments in the PRC by QFIIs Tentative Provisions of 2002, QFII applicants are required to apply for an investment limit not lower than US $50 million and not exceeding US $800 million. Until SAFE issues a corresponding set of rules detailing the foreign exchange requirements to accompany the issuance of the New QFII Rules, the previous set of SAFE rules still apply.

According to the QFII Tentative Procedures, once the QFII has obtained the SAFE approval for its investment limit, it can open a special purpose RMB account with its custodian. The account is used to hold the conversion proceeds in RMB of the original foreign exchange funds paid in by the QFII and is used to fund purchases and other related costs as well as holding proceeds of disposals. QFIIs are required to remit the full amount of principal in the foreign currency approved by SAFE into the PRC for conversion into RMB, and transfer into the RMB special purpose account within three months of the issue of a QFII Permit.

The QFII must also instruct its custodian to open on its behalf a securities account with the securities registration and settlement (ie, clearing) institution (the CSDCCL) and a renminbi settlement account with the CSDCCL for settlements with that institution. The limitation to opening a single account is potentially problematic because QFIIs mainly act as fund managers and broker dealers managing other people's assets when they invest and the concern is that if the QFII defaults, in the absence of sub-accounts separating proprietary and client assets, the client assets in China may be frozen. This one sub-account rule did not comply with domestic and foreign regulatory requirements and the structural need of QFIIs which are fund management companies in setting up several public funds was not satisfied. Under the New QFII Rules, each QFII is allowed to hold multiple securities sub-accounts with a PRC clearing house that correspond to respective multiple renminbi special accounts.

In reality, this is not yet materialized pending SAFE's change in position to allow multiple renminbi special accounts. The securities sub-accounts may be opened as direct accounts or nominee accounts (which are opened for customers to whom the QFII provides asset management service). Where the QFII establishes a securities account for public funds, insurance funds, charitable funds, donation funds, government investment funds, or other long-term investment funds under its management, the account may be opened in the direct name of 'QFII plus fund' and assets in such account belong to the QFII and the custodian. The New QFII Rules require a QFII to file reports to the CSRC and stock exchange within eight working days after the end of each quarter on the underlying investors (such as the name and place of registration) for whom it maintains the nominee accounts and on the investment activities of such investors through such accounts (ie, asset allocation mix and details of the securities investments of the actual investor or fund that it represents).

The New QFII Rules also recognize the interests of underlying investors investing through QFIIs in providing that QFIIs may appoint the actual beneficial investors to exercise shareholder rights with respect to underlying investments, and that as nominee for beneficial investors, a QFII may use its votes in part and may cast its votes in different ways according to the interests of the underlying beneficial investors.

Under the QFII Tentative Procedures, there were lock-in periods for the funds remitted into the PRC by the QFII and held in the renminbi special purpose account. In the case of a closed-end China fund management institution, the QFII can only apply to SAFE for the purchase of foreign exchange to remit to the offshore QFII three years after remitting the principal. For other types of QFIIs, the restriction is one year after remittance of the principal. After the expiration of the lock-ups, each outward remittance cannot exceed 20 per cent of the total principal and each must be made at one-month (for a closed-end China fund QFII) and three-month intervals (for all QFIIs), respectively. A QFII that has remitted its investment principal into the PRC for another three months but less than one year can assign its investment amount to another QFII or another qualifying applicant, subject to the CSRC and SAFE approval.

The New QFII Rules do not set out the specific requirements with respect to remittance and repatriation, but instead provide that remittance, repatriation, and any lock-up period should be adjusted by SAFE based on the economic and financial situation of the PRC, foreign exchange balance of payments, and according to arrangements set by the PBOC. This means that the previous rules on lock-up periods and repatriation limits in the original QFII rules issued by the CSRC and SAFE are abolished. Hence, at present, there are no rules that impose those lock-up periods and repatriation limits.

Previously, the QFII Tentative Procedures imposed restrictions on the size, in terms of the percentage and monetary terms, of investments made by QFIIs. The monetary limits are set out in the SAFE's Administration of Foreign Exchange for Securities Investments in the PRC by QFIIs Tentative Provisions, issued on 28 November 2002 and effective 1 December 2002, which provide that the minimum investment limit that has to be applied for by a QFII is US $50 million, while the maximum is US $800 million. It is further clarified that the percentage of shares held by a single QFII in a single-listed company cannot exceed 10 per cent of the total A shares in that company and similarly the aggregate percentage of shares held by all QFIIs in a single-listed company may not exceed 20 per cent of the total A-shares in that company. However, these percentages are subject to 'adjustment' by the CSRC. The QFII Tentative Procedures also required that QFIIs disclose their interests in listed companies in accordance with relevant rules and, in this context, to take into account domestic (A-shares or B-shares) and overseas shares (H-shares) of the same company, as well as interests in convertible bonds and depository certificates. The foregoing restrictions are revised as follows under the New QFII Rules:

- Each underlying offshore investor investing through QFII may not hold more than 10 per cent of the total outstanding shares in one listed company (but excluding strategic investment by such offshore investor in accordance with the Regulations on Strategic Investment in Listed Companies by Offshore Investors); and
- All offshore investors may not hold more than 20 per cent of the total outstanding shares in one listed company.

The restriction in the first paragraph, above, looks at the interest of the underlying offshore investor instead of the QFII itself. This would apply to investments held through one QFII or all QFIIs through which the relevant investor invests in the spirit of disclosure of interests in listed companies under relevant rules.

Under the New QFII Rules, a QFII shall appoint a domestic commercial bank to act as the custodian of its assets and appoint a domestic securities company to handle its domestic securities trading activities. Rules about custodian banks' role in the QFII scheme can be found in many regulations, including the Securities Transactions by QFII Implementing Rules (issued on 1 December 2002); and the Registration and Settlement for Securities Investments in China by QFII Implementing Rules (the Settlement Regulations issued on 1 December 2002).

According to the New QFII Rules, a commercial bank in China can apply to the CSRC and the SAFE for permission to undertake a custodian business for domestic securities investments by qualified foreign institutional investors. The New QFII Rules make it clear that those China branches of foreign-invested commercial banks that have continuously operated in China for not less than three years may apply to become custodians. A custodian must meet the following conditions:

- Have a dedicated asset custody department;
- Have paid-up capital of not less than RMB 8 billion;
- Have an adequate number of full-time personnel familiar with custody business;
- Be able to keep safe custody of the assets of the QFII;
- Have the ability to carry out secure, highly efficient clearing and settlement;
- Be qualified as a designated foreign exchange bank and qualified to operate renminbi business; and
- Have no record of any major violation of exchange control regulations during the most recent three years.

A custodian must perform the following duties:

- Keep safe all of the assets placed in its custody by the QFII;
- Handle the relevant foreign exchange settlement, sale, receipt, and payment business and renminbi fund settlement business of the QFII;
- Supervise the QFII's investment operations and report to the CSRC and SAFE if the QFII's investment instructions violate laws or regulations in a timely manner;
- Within two working days of remittance of principal into China or remittance of principal or earnings out of China by the QFII, inform SAFE of the particulars of the funds so remitted and the settlement or sale of foreign exchange by the QFII;
- Within eight working days after the end of each month, report to SAFE the details of payments made into and out of, as well as the asset allocation of, the QFII's foreign exchange accounts and special renminbi accounts, and to report to the CSRC the details of the investments and transactions of the securities accounts;
- Within three months after the conclusion of each fiscal year, to prepare an annual financial report on the particulars of the QFII's securities investment activities in China during the previous year and to submit the same to the CSRC and SAFE;
- Keep, for a period of not less than 20 years, relevant information such as records of remittances into and out of China, the conversion of funds, the receipt and payment of foreign exchange, and the receipt and payment of funds by the QFII;

- Submit balance of payments statistics in accordance with state foreign exchange control provisions; and
- Perform other duties specified by the CSRC and SAFE in accordance with the principle of prudential regulations.

A custodian is required by the New QFII Rules to keep its own assets and those it manages as custodian strictly apart, and keep separate accounts for those assets it manages as custodian.

Pilot Reform Scheme

The Company Law adopts the principle of equal treatment of shareholders. Theoretically, all shares of common stock of a Chinese corporation enjoy the same rights and privileges. Nevertheless, the share capital of listed companies is segmented depending upon who owns or can lawfully own the shares. For instance, legal person shares are listed and eligible for trading on domestic or overseas stock exchanges, such as A-shares (which are listed on the Shanghai Stock Exchange or Shenzhen Stock Exchange and the trading of which is denominated in renminbi and is restricted to Chinese investors and QFIIs), B-shares (which are listed on either the Shanghai or Shenzhen Stock Exchange but the trading of which is denominated in United States or Hong Kong dollars and is open to both foreign and domestic investors), and H-shares, N-shares, and S-shares. Non-tradable shares are those shares which cannot be traded on stock exchanges and can only be transferred pursuant to private transactions and government approval. Non-tradable shares include state-owned shares held by public authorities or state-owned asset management companies or by SOEs, and legal person shares held by legal persons other than SOEs.

Non-tradable shares once represented around two-thirds of the shares of publicly traded companies and are concentrated in the hands of public authorities. The separate categories of shares, ie, A-shares, B-shares, non-tradable legal person shares, and so on are at the root of the inherent weakness of the markets. They create and maintain artificial disparities in pricing between what should be identical securities and limit the ability of the market to optimize the allocation of capital among business enterprises. In addition, the non-fungibility between different categories of shares translates into price differentials that cannot be justified in the long term. Non-tradable shares are privately sold at big discounts from stock exchange prices.

The PRC government resolved to deal with the segmentation of shareholding structures by implementing the ‘separation of equity ownership and trading rights’. On 29 April 2005, the CSRC issued the Circular Number Concerning

Issues Related to Pilot Reform of Separation of Equity Ownership and Trading Rights of Listed Companies' (the '2005 Circular Number').[218]

The main purpose of such reform is to reduce the public section ownership of listed businesses and restore confidence in the domestic capital markets. The 2005 Circular Number sets the framework to allow a core of pilot companies to covert their non-tradable shares into tradable shares, and further sets out procedural requirements by which the 46 named pilot companies can make their non-tradable shares tradable while protecting the interests of public shareholders and ensuring a gradual release of shares into the market. Each pilot company is required to hold an extraordinary shareholders' meeting to vote on the proposed conversion plan. The plan must be approved by at least two-thirds of the voting rights held by all shareholders attending the meeting, in person or by proxy, and two-thirds of the voting rights held by tradable shareholders attending the meeting, in person or by proxy.

The 2005 Circular Number requires holders of non-tradable shares to agree to lockup restrictions on sales of shares that have been converted pursuant to the trial program. No converted shares can be sold or transferred within 12 months of the conversion date of the shares. A non-tradable shareholder holding five per cent or more of the total outstanding shares will be subject to volume limitations on public sales of shares after the expiration of the lock-up period: no more than five per cent of the company's total outstanding shares can be sold within 12 months, and no more than 10 per cent within 24 months. The lock-up rules are designed to protect the market against an influx of recently converted shares and prevent undue pressure on the pricing of listed stock.

The pilot companies usually need to present a conversion plan offering compensation to existing tradable shareholders to cushion losses they might suffer from a decline in stock prices resulting from dilution. Compensation typically includes a combination of shares, warrants, or put options and sometimes cash. The non-tradable shareholders of the companies are to give up a portion of their equity or make another transfer of value to the tradable shareholders, free of consideration. This requires most companies to transfer shares. Other companies adopt an indirect route. For example, a percentage of the non-tradable shares are to be cancelled so the post-conversion holdings of non-tradable shareholders are not artificially revalued.

Alternatively, a company can increase its share capital through the conversion of a portion of its capital reserve. The non-tradable shareholders surrender the new shares issued pursuant to the capital increase to the tradable shareholders. In addition, tradable shareholders can receive a put option to sell back shares at a protected price to the current controlling shareholder, a government agency. The controlling non-tradable shareholders of a company agree to be bound by more stringent lock-up restrictions than those required by the CSRC circular. Many controlling shareholders agreed not to, during a specified period, sell the converted shares at a price that is lower than a specified minimum price. The controlling shareholders and holders of non-tradable shares in the trail stage are primarily public sector entities.

218 The term 'ownership segregation' or 'equity separation' refers to the phenomenon that state shares and legal person shares are not allowed to be freely traded in the Chinese secondary stock market, hence segregated from publicly tradable shares, such as individual shares and foreign capital shares.

Ancillary circulars issued by the CSRC regarding the pilot reform scheme facilitate stock redemption programs in support of public securities prices. These circulars also waive the mandatory tender offer rules in connection with share purchases by a controlling shareholder aiming at stabilizing stock prices in furtherance of a conversion plan. The State Council and the State Administration of State-owned Assets Supervision issued the Reform Regarding the Split Share Structure of State-controlled Listed Companies Guiding Opinions on 17 June 2005, which laid down the criteria for setting the minimum shareholdings of the state among state-controlled listed companies after the split share structure reform. The shareholding structure of the listed company should be determined by the relative importance of the sectors that include listed companies and by the objectives of the state by holding shares in the companies.[219] The state's shareholding should be further adjusted in an orderly and standardized manner.[220]

The implementing rules of the 2005 Circular Number are the Administrative Measures for the Split Share Structure Reform of Listed Companies, issued and effective as of 4 September 2005, which provide the principles, operation sequence, requirements for reform plans, the selling of converted shares, information disclosure, functions of intermediaries, and regulatory measures. The Administrative Measures marked a fundamental step forward in the integration of China's domestic stock markets. In December 2005, the MOFCOM, the CSRC, State Taxation Bureau, SAIC, and SAFE issued the Administrative Measures for the Strategic Investment in Listed Companies by Foreign Investors. The new listing rules issued by the CSRC in 2006 also facilitated the split share reform. After the implementation of these new rules and regulations, the institutional shortcomings and weaknesses of China's stock exchanges may be removed and the market unification and fluidity may be further improved.

One year after the promulgation of the 2005 Circular Number, the resumption of listing activities in the A share market brought out a new round of expansion. It was reported that the market capitalization of the Chinese stock market increased by 94 per cent by the end of 2005, and[221] 1,396 companies were listed on the Shanghai and Shenzhen Stock Exchanges in November 2006 with a total market value and float market value of RMB 5.228 trillion and RMB 1.799 trillion, respectively.[222]

Strategic Investment by Foreign Investors in Listed Companies

The Ministry of Commerce, the CSRC, SAIC, SAFE, and the State Administration of Taxation issued the Measures for the Administration of Strategic Investment in Listed Companies by Foreign Investors ('Circular Number 28') on 31 December 2005 effective 30 January 2006. The Measures, together with the Matters relevant to the Administration of Foreign Capital involved in the Reform of the Division of Equity Interests of Listed Companies Circular, jointly issued by MOFCOM and the CSRC effective 26 October 2005, introduced the concept of 'foreign strategic investors'. Such investors are allowed to acquire tradable A-shares of China-listed companies that have reformed their share capital structure under the Administration of Listed Companies Stock Right Allocation Reform Method, issued by the CSRC on 4 September 2005.

Before Circular Number 28, merely a limited number of foreign financial institutions holding a qualified foreign institutional investor status could legally purchase tradable A-shares of PRC-listed companies. Foreign investors without a QFII status could only acquire a stake in listed companies by privately purchasing non-tradable state holdings. Circular Number 28 targets a totally different type of equity investment and subjects strategic foreign investments to much lower entry requirements and to fewer investment restrictions than QFIIs.

For example, unlike QFIIs, which are not allowed to hold more than 10 per cent of the issued share capital of a listed company, Circular Number 28 requires a foreign strategic investor to acquire a minimum of 10 per cent of all the shares of the target listed company,[223] which technically allows strategic foreign investors to control a listed company.

Circular Number 28 sets out the thresholds in terms of capital scale, managerial experience, and operational history for foreign investors to meet in such investment with the aim of introducing advanced managerial skills and technology into China as well as improving corporate governance of Chinese listed companies.[224] However, Circular Number 28 imposes the following restrictions:

- The foreign strategic investment is still subject to the Foreign Investment Industrial Guidance Catalogue as well as the ceiling percentages set out in any industry-specific regulations.[225]
- The foreign strategic investment can only be made in the few listed companies that have fully implemented the Pilot Reform Scheme.
- The shares acquired by a foreign strategic investor, whether by private share transfer or private placement, are subject to a three-year lockup period unless specifically approved by the MOFCOM.[226] After the three-year lockup period, the listed company must obtain MOFCOM approval regarding the change of its share capital structure if the foreign strategic investor wants to exit.

Instead of imposing onerous qualification requirements on strategic investors, Circular Number 28 introduces very investor-friendly qualification requirements. The foreign investor (or its holding company) must own offshore assets of at least US $100 million or manage offshore assets of at least US $500 million. Circular Number 28 expressly allows a foreign investor to make a strategic investment in a PRC-listed company through a 'wholly owned subsidiary located outside China', even where the subsidiary would not itself company with the qualification requirements. However, the parent company must commit itself to take joint and several liability with its wholly owned offshore subsidiary. Under Circular Number 28, a strategic investor can perform the following to make a strategic investment:

- A private share transfer agreement between existing shareholders and the foreign investor;
- A private placement by the listed company to the foreign investor; or
- Any other method as allowed by PRC law.

Circular Number 28 is not clear about the nature of the 'other methods'. The PRC Securities Law uses a similar expression and refers to a general takeover offer as 'a method allowed by PRC law'. However, the foreign strategic investors are not likely to purchase a significant stake directly in the secondary market, at least in the short term. In any event, foreign strategic investors will not obtain controlling stakes in PRC-listed companies before 2008 by private share transfer. The shares which are open to foreign strategic investors are shares under the Pilot Reform Scheme which started in April 2005.

Such shares are subject to a full-year lockup period. In the 12 months following the end of this lockup period, holders of such shares will only be allowed to trade up to five per cent of the company's total shareholding, and up to 10 per cent in the following 24 months. Only after these three years are the shareholders allowed to transfer significant controlling stakes to foreign investors. A feasible means to achieve this may be through private placements where listed company privately issues new shares to a designated investor. The private placement must comply with various conditions imposed in the Company Law, Securities Law, and other regulations.

Under Circular Number 28, only an acquisition by share transfer which results in the foreign investor becoming a controlling shareholder of the listed company will be subject to the general offer requirement. By contrast, if an acquisition by private placement results in the foreign investor becoming a controlling shareholder of the listed company, the acquisition is subject to a general offer requirement under the PRC Securities Law. In such case, the strategic investor can apply to the CSRC for a waiver of the general offer obligation under the Measures for Administration of the Takeover of Listed Companies 2002.

Circular Number 28, the Securities Law, and the Takeover Measures adopt different trigger events for a general offer. Circular Number 28 refers to 'effective control' as the trigger of the general offer requirement while the Securities Law and the Takeover Measures refer to a 30 per cent shareholding. As a result, even if the 30 per cent threshold is not reached, a foreign strategic investor may still have to satisfy the requirement to make a general offer if it has an 'effective control' in the listed company.

The greatest concern arising out of Circular Number 28 is the lack of flexibility regarding the method of payment for the acquisition. According to Circular Number 28, the payment of the acquisition price must be made in foreign currency and no other payment method is mentioned. Even though Circular Number 28 allows the foreign acquirers to make payment in instalments, the transaction is required to be completed within 180 days of receiving the MOFCOM approval. Circular Number 28 does not appear to be flexible with the foreign acquirer's paying with its own shares.

Takeovers

Takeover Transactions

Under the takeover rules and Securities Law, there are five ways to conduct a takeover of a PRC-listed company: takeover by a tender offer; takeover through a share purchase; takeover through private placement by the target company; indirect takeover; and takeover through trading on the stock exchange.

These five transactional means can be used alone or in combination. Under Chinese law, private placement or share purchase can be conducted through the strategic investment regime, while trading on the stock exchange is carried out via a qualified foreign institutional investor.

Takeover by Offer

Through takeover by offer, an investor can publicly request listed shares off the stock exchange. However, the purchaser should acquire at least five per cent of all the outstanding shares of the target company in order to proceed with the transaction as a takeover by offer.

There are two types of offers: the tender offer voluntarily launched by the purchaser; and the mandatory offer triggered above the 30 per cent shareholding cap. A mandatory offer will be triggered in the event of a further shareholding increase following the reach of the 30 per cent shareholding or a takeover that will lead to the purchaser's shareholding in the target exceeding the 30 per cent threshold. The purchaser may obtain an waiver from the CSRC to be exempted of such a mandatory offer.

An offer can be a general or partial offer. A general offer targets all the outstanding shares while a partial offer only targets a portion of the outstanding shares.[227] The purchaser should extend a general or partial offer to all the shareholders. The general principle is that, in a takeover by offer, the purchase should treat all the shareholders equally and fairly, and acquire shares from shareholders on a pro rata basis if the number of shares to be sold exceeds that to be acquired.[228] In a voluntary offer, it is the purchaser who decides to launch either a general or partial offer. The situation may be more complicated in a mandatory offer.

The purchaser may launch either a general or partial offer to conduct the takeover if the mandatory offer is triggered due to the further shareholding increase following the reach of the 30 per cent shareholding threshold. However, the purchaser may only launch a general offer if the mandatory offer is triggered in the event of a takeover resulting in the reach of the 30 per cent shareholding threshold.

Takeover by a share transfer agreement must be conducted through the stock exchange. OTC transfer of listed shares is not allowed. The Chinese stock exchange and clearing house only accepts a takeover or transfer of shares if (i) a transfer acquiring the controlling rights of a listed company or resulting in a shareholding change of five per cent or above; (ii) a transfer between the parties who have a de facto controlling relationship or are both controlled by the same person; (iii) a transfer that constitutes a strategic investment by foreign investors; or (iv) a transfer otherwise recognized by the CSRC. Thus, a takeover by a share transfer agreement, as a matter of fact, refers to an acquisition of at least five per cent of the outstanding shares, which may be one of the following three scenarios: (i) an acquisition of shares from five per cent to 20 per cent; (ii) an acquisition of shares from 20 per cent to 30 per cent; or (iii) an acquisition of shares over 30 per cent.

In an indirect takeover, a purchaser indirectly controls or owns interests in a listed company. An indirect takeover may take place through (i) entering into an investment relationship with the listed company's shareholder, such as incorporating a special purpose vehicle with shares in the target company; (ii) entering into a contract or arrangement with the listed company; or (iii) acquiring the controlling rights in the listed company's shareholder by (a) acquiring equity or shares from an existing shareholder of the listed company's shareholder; or (b) subscribing for the new shares or capital increase of the listed company's shareholder. The last scenario is an acquisition of non-listed company.

228 Securities Law, art 88; Company Law, art 127.

Takeover Procedures 2002

The CSRC issued the Administration of the Takeover of Listed Companies Procedures (the 'Takeover Procedures') in October 2002. The Takeover Procedures cover a wide variety of transactions in which actual control in the listed companies may be acquired.[229] Transactional models may include negotiated purchases, tender offers, and competing trading at the stock exchange.[230]

Where an investor intends to hold or control more than 30 per cent of the outstanding shares in the target company, the investor is required to make a general offer to all the shareholders in the target company. The investor actually controls a listed company if:

- He is the single largest shareholder;
- The voting rights being exercised or controlled by him are more than those exercised by the largest shareholder of the company;
- He holds or controls more than 30 per cent of the shares or voting rights in the company;
- He has the right to appoint more than half of the board seats by exercising the voting rights; and
- In other circumstances determined by the CSRC.[231]

In a negotiated acquisition, the purchaser is to submit a report to the CSRC on the day following the conclusion of a takeover agreement, and provide a specified notice about the proposed transaction to the target and the public.[232] The board needs to make a decision after receiving the notice.[233] When the target of the transfer is state-owned shares, the government approval is required to effect the transaction.[234]

An existing shareholder holding less than 30 per cent of the shares in the target company also may increase its stake in the company through a tender offer, which, however, subjects the acquirer to some restrictions. For instance, the shares to be purchased pursuant to such tender offer could not exceed five per cent of the outstanding shares, and the acquirer cannot hold more than 30 per cent of total shares after the takeover.

If the 30 per cent cap is exceeded, the acquirer is required to make a notification to the target company, make a public announcement, and submit an acquisition report to the CSRC.[235] The target's board may engage an independent financial adviser to assess its financial conditions, and opine the fairness of the offer. The board needs to make a recommendation to the shareholders and make such a recommendation available to the public and the CSRC.[236]

Upon its effectiveness, the takeover offer opens for a period of no less than 30 days but, save in the event of a competing offer, no more than sixty days.[237] The offer price cannot be lower than the highest price that the same purchaser had paid in a previous acquisition of the same class of shares within six months prior to the reminder date of the takeover offer.[238]

The payment for a takeover transaction can be made in cash, securities, or both. Nevertheless, the purchaser must pay the price in cash if it issues a general offer for the purpose of delisting the target company or as a result of its failure to obtain the CSRC exemption of a mandatory offer. Under the Takeover Procedures, the target cannot take such anti-takeover actions as issuing new shares, issuing convertible bonds, redeeming the company's shares, amending the company's articles, or selling all or substantially all of the assets if the purpose of one or more of these actions is to frustrate the takeover.[239]

The CSRC issued the new takeover procedures on 1 August 2006 (with the effect from 1 September 2006) to replace and consolidate the Takeover Procedures 2002 and the Administration of Disclosure of Information on the Change of Shareholdings in the Listed Companies Procedures.

Under the Takeover Procedures 2006, an investor holding more than 30 per cent of a listed company is only required to offer to buy part of outstanding shares.[240] The relaxation of the general offer rule is to encourage and facilitate more acquisitions. The CSRC is granted with the authority to overrule the poison-pill mechanism.[241] Consideration paid by the acquirer can be in the form of cash, securities, or their combination. Share swap, as a transactional mode, is now also allowed.[242] In the bidding process, potential purchasers must offer more than any Shareholders who have acquired shares in a listed company pursuant to the relevant articles under the section headed 'Acquisition of Listed Companies' may not dispose of the shares during the period of acquisition.

Conclusion

Although the history of China's modern securities market is brief, the progress made so far has been remarkable. The growth of China's securities market also is part of China's transformation from a socialist planned economy to a market economy. The early stage's institutional designs focusing on the SOE reform and maintaining state control have gradually given way to more market-oriented legal principles, concepts, tools, and measures. In this sense, it is plausible to see an expanding body of regulatory and trading rules, judicial guidelines, and interpretations as well as more legal measures to adjust or correct institutional deviations of the securities market.

Nevertheless, it may be still too early to conclude that the growth of the securities market and development of a legal or regulatory regime are on the right track. The largest hurdle is the state control and ownership, which will continuously affect the performance, functioning, and liquidity of the securities market. A more flexible registration regime should be put in place so that the level of the state intervention can be decreased to a further lower level. The disclosure regime should be further improved to allow investors to make informed decisions.

China's weak judiciary is still a source of criticisms, especially from the foreign investment community. Chinese courts have been more actively involved in the securities-related disputes. The Supreme People's Court has issued a wide range of judicial opinions, interpretations, and guidelines. Instead of its once lay-back approach, the Supreme People's Court instructed lower courts to accept and hear civil compensation cases arising from fraudulent activities in the securities market from January 2002. Nonetheless, the scope of cases that can be accepted and heard by the courts is still limited; and the eligibility of shareholder investors for compensation of losses suffered as a result of false statements also is limited. In a larger context, it appears that the court's role in China's social and economic development is not well placed and has more room for improvement. The courts in China, in general, may have to reach various goals by taking a more balanced approach. For instance, courts may have to strike a balance between upholding legal rights and interests under the law and being more responsive to the policy changes initiated by the government; between protecting lawful investments on the stock exchanges and cracking down on illegal or fraudulent activities; between supporting the principle of freedom of contract and intervening in the market behaviors at a reasonable level; and between offering sufficient and timely protections to investors when they suffer losses and maintaining social stability and harmony. These multi-faceted concerns raise challenges to a less developed judiciary in China. A well-educated, highly experienced, transparent, and independent judiciary is still the goal of further judicial reform, which will give more confidence to investors, domestic and foreign.

Given the infancy of the Chinese securities market, speculative activities have been widespread not only on the stock exchanges but also future markets as well as bonds market. The Chinese securities market is still dominated by individual investors. In the early years of its development, there were some occasions when individuals took to the street and rioted against police for the scarce opportunity to obtain subscription forms so that they were able to subscribe for shares. Starting from the 1990s, individual investors relied more on civil litigation for their claim of losses from the false statements.

This sort of litigation is likely to involve a large number of investors in the marketplace, and may have a negative impact on social stability. Both the regulatory watchdogs and courts have been careful in dealing with and having a mixed attitude towards such cases. In addition to the investor education campaign, the involvement of foreign investors also may help raise the investor community's sophistication level. In post-WTO China, along with China's further opening to foreign investors and fulfilment of its WTO commitments, it is reasonable to expect more and more foreign securities investments to come into China. Further legislative, institutional, and judicial reform of China's securities market and regulatory system will help strengthen investors' confidence and market efficiency.

Introduction

In General

Recent changes in Colombian capital markets regulations reflect Colombia's newfound economic prominence and increased level of financial sophistication. Colombia's impressive current growth rate, its reliable legal framework, and its highly developed institutional and retail investors have all contributed to significantly boost the interest of leading global financial institutions in Colombia.

This chapter, after providing a general overview of the securities markets in Colombia, focuses on legal order and regulatory interests with special regard to situations involving foreign elements, which include, among others, information on specific regulations applicable to foreign direct investment and the implications of the Colombian foreign exchange regime on the offering of crossborder financial and securities market products and services, and on procedures involving multi-jurisdictional securities offerings as well as particular rules applicable to offerings made by multilateral credit agencies and foreign entities and branches of foreign entities.

This chapter also includes a general review of the control and supervision of the securities markets, the main regulatory bodies, and participants, and provides a description of the overall structure of the Colombian securities markets, information on trading systems, as well as a description of the multi-phased integration of the Colombian, Peruvian, and Chilean stock exchanges and recently the Mexican stock exchange to form the Mercado Integrado Latinoamericano (MILA). The most important laws and decrees that regulate Colombia's Capital Markets include:

- Law Number 964 of 2005 (the 'Securities Market Law'), which regulates the intervention of the Government in the securities markets and implements an administrative structure that promotes transparency and allows fair participation of investors and other participants in the securities market; and
- Decree Number 2555 of 2010, which compiles prior decrees and regulations in the area of finance, securities, and insurance and provides extensive regulation on the issuance, offering, and trading of securities, applicable to both local and foreign issuers.

Finally, this chapter provides an overview of corporate governance practices and their applicability to issuers, a description of the regulatory framework on the prevention of insider trading, a brief description of pooled funds and private equity funds, and an introductory analysis for the resolution of jurisdictional conflicts in Colombia under the principles of international commercial law.

Regulation and Supervision of Securities Markets

In General

The following three entities regulate and supervise the securities markets in Colombia:

- The Congress of the Republic enacts legislation to regulate activities in the securities markets;
- The Ministry of Finance and Public Credit (the 'Ministry of Finance'), which is part of the executive branch, has rule-making authority and issues regulations to enforce the securities laws enacted by Congress; and
- The Colombian Superintendence of Finance (the 'Superintendence') issues instructions to ensure compliance with the rules issued by the Ministry of Finance.

The main functions of each of these entities are described below. Several private entities also perform regulatory functions and their roles and responsibilities also are described below. Furthermore, the Colombian Central Bank exercises certain regulatory powers that may occasionally impact transactions effected in the securities markets, mainly in the context of the prevention of money laundering and the regulation of foreign exchange markets.

Congress

The Colombian Constitution assigns the Colombian Congress the power to enact legislation to provide the general principles and objectives regarding intervention criteria that the Administration must pursue when it issues regulations pertaining to the utilization, management, and investment of funds raised from the public. In the exercise of its constitutional powers described above, Congress enacted Law Number 964 of 2005, setting forth the legal framework applicable to the securities markets. The Law mainly regulates the following matters:

- The general principles and objectives of the Colombian securities market;
- The criteria for the government’s involvement in the securities markets;

- The definition of 'security' and the financial instruments that constitute securities;
- The description of the activities defined as 'activities of the securities market' and the requirement of being supervised by the Superintendence;
- The rules related to the so-called Integrated Information System of the Securities Market (SIMEV);[1]
- The procedures for offsetting and settling securities and the rules related to the central counterparty risk mechanisms;
- The general rules regarding depositary activities;
- The general rules of self-regulation in the securities markets;
- The general aspects on the protection of investors, including standards of good corporate governance; and
- The general regulations regarding administrative infringements and penalties.

Ministry of Finance

Pursuant to the Colombian Constitution, the President of the Republic has the power to regulate the securities markets in accordance with the legislation enacted by Congress (Law Number 964 of 2005). This authority was delegated to the Ministry of Finance and is exercised through the issuance of regulations.

The Ministry of Finance issues rules and regulations pertaining to the securities markets to affect the intent of the securities laws enacted by the Congress. Decree Number 2555 of 2010 presents the most extensive set of securities regulations issued by the Ministry of Finance. The Decree is a compilation of prior decrees regarding financial, securities, and insurance regulations. The Decree also updated certain rules related to the investment regime of pension funds, pooled funds and private equity funds, public offerings, and rules related to the activities of the SIMEV.

Superintendence of Finance

The Superintendence is responsible for the inspection, surveillance, and control of the participants in the securities markets. The Superintendence has the authority to execute financial regulations, conduct inspections, and supervise all financial entities and the activities of companies in the securities markets, including certain corporate procedures.

1 The SIMEV consists of three independent registries: (a) the National Registry of Securities and Issuers, (b) the National Registry of Agents of the Securities Market, and (c) the National Registry of Professionals of the Securities Market. In essence, the SIMEV collects relevant information that securities market participants must provide regarding their activities in the securities markets.

Other Entities with Regulatory Authority

Self-Regulatory Organization of the Securities Market. Law Number 964 of 2005 provides for self-regulation of the securities markets through the creation of the Self-Regulatory Organization of the Securities Market (Autoregulador del Mercado de Valores, AMV). The AMV is a non-governmental entity that exercises self-regulatory functions, including:

- Regulating intermediation activity in the securities markets;
- Ensuring securities-regulation compliance by intermediaries; and
- Imposing fines on intermediaries for violations of the securities regulations.

Colombian Stock Exchange. The Colombian Stock Exchange (Bolsa de Valores de Colombia, BVC) is a private entity organized as a corporation that administers the trading systems where securities are publicly traded and securities operations are registered. Pursuant to article 25 of Law Number 964 of 2005, stock exchanges such as the BVC perform certain regulatory, surveillance, and disciplinary functions.

Even though the BVC can issue its own regulations in connection with securities trading and other transactions made through the BVC, these regulations, such as the General Regulation of the BVC (Reglamento General de la BVC), require prior approval of the Superintendence. The regulations issued by the BVC in general terms provide for:

- Requirements for registration with the BVC;
- Certain procedural aspects regarding the prevention of money laundering by members of the BVC; and
- Certain technical aspects applicable to transactions conducted through the electronic trading systems managed by the BVC.

Securities Market Structure

In General

The securities markets are mainly comprised of issuers, investors, and facilitators or intermediaries between the issuers and investors (ie, brokers and dealers). A general overview of the structure of the Colombian securities markets is provided below.

Issuance and Negotiation: Primary Market and Secondary Market

Transactions involving securities that are purchased directly from the issuer are conducted on the primary market (Mercado Primario). On the secondary market (Mercado Secundario), investors purchase securities from other investors, rather than purchasing securities directly from the issuer.

Qualified Investors and General Public

Qualified or professional investors are investors that have a net worth equal to or greater than 10,000 times the current monthly legal minimum wages[2] and meet at least one of the following requirements:

- Ownership of an investment portfolio equal to at least five thousand (5,000) times the current legal minimum wages; or
- Execution of 15 or more securities transactions over a 60-day period, within two years prior to the respective investor's qualification as professional investor for aggregated value equal to or greater than 35,000 times the current monthly legal minimum wages.

Qualified or professional investors have exclusive access to the so-called Segundo Mercado, which is comprised of securities issued by a specific procedure with fewer requirements than the ordinary procedure applicable to securities placed in the so-called Mercado Principal; which can be accessed by the general public. Notwithstanding the foregoing, the general public may participate in certain Segundo Mercado securities transactions, such as:

- The purchase or sale of shares or bonds mandatorily convertible into shares undertaken by the shareholders of an issuer;
- The issuance of shares or bonds mandatorily convertible into shares in connection with the exercise of preemptive rights; and
- The purchases made by the issuer of its own shares after they have been issued and acquired by investors (repurchase of shares).

With prior authorization of the Superintendence, securities that are purchased or sold on the Segundo Mercado may be transferred to the Mercado Principal. However, securities that are purchased or sold on the Mercado Principal may not be transferred to the Segundo Mercado.

Qualified professional investors also have exclusive access to foreign securities trading systems administered by local stock exchanges. The foreign securities trading systems consist of securities issued by foreign issuers in accordance with foreign law and listed on a local stock exchange, provided that such securities meet the securities requirements provided by article 2 of Law Number 964 of 2005.

Given the limited use that investors and issuers have been given to the Segundo Mercado, the Ministry of Finance decided to make the current regime more flexible in order to encourage the participation of new issuers (including small and medium-sized enterprises) and, by means of Decree Number 1019 of 2014, it eliminated certain information requirements, and facilitated registration procedures, which in turn translated into a reduction of costs to the issuer. Under 2 The monthly legal minimum wage valid through 2014 is COP $616.027.

Decree Number 1019, for instance, the risk rating of securities issued in the Segundo Mercado is no longer mandatory.

Trading Systems: Stock and Over-the-Counter Market

Stock market transactions are conducted on a stock exchange or through securities trading systems. A stock exchange is a corporate entity authorized by the Government to act as a platform on which its members trade securities and provides its own set of regulations (ie, listing requirements), supervision, and services specifically aimed at facilitating securities trading.

Only the intermediaries of the securities market have direct access to securities trading systems and can execute transactions either as brokers (only stock broker companies and trustees) or on their own behalf (all intermediaries). Intermediaries of the securities market are entities subject to the supervision of the Superintendence, such as stock brokers, banking institutions, investment banks, trustees, pension fund managers, and insurance companies. The management of securities trading systems may only be undertaken by entities supervised by the Superintendence. In Colombia, the main securities trading systems include:

- The Colombian Electronic Market (Mercado Electrónico Colombiano, MEC), which trades fixed rate securities (ie, securities other than shares and convertible bonds) and is managed and regulated by the BVC.
- The X-Stream trading system, which trades variable rate securities and is managed and regulated by the BVC;
- The Electronic Trading System (Sistema Electrónico de Negociación, SEN), which mainly trades public debt securities and is managed by the Central Bank;[3] and
- The Foreign Securities Trading System (Sistemas de Cotización de Valores Extranjeros, SIC), which trades foreign securities listed on the SIC.[4]

In addition, pursuant to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the request for the listing of foreign securities on the SIC may only be submitted by a Colombian broker in compliance with certain obligations, including:

- Provide the relevant information to the administrator;

3 Credit establishments, trust companies, stock brokers, independent securities brokers, pension and severance funds administrators, the National Treasury Department of the Ministry of Finance, and the Central Bank may access the SEN. SEN's users (agents) may act directly or through brokers.

4 Pursuant to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the SIC is a multilateral and transactional mechanism, under which members agree to specific rules for the trading of foreign securities listed on the SIC. Only professional investors are able to conduct transactions in these foreign securities and only stock exchanges and administrators of securities trading systems that are under the Superintendence's surveillance may administer the SIC.

- Ensure that the market receives adequate access to the pertinent financial, accounting, and legal information, under the same conditions as such information is disclosed in the foreign market where the securities are traded; and
- Disclose the existence of administration and custody agreements of the listed securities with the local and foreign central depositary systems and custodians, if such is the case.

Securities depositaries that are under the Superintendence's surveillance are in charge of administering and serving as custodians of the foreign securities listed on the SIC. In Colombia, there are two depositary entities:

- The Depósito Centralizado de Valores, Deceval, which mainly is a depositary of securities issued by private companies; and
- The Depósito Central de Valores del Banco de la República, which is the public debt securities depositary.

The over-the-counter market consists of securities transactions that are not conducted through a securities trading system.

Bogotá, Lima, and Santiago Stock Exchange Integration

The MILA, which initiated operations in 2011, is a platform for variable rate securities trading of securities listed on the BVC, the Bolsa de Comercio de Santiago (Chile), and the Bolsa de Valores de Lima (Perú). The Bolsa de Valores de México also plans on integrating with the MILA.

The MILA provides far-reaching investment opportunities to worldwide investors and increases the volume of transactions of variable rate securities in Latin America. The MILA's main characteristics in its current stage are the following:

- The ongoing integration of all four stock exchanges is not a corporate merger;
- Basically, each stock exchange has developed a different technological platform to operate in an integrated manner by means of a unique protocol of communication;
- Each market is autonomous, having its own regulatory framework and being administered by each stock exchange in their respective market; and
- The operations of the variable rate securities are performed through pre-authorized intermediaries and require the signing of agreements among them, with transactions being performed in the local currency of each market.

The integration of the Colombian, Chilean, and Peruvian stock exchanges has been structured into two phases:

- Phase I, which began in 2009, consisted of a series of cooperation and integration agreements between the relevant stock exchanges, depositaries, and governmental authorities of each jurisdiction; and

- Phase II, which is where the MILA stands currently, began in 2011.

Phase II applies the regulatory framework for the integrated market, the market's operational procedures, and any adjustments necessary. Once Phase II has concluded, the negotiation, offsetting, and settling of securities will be completely integrated.

Dual Listing

Colombian regulations allow for a foreign issuer to list its securities on the BVC, either through a dual listing procedure or by registering with the SIC securities trading system, as explained above. A dual listing provides a company with liquidity for its securities and allows it to expand its shareholder base to foreign institutional and retail investors. If an issuer has substantial operations in the country of its secondary listing, such presence and activities also may facilitate capital raising efforts.

Following registration with the National Registry of Securities and Issuers Registry (RNVE) and receiving the relevant authorizations from the Superintendence, a foreign company may publicly offer securities and register its securities with the BVC. Upon registration with the BVC, a foreign company becomes subject to local regulations of the Superintendence, the BVC, and Deceval.

Furthermore, securities trading on the secondary market is subject to compliance with Colombian foreign exchange regulations. Typically, a local depository agent will be appointed to keep shareholder records and distribute dividend payments. The SIC, as explained above, allows the securities of foreign companies to be listed and traded without prior RNVE registration or approval from the Superintendence. However, public offerings by foreign companies require prior RNVE registration, and only institutional investors have access to the SIC.

Foreign Investment and Crossborder Financial and Securities Services

International Investment

In General

Even though Colombia's legal framework strongly encourages foreign direct investment and has placed limited restrictions on foreign investment inflows and subsequent expatriation of investment proceeds, whether in the form of dividends or otherwise, foreign investors in Colombia and Colombian residents that invest abroad shall report their investments to the Colombian Central Bank to comply with the Colombian foreign exchange regime.

In essence, these reporting obligations are meant to assist in the prevention of money laundering and allow the Central Bank to analyze inbound and outbound investment flows for public policy purposes.

Legal Framework

Decree Number 2080 of 2000, amended by Decree Number 4800 of 2010, sets forth Colombia's foreign investment regime. For purposes of registration with the Colombian Central Bank, the Colombian foreign exchange regulations distinguish between portfolio investments and direct foreign investments.

Pursuant to Decree Number 2080, foreign investment in securities listed in the RNVE, pooled funds, and dual-listing schemes are considered portfolio investments. Moreover, Regulation Number DCIN-83 of the Colombian Central Bank (Regulation DCIN-83), in accordance with the amendments made by Decree Number 4800, establishes that foreign portfolio investments are short-term in nature. On the other hand, foreign exchange regulations establish that direct foreign investments where the investor wishes to attain control are long-term in nature. The following are considered direct foreign investments:

- Company capital contribution by means of the acquisition of shares, corporate quotas, or convertible bonds;
- Acquisition of real estate or securities issued as in connection with a real estate securitization or REIT;
- Acquisition of rights in trusts;
- Contributions by investors in respect of joint ventures and concessions;
- Capital or additional paid-in capital investments in branches of foreign companies; and
- Participation of non-residents in local private equity funds.

Pursuant to Regulation DCIN-83, local managers (eg, stock brokerage firms, trust companies, and investment management companies, known as sociedades administradoras de inversión) must be appointed as representatives of foreign portfolio investors, which are required to carry out the applicable registration requirements. Foreign investors who have duly registered their investments through a local manager have the right to repatriate invested capital and dividends or other types of distribution under the general foreign investment regime. Repatriation of funds must be made through the local manager by completing the relevant foreign exchange forms (Form Number 4 of the Colombian Central Bank). Broadly speaking, the following are the main obligations of local managers:

- Comply with foreign exchange regulations and registration requirements, including the registration of the portfolio investment with the Central Bank;
- Represent the foreign investor in all matters arising from its investments in Colombia;
- Comply with applicable tax regulations;

- Supply the Superintendence, the Central Bank, and any other relevant authority with any requested information; and
- Comply with any other obligations established by the Superintendence.

In order to make portfolio investments in Colombia, a foreign entity must enter into a management and custodial agreement with an authorized manager located in Colombia. The local manager acting on behalf of the foreign portfolio investor would be permitted to enter into repo transactions (operaciones de reporto), buy-sell-back transactions (operaciones simultáneas), and stock-lending transactions (operaciones de transferencia temporal de valores) pursuant to articles 2.36.3.1.1 and 2.36.3.1.2 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010.

Additionally, the local manager would be permitted to enter into derivative transactions and provide collateral and guarantees in connection with said transactions or with any other operations or agreements that must be settled and liquidated through clearing houses. For these purposes, the local manager would be permitted to open and maintain checking and saving accounts to keep and dispose of the required assets and funds to enter into the authorized transactions.

Finally, Regulation Number DCIN-83 establishes the possibility of registering as a type of portfolio investment accounts payable and other amounts that foreign direct investors may be allowed to repatriate from Colombia derived from dividend payments or any funds arising from the liquidation or disposal of their Colombian investments.

Custodial Agreements

Custody, safekeeping, and nominee services of securities in Colombia are regulated by Decree Number 2555 of 2010, modified by Decree Number 1243 of 2013, which set forth a new set of rules regarding the custody of securities. Custodial activities undertaken in Colombia are governed by three basic principles:

- Independence;
- Segregation; and
- Professionalism.

In order for the client to contract a custodian, the two parties must enter into a custody agreement for the purpose of regulating the activities to be performed by the custodian and the respective fees to be paid for the services. Under Decree Number 1243, the custodian, which is the local entity that undertakes the custody of securities, is obligated to perform three mandatory services:

- Perform the safekeeping of securities;
- Take care of the compensation and liquidation of the securities operations; and

- Manage the financial rights derived from those securities.

In order to obtain authorization to act as a custodian, the local fiduciary entity must be registered with the National Registry of Agents of the Securities Market (Registro Nacional de Agentes del Mercado de Valores) administered by the Superintendence. The custodian also must comply with several other requirements. Finally, the custodian must be liable for the securities and cash that are under its custody, for the rendering of the mandatory, supplementary, and special services, as well as for the compliance of its legal and contractual obligations, for which it would be responsible up to negligence as a prudent and diligent expert, in the securities custodial activity.

Offering Crossborder Financial and Securities Services

Regulatory Framework

Pursuant to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, a foreign entity whose main purpose is to offer financial, reinsurance, or securities-related services and intends to promote, market, or advertise its products or services in Colombia (a 'foreign entity') must either establish a representative office in Colombia or enter into a referral agreement with a local broker-dealer (sociedad comisionista de bolsa) or with an investment bank (corporación financiera). In order to establish a representative office, the foreign entity is required to file an application with the Superintendence.

Once a foreign entity has established a representative office, other affiliates of the said entity may file an application to be represented by the same representative office. Under applicable regulations, any foreign entity that has not established a representative office in Colombia, or executed a referral agreement, is barred from undertaking any of the following activities in Colombia:

- Promote or advertise, directly or indirectly, any financial and securities-related products and/or services within Colombia and to any Colombian residents; and
- Send employees, contractors, representatives, agents, or traveling salesmen to Colombia, or hire or contract Colombian residents to advertise or promote the foreign entity or its products and services.

Under applicable regulations, a representative office is only permitted to engage in the following:

- Undertake administrative activities which are directly related to the promotion and marketing of the relevant foreign entity or its financial or securities-related products; and
- Act as a liaison between the relevant foreign entity and its clients in Colombia by means of (a) the delivery to and receipt from the client of all documentation required by the foreign entity for the rendering of financial or securities-related services; (b) advising clients on the risk they would undertake by entering into commercial relationships with the foreign entity; (c) instructing and informing the foreign entity's Colombian clients on the fees, costs, expenses, and tax implications of the foreign entity's financial or securities-related services; (d) as long as they have been granted the specific authority to do so, undertake the collection, in and out of court, of any monies owed to the foreign entity by Colombian clients with regard to financing granted to the client by the foreign entity; (e) undertake promotional and marketing activities on behalf of the foreign entity and its services; and (f) promote the foreign entity and its services within Colombia by means of so-called promotion offices, established under the relevant representative office's supervision within Colombia in places other than its main offices, and with the prior approval of the Superintendence.

Representative offices are expressly barred from carrying out, directly or indirectly, any onshore financial or securities-related activity, which requires the authorization of the Colombian authorities, such as the rendering of financial services or securities-related activities.

Definition of 'Promotion' or 'Marketing'

Pursuant to Colombian law, 'promotion' or 'marketing' means any communication or message, delivered personally or through other means, whether or not widely distributed, intended to initiate, directly or indirectly, financial activities.

The rules and restrictions pertaining to the Foreign Entities' offering of financial products in Colombia apply regardless of whether the financial products are to be offered privately or in connection with a public offering of securities or the financial products are offered to the public at large, qualified purchasers, or qualified institutional buyers.

Referral Agreements

Referral agreements are agreements entered into between a foreign entity and either a local broker-dealer or investment bank. In general, all the rules and requirements applicable to representative offices also apply to referral agreements.

The purpose of these agreements is to provide the terms and conditions under which the relevant local broker-dealer or investment bank will promote the foreign entity's securities-related products or services. Referral agreements can only be entered into by foreign entities that intend to promote their securities-related products and/or services. Like representative offices, referral agreements and any amendments to the agreement must be approved by the Superintendence.

Exceptions

Although the general rule is that foreign entities wishing to promote their financial, reinsurance, or securities-related services are required to establish a representative office in Colombia or enter into a referral agreement, the applicable regulations establish exceptions to this general rule.

Multilateral agencies and foreign governmental entities, when arranging government-to-government financings, are exempted from this requirement. The same applies, subject to specific considerations, in the event of reverse solicitations.

Participants in Securities Market

In General

The participants in the securities market mainly include:

- Issuers;
- Investors; and
- Intermediaries who facilitate transactions between the issuers and investors.

Issuers

In General. The following types of legal entities may issue securities:

- Corporations;
- Foreign governments and foreign public entities;
- Multilateral credit agencies;
- Foreign entities and branches of foreign entities;
- Limited-liability companies;
- Cooperative entities;
- Non-profit entities;
- Trusts; and
- Pooled funds.

Corporations. Corporations may issue capital (shares) and debt securities. Upon the registration of shares with the BVC, the following implications result:

- Restrictions on the free transferability of shares are suspended, in particular any preemptive rights; and
- Quorum requirements and special majorities are modified, and the issuer becomes subject to specific regulations.

Foreign Governments and Foreign Public Entities. Foreign governments and foreign public entities are subject to a public law regime abroad and generally exercise some sort of public function. These entities may offer securities publicly in the Colombian market subject to the following conditions set out in Decree Number 2555 of 2010:

- The Colombian government or Colombian public entities should be able to publicly offer for sale their securities in the securities markets of the foreign public entity's home country (ie, requirement of reciprocity);
- The foreign government or foreign public entity offering securities in Colombia or the securities that those entities wish to offer in the local securities market must be rated by one or more risk rating agencies that is internationally recognized and considered as such by the Superintendence or by a rating agency supervised by the Superintendence;
- When shares are registered, the issuer must disclose, and prove to the satisfaction of the Superintendence, the scope of corporate rights of any Colombian investors, as well as how such Colombian investors may exercise their corporate rights. The issuer also must disclose the corporate rights of investors residing in the home country of the issuer;
- The issuer must have securities registered with one or more internationally recognized stock exchanges, to the satisfaction of the Superintendence, prior to completion of the securities offering in Colombia; and
- To the extent required by the law of the issuer's home country (ie, the country where the issuer's primary office is located), the issuer must demonstrate to the Superintendence that the issuer's home country regulator has authorized the Colombian registration or offering of the issuer's securities.

Multilateral Credit Agencies. Multilateral credit agencies are entities formed by different countries with the aim to facilitate the extension of credit. According to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, these multilateral credit agencies may publicly offer securities in the Colombian market, subject to certain conditions, described in greater detail below.

Foreign Entities and Branches of Foreign Entities. Foreign entities that are not subject to public law may make public offerings of securities in Colombia pursuant to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, as long as they meet, among others, the same requirements outlined above In addition, branches of foreign entities that undertake permanent activities in Colombia may publicly issue securities, as long as they meet certain requirements as described below:

The branch of the foreign entity must have been operational in Colombia for at least three years. If the branch is in a pre-operational stage or has been operational for less than three years, it must submit to the Superintendence an economic, financial, and market feasibility study (estudio de factibilidad económica, financiera y de mercado) or, if the foreign entity will provide 'support' (ie, if the foreign entity will pay the investors in the event the branch fails to do so), the branch must demonstrate that the foreign entity has securities registered with one or more internationally recognized stock exchanges, as considered and acknowledged by the Superintendence, and that the term of maturity, if any, of the securities publicly offered does not exceed the limit set for the duration of the branch's activities in Colombia. The prospectus and other documentation supporting the issuance must indicate whether the offering is guaranteed by the foreign entity and include at a minimum the following information:

- The scope of the liability of the foreign entity, in particular, whether the offering of the branch is wholly or partially guaranteed and whether the foreign entity's liability (obligación) is joint and several or secondary.
- The priority of payments to the holders of securities issued by the branch in the event of any universal insolvency proceedings, whether judicial or extra-judicial, against the foreign entity; and
- The law and jurisdiction governing the liability (obligación) of the foreign entity, including a description of the procedure to be initiated for extra-judicial debt collection or forced judicial liquidation.

Branches are required to periodically update their registration with the National Registry of Securities and Issuers (RNVE). If the foreign entity guarantees the offering, it must comply, through its branch, with the disclosure obligations of any relevant information, as provided in Decree Number 2555 of 2010 for all issuers, and with the reporting duties imposed on foreign entities through their Colombian branches.

Other Issuers. This group includes limited-liability companies, cooperative entities, non-profit entities, trusts, and pooled funds.

Securities Intermediaries

Intermediation

Intermediation activities in the securities market facilitate the purchase and sale of securities, either through the registered securities systems or in the over-the-counter market. The main purposes of these activities are:

- Purchase or sell securities that are listed on the RNVE, whether in the primary market or secondary market;
- Buy or sell securities that are traded on the secondary market and listed on the SIC;
- Undertake transactions in derivatives and structured finance products that are considered to be securities; and
- Buy or sell securities on the primary or secondary market, which are part of an integration of stock exchanges.

Securities Intermediaries

Intermediaries in the securities markets include stockbrokers, independent brokers, credit institutions, trustees, insurance companies, pension fund managers, pooled fund managers, and stockbrokers of agricultural products and other commodities.

In addition, the public entities that, in accordance with their legal regime, are able to undertake securities transactions directly on securities trading systems may acquire the title of intermediary. This title necessitates a certain level of supervision by the Superintendence. These intermediaries are required to be members of the self-regulatory organization authorized by the Superintendence and are subject to the requirements imposed by such organization, as well as those derived from their registration with the National Registry of Agents of the Securities Market.

Investors

Pursuant to the provisions of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the securities laws distinguish between professional or qualified investors (who have exclusive access to the Segundo Mercado and to the SIC) and client-investors, defined as those who are not professional investors. The conditions to be classified as professional or qualified investor are described above. However, a professional or qualified investor is enabled to withdraw that title voluntarily.

Securities Issuances and Public Offerings

As discussed above, securities that have been issued and which have not been previously publicly traded are negotiated on the primary market, while securities previously issued are traded on the secondary market. In the primary market, the issuer may offer securities through a public offering or a private placement.

In the secondary market, a seller may offer or a buyer may acquire securities through a securities trading system administered by a stock exchange or by the following special procedures:

- A public auction (martillo);
- A democratization offer (oferta de democratización); or
- Through public tender offer.

Public Offerings and Private Placements

Public Offerings

A public offering is one that meets the following conditions:

- The offering is addressed to the public at large or to 100 or more specifically identified investors; and
- The offering is made with the purpose of soliciting the general public for acquiring publicly issued securities that grant purchasers certain rights.

In contrast, a private offering generally meets the following conditions:

- The offering is addressed to less than 100 specifically identified investors;
- The offering is addressed to the shareholders of the issuing company, so long as there are less than 500 shareholders; and
- The issuer is a public utilities company that is offering securities to investors who will benefit from investments in infrastructure.

Securities that are to be offered publicly must be registered with the National Registry of Securities and Issuers and are subject to prior approval by the Superintendence. The specific content of the offering prospectus is set forth by Resolution Number 2375 of 2006 issued by the Superintendence.

The prospectus must include, at minimum, a description of the conditions and characteristics of the securities being offered, the terms of the offer, and the authorizations received. The prospectus also must contain a clear and complete description of the issuer, including information about its organizational aspects, historical background, financial information, expectations, risks, future projects, and plans for funds allocation received as a result of the issuance, among others.

This information, along with any additional information disclosed in the prospectus, must be certified by those responsible for generating it. Furthermore, the prospectus must be made available on the websites of the issuer, the Superintendence, and the BVC.

Private Placements

In Colombia, entities engaged in financial activities (ie, banks, insurance companies, finance companies, and financial corporations) are subject to the surveillance of the Superintendence, whereas issuers that are not engaged in financial activities are only subject to the supervision by the aforementioned authority. The Superintendence, under its supervisory powers over issuers, may only monitor the compliance of rules regarding the issuance and offering of securities. By contrast, the Superintendence under its surveillance power (which is a much broader power) may monitor the compliance of other types of rules, such as financial and corporate rules.

In general terms, in the event of private placements of equity securities, only entities subject to the surveillance by the Superintendence (eg, banks and insurance companies) and entities subject to the supervision by the Superintendence and other Governmental authorities must petition the Superintendence for its prior approval regarding the private placement rules of ordinary shares (reglamentos de suscripción de acciones ordinarias).

Entities subject to the exclusive supervision of the Superintendence (ie, entities that are not supervised by any other governmental authority) are not required to obtain prior approval of the Superintendence for the purposes of a private placement, regarding the private placement rules of ordinary shares

(reglamentos de suscripción de acciones ordinarias), as long as such placement complies with the following conditions:

- The number of shares to be placed is equal to or less than 20 per cent of the overall outstanding shares of the issuer;
- The placement is made subject to any preemptive rights the issuer's current investors may have;
- The placement rules comply with the specific requirements established in Decree Number 2555 of 2010; and
- The issuer has taken, as the case may be, the measures intended to preserve the rights of the holders of bonds mandatorily convertible into shares.

In addition, if the issuer complies with the above, its legal representative and fiscal auditor must submit to the Superintendence certain documents referred to in External Circular Number 005 of 2005 issued by such authority within 10 business days following the expiration of the term of the private placement. However, if any of the above requirements are not met, the specific exemption does not apply and the issuer must request authorization from the Superintendence.

Issuance of Securities by Colombian Residents Abroad

In General

Colombian issuers may currently engage in three types of public securities offerings in foreign markets:

- The exclusive public offer abroad;
- The simultaneous public offer undertaken both locally and abroad; and
- The successive public offer undertaken first abroad, in Colombia, or vice versa.

Through public securities offerings outside Colombia, Colombian issuers can access international capital markets to attract foreign investors and obtain additional funding for major operations or projects. Domestic issuers may offer securities registered with the RNVE and listed on the BVC locally and internationally, requesting authorization from the Superintendence in connection with the local offer, or register the securities in foreign trading systems without making an offer. In simultaneous public offerings, Colombian issuers may, with prior authorization of the Superintendence with respect to the local offering, offer their securities both in Colombia and abroad. For purposes of a simultaneous offering in Colombia and abroad, the issuer must have its shares listed on the BVC.

For purposes of granting the authorization, the Superintendence may accept international practices to facilitate the placement of the shares, including the price formation process (book-building) and the deadline for the offer. The book-building process must be a technically recognized process and may be undertaken exclusively in the jurisdiction where the majority of shares will be offered.

In addition, issuers wishing to undertake a simultaneous public offer in the local and foreign markets may draft the prospectus in the language required by commercial practices and as established by the regulations of the market in which the offering will take place. However, copies of the prospectus to be distributed in Colombia and copies that must be filed with the RNVE must include a version containing, at least, the information set forth in Decree Number 2555.

In addition, the prospectus distributed in Colombia and/or filed with the RNVE shall include, in Spanish, the specific information required by the applicable regulations regarding the type of securities to be offered and other aspects that may be relevant for Colombian investors.

Furthermore, despite the fact that the prospectus may be in English (or in the language of the country where the offering will take place), it must include the specific provision establishing that the registration before RNVE and authorization of the public offer by the Superintendence does not imply certification of the merits of the securities or the solvency of the issuer by such authority. Accordingly, it is common practice that the prospectus is prepared with two columns, containing the pertinent prospectus information in both English and Spanish, and the language of the country where the offering is made.

American Depository Receipts and Global Depositary Receipts

Despite the fact that Decree Number 2555 of 2010 establishes the general conditions that Colombian issuers must fulfill if they wish to undertake public offerings in foreign markets, the manner pursuant to which they effectively achieve the placement of their securities in international markets will depend on the issuer's intentions regarding the level of disclosure obligations to which they want to be subject to the manner in which they decide to trade their securities, and the type of investors they wish to attract.

As an attractive alternative to public offerings in foreign markets, Colombian issuers may issue American Depository Receipts (ADRs) or Global Depositary Receipts (GDRs), which are among the most recognized international mechanisms for such purposes. ADRs are deposit certificates issued in the United States by a financial institution, usually a bank, which represent shares or convertible bonds issued by a non-United States issuer. GDRs share many characteristics of ADRs, however, for GDRs the underlying securities are deposited with several affiliates of a financial institution in different countries.

ADRs and GDRs allow foreign investors to invest in securities issued in different jurisdictions without having to consider any exchange and tax regulations established in the issuer's home country. The following parties participate in the issuance and placement process for ADRs and GDRs:

- The Colombian issuer whose securities will be represented by the ADRs or the GDRs;
- The depository, which is the financial institution in the United States, or another country, as applicable, which issues the depositary receipts that represent the securities issued by the Colombian issuer;
- The custodian, which is the party that receives the underlying securities, with the purpose of holding them on behalf of the depository; and
- The investors that purchase the depositary receipts and acquire beneficial ownership in the underlying securities of the Colombian issuer.

In general, the depository exercises the rights granted by the underlying securities (pursuant to the specific instructions as established in the deposit agreement) and receives and distributes the Colombian issuer's dividends, in US dollars or the corresponding local currency, to the ADR or GDR holders.

Public Offerings of Securities by Foreign Issuers in Colombia

Regulations Applicable to Foreign Issuers and Their Securities Offerings

According to article 6.11.1.1.1 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the Superintendence may authorize the public offering of securities issued by foreign entities as long as certain requirements are met, as described above. Notwithstanding the foregoing, branches of foreign issuers incorporated in Colombia must comply with the additional requirements described above to conduct public offerings of their securities in Colombia. Furthermore, there are additional disclosures that the prospectus for such offerings by foreign issuers is required to contain, as stipulated in article 6.11.1.1.2 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, including:

- A detailed description of the system or procedure to be used for the offering, indicating the placement entities, the locations where the registration is to be made, and the stock exchanges where the securities will be registered;[5]
- A definition of the legal regime applicable to the securities with an indication of the competent courts for the exercise of any legal action or procedure regarding compliance and forced execution of the obligations derived therefrom;
- A summary description of the tax regime applicable to the securities, as well as the foreign exchange and of international investments regimes applicable in the country in which the issuer has its main offices;

5 If the offering is to be placed in several markets, it is necessary to provide additional information regarding each of them.

- The designation of the agents that will receive any legal notifications on behalf of the issuer in Colombia;
- The safekeeping clause by means of which the rights of the holder and the obligations of the issuer are ranked at least pari passu in payment priority with all other direct debts of the issuer represented as securities, non-guaranteed and non-subordinated; and
- All other information that the Superintendence considers essential for the purposes stipulated by law.

Issuance of Securities by Multilateral Credit Agencies

According to article 6.14.1.1.1 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, multilateral credit agencies can issue securities, subject to meeting the following requirements:

- The multilateral credit agency was created pursuant to an international treaty or agreement to which Colombia is a party;
- The securities issued by the multilateral credit agency must be at the order of or nominal, and a Colombian institution must be designated to act as administrator of the offering; and
- The multilateral credit agency must have obtained, in the 12 months immediately prior to the offering date, a rating of at least investment grade by one or more credit risk rating agencies, recognized as such by the Superintendence.

The rating must be kept up to date until the issuance is redeemed. The securities offered for issuance in Colombia do not have to be rated. The securities must be registered with a Colombian stock exchange. The registration of the securities issued by a multilateral credit agency with the National Registry of Securities and Issuers will permit the agency to make its public offering without payment for registration rights, public offer, or support fees. In addition to fulfilling the general prospectus requirements pursuant to Colombian securities laws, any prospectus for offering of securities by a multilateral credit agency must include the following:

- The identification of the issuer, noting its offices and main address, location of incorporation, as well as a brief description of its corporate constitution;
- A copy of the bylaws of the issuer or of the treaty acting as such;
- A detailed description of the system or procedure employed for the securities offering, indicating the markets where the securities to be issued will be traded, the placement agents, the location where subscriptions may be made, and the stock exchanges on which the securities will be registered;[6]

6 If the offering is made in several markets, such disclosures must be specified for each market.

- A description of the legal system governing the securities, indicating the competent courts for the exercise of any rights or procedures with respect to compliance and forced execution of the resulting obligations;
- A brief description of the tax framework applicable to the securities;
- The designation of agents for service of process in Colombia for any legal actions filed in Colombia;
- The safekeeping clause for which the rights of the holder and the obligations of the issuer are ranked at least pari passu in payment priority with all the other direct debt of the issuer represented in securities, non-guaranteed and non-subordinated; and
- Any other information that the Superintendence considers material.

In addition, pursuant to article 6.14.1.1.5 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the multilateral credit agency's securities offering must appoint a legal representative for the securities holders to represent their interests. The legal representative will be the only person authorized to exercise the rights stipulated in favor of the holders and institute legal actions against the issuer to enforce the securities holders' rights. For this purpose, the legal representative must sign an agreement with the issuer, which must contain the following stipulations:

- The rules and procedures that allow an appropriate communication between the securities holders and the issuer;
- The rules and mechanisms for holding meetings of securities holders when necessary;
- The quorum and majority rules at meetings of securities holders and the obligation of the legal representative of the securities holders to certify to the issuer that the decisions were made at the assembly subject to the rules; and
- The procedures for removal and replacement of the legal representative.

Multilateral credit agencies are not subject to the general reporting requirements of Decree Number 2555 of 2010. However, they must report immediately any information related to changes in their financial or operational affairs that may significantly impact their ability to repay the capital and interest payable with respect to the securities issued in Colombia. Finally, both multilateral credit agencies issuing bonds in the local market and foreign issuers in general must take into account the structuring of the operation regarding the design and content of the agreement involved in the respective issuance. To the extent the issuer, the structuring agent, and the underwriter are all foreign, foreign law and jurisdiction, usually the laws of the State of New York, can govern the underwriting agreement.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, to the extent the underwriting agreement is entered into with a Colombian lead manager and/or the placement group and/or distributor, or if the Colombian agent also acts as underwriter, the underwriting agreement can be made subject to Colombian law and jurisdiction. In any case, the presence of an underwriter and an international issuer makes the content of the agreement to correspond to the standards and formalities characteristic of the foreign jurisdiction.

Generally, the underwriting agreement will contain relatively rigid clauses regarding the representations and warranties of the issuer, detailed clauses regarding compensation and contribution among the parties involved, additional obligations of the issuer, conditions for suspension regarding the obligations of the underwriters and the arranger, and the survival of certain clauses, and so on, which reflect the legal practices of even the most sophisticated securities markets.

Obligation to Disclose Material Information to the Market

Material Information

Pursuant to article 5.2.4.1.5 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, issuers are required to disclose any material information to the market on a timely basis. The abovementioned article establishes two different standards to determine whether a reportable event requiring disclosure has arisen. The first standard broadly captures any information that would have been considered material by a diligent investor in connection with the purchase or sale of securities or with the decision to retain such securities as well as the exercise of securities holders' rights.

More specifically, Decree Number 2555 of 2010 provides a list of situations, decisions, and events that constitute material information. In connection with this list, the Superintendence has indicated that some of these events are presumed, as a matter of law, to constitute material information, while others require issuers to make judgment calls about the materiality of the specific situation to decide whether the information constitutes a reportable event. Pursuant to article 5.2.4.1.5 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the following types of situations or events constitute examples of material information requiring immediate disclosure by the issuer:

- Financial and accounting information, such as changes in the number of outstanding shares, approvals of dividend distributions, restatements of the issuer's financial statements, investments in companies, changes in accounting classification of investments or changes in accounting policies and disposals or acquisitions of any property whose value is equal to or greater than five per cent of the issuer's group of assets, as well as relevant changes in interest rates or other terms of credit or loans obtained and the capitalization of debts, mortgage encumbrances, pledges, or other collateral, payments in kind, and exchanges of assets or real properties; and
- Information as to legal status, such as calls for shareholder meetings; relevant decisions of the shareholder meetings and of the board of directors or equivalent; amendments to by-laws and any appointments, removals, and resignations of any director or auditor; relevant judicial or administrative proceeding and any imposition of penalties, changes in control, changes in ownership of any shareholders in an amount equal to or greater than five per cent of the outstanding shares, acquisitions and disposals of securities by directors, and shareholder agreements; termination and amendments of agreements that may impose any restrictions on the issuer and granting or cancellation of concessions or licenses; employment information, including termination or amendments with respect to material employment agreements, including convention and collective labor agreements; introduction or launch of new products or services and any material intellectual property issues; changes in the issuer's core business, corporate reorganizations such as mergers, conversions, acquisitions, transfers of assets and liabilities, corporate crisis situations, such as defaults in obligations for a certain period, insolvency proceedings or any event which might lead to interruptions of the issuer's commercial activities, and takeovers for administration or liquidation; issuances of securities in Colombia or abroad and all related aspects including delays in fulfilling obligations arising from such issuances; and bondholder or investor meetings, assembly decisions, and resignations or removals of the legal representative of securities holders.

For purposes of securitizations, additional information must be disclosed. Article 5.2.4.1.5 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010 lists a number of additional situations. Furthermore, the Superintendence may request from issuers any other information it considers material to ensure and preserve the capital markets' transparency.

Form and Opportunity to Disclose Material Information

Material information must be reported through the website of the Superintendence immediately after the reportable event has occurred or after the issuer becomes aware of such event. In any event, the information must include a detailed description of the reportable event. Pursuant to article 5.2.4.1.8 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the legal representative of the issuer is responsible for reporting such material information to the Superintendence.

Pursuant to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, issuers may not report through mass media any material information without prior or simultaneous disclosure to the public by means of the Superintendence's mechanisms for dissemination. In the event such information is released, the issuer must inform the market about its veracity.

Sanctions for Not Complying with Disclosure Requirements

Pursuant to Law Number 964 of 2005, failure to disclose a reportable event in an accurate, timely, complete, and sufficient manner constitutes a violation of Colombian securities laws.

Non-Disclosure Authorization

Notwithstanding the above, pursuant to article 5.2.4.1.7 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the legal representative of the issuer may request from the Superintendence an exemption from reporting an event, on the grounds that its disclosure could harm the interests of the issuer or may affect market stability. In addition, information with respect to ongoing business negotiations is exempted from the reporting obligations imposed by law when the status of such negotiations could be negatively impacted by public disclosure.

However, the Superintendence has discretion to determine whether information about ongoing negotiations must be disclosed. As suggested by the wording of the relevant part of article 5.2.4.1.7 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the disclosure order is more likely in the event of significant price fluctuations, which cannot be explained by current publicly available information about the issuer. However, even if the securities are behaving as expected, the Superintendence may find additional reasons to require the disclosure of ongoing negotiations.

Sanctions for Disclosing Privileged Information

Article 5.2.4.1.7 of Decree Number 2555 of 2010 treats undisclosed information as privileged information. Therefore, if the non-disclosure request is granted by the Superintendence, the persons included in the list of individuals who have access to the privileged information may not engage in any securities transactions related to the affected securities until such privileged information is properly disclosed to the market.

Board members are usually included in the abovementioned list. Therefore, they are required to refrain from disclosing or using for personal gains such privileged information. In addition, article 50 of Law Number 964 of 2005 considers that the use or disclosure (ie, tipping) of any privileged information violates Colombian securities laws. Therefore, if a board member uses or discloses any privileged information, such person becomes subject to the sanctions established in article 53 of Law Number 964 of 2005. For instance, under article 53 of Law Number 964 of 2010, board members would be subject to the imposition of fines that may not exceed, as of 2014, COP $187,236,144.

Insider Trading

Insider Trading Penalties

Pursuant to article 75 of Law Number 45 of 1990, any person will be subject to sanctions if that person, directly or indirectly:

- Undertakes one or more transactions in the securities market using privileged information (as defined above);
- Provides privileged information to a third party who is not entitled to receive it; or

- Provides such privileged information to advice on the purchase or sale of securities.

Pursuant to articles 50 and 53 of Law Number 964 of 2005, the Superintendence may impose several sanctions. A natural person can be subjected to a fine not exceeding, as of 2014, COP $187,236,144; a legal entity can be subjected to a fine not exceeding COP $939,441,094. The fines are payable to the Colombian Treasury Department. Other sanctions may include:

- Suspension to act as corporate officer (ie, perform administrative, management, or control activities) for up to five years at entities subject to supervision by the Superintendence;
- Temporary or permanent removal (as the case may be) from administrative, executive, or financial position of any entities subject to supervision by the Superintendence;
- Suspension of the registration in any of the registries included or referenced in Law Number 964 of 2005;[7] and
- Cancellation of the registration in any of the registries included or referenced in Law Number 964 of 2005.[8]

Finally, under the Colombian anticorruption statute, an employee, director, or member of a board or management body of any private entity who misuses privileged information such person possesses, due to such person's position or function, to obtain a benefit for him/herself or third parties, will be criminally prosecuted (imprisonment from one to three years and fines) in addition to any fines imposed by the Superintendence. Professionals and advisors who come into possession of privileged information and use such information to obtain a benefit for him/herself or third parties, by means of the negotiation (trade) of securities registered in the National Registry of Securities and Issuers, will be subject to the aforementioned penalties, as well.

Investor Protections

Corporate Governance

In General. Corporate governance refers to the set of control and supervisory mechanisms adopted by issuers to allocate powers amongst shareholders,

7 Under this penalty, the Superintendence may either limit certain activities or limit all of them. Once the term of suspension expires, the registration will be re-established with full effect.

8 In this case, the affected person/legal entity will be barred from registering in any of the registries that comprise the Integrated Information System of the Securities Market (Sistema Integral de Información del Mercado de Valores, SIMEV). The cancellation may last from one to 20 years. Once the cancellation term expires, the affected person or legal entity would have to reapply for registration and undertake the respective registration process.

executives, and the board of directors, or the equivalent, with the ultimate goal of maximizing shareholder value.

In the international context, much of the corporate governance standards applicable to Colombian issuers of securities were developed by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) in its Principles for Corporate Governance issued in 1999 and revised in 2003. These principles consolidate the best practices guidelines for corporate governance applicable to issuers into distinct concepts, namely:

- Rights of investors;
- Principles for the fair treatment of investors;
- Rights of third parties with interests in the issuer (stakeholders);
- Principles for disclosure of information and transparency; and
- Principles on the accountability of the board of directors.

Likewise, the so-called White Paper on Corporate Governance for Latin America, prepared by the OECD, contains specific recommendations for the region regarding the matters referred to in the Principles of the OECD for Corporate Governance. In Colombia, most of the standards enunciated by the Principles of the OECD and the White Paper on Corporate Governance for Latin America are generally contained in the Code of Commerce applicable to a wide variety of corporate entities. However, this chapter only addresses corporate governance standards applicable to issuers. These standards include:

- Rules applicable to boards of directors;
- Rules on audit committees; and
- The Código País.

Boards of Directors. Law Number 964 of 2005 requires that the board of directors of issuers must consist of at least five and no more than 10 members, of whom at least 25 per cent should be independent, as well as their respective alternates. Moreover, the issuer's legal representative cannot serve as chairman of the board of directors.

Audit Committees. Pursuant to Law Number 964 of 2005, the board of directors of an issuer must include an audit committee. In essence, the audit committee's responsibilities include the oversight of the preparation, presentation, and disclosure of financial statements and ensuring compliance with applicable laws. Although the responsibilities of the audit committee must be set forth in the bylaws of the issuer, by applicable law, audit committees must comply with the following requirements:

- The audit committee must consist of at least three independent members of the board of directors. Furthermore, the audit committee must have the presence of the issuer's fiscal auditor, who cannot vote on any matters put before the audit committee but who serves in an advisory capacity to the committee;

- The committee's decisions must be taken by simple majority;
- Prior to submission of the issuer's financial statements to the board of directors or at the general shareholders meeting, the committee must review and analyze the issuer's financial statements to ensure their veracity and compliance with applicable accounting and auditing rules; and
- The committee must meet at least every three months, and its decisions must be recorded in writing.

In addition, Law Number 964 of 2005 provides for additional mandatory corporate governance standards specifically for issuers that are companies with shares or bonds convertible into shares registered with the RNVE. The additional requirements applicable to these issuers include:

- Protections for initiatives proposed by minority shareholders;
- Disclosure of shareholder agreements;
- Special stock repurchase procedures; and
- Special share issuance and placement rules.

Código País. In 2007, the Superintendence issued Circulars 056 and 028 to promulgate a model code of corporate governance for issuers (Código País). The Código País contains provisions covering the following matters:

- Rights and equal treatment for all shareholders;
- Participation by minority shareholders in shareholder meetings;
- Additional committees to support the board (ie, corporate governance committee);
- Related-party transactions; and
- Dispute resolution mechanisms.

Even though the provisions contained in the Código País are of voluntary adoption, issuers are required to report annually to the Superintendence on their compliance with the provisions contained in the model code. The Superintendence established in Circular 007 of 2011 that the Código País is based on the 'comply or-explain' approach and, therefore, issuers that do not comply with any of the provisions contained in the Código País are required to explain their reasons for non-compliance.

Trading of Securities in Stock Market — Secondary Market

In General

The secondary market consists of the securities traded between investors, in which either a purchaser or a seller may initiate the transactions. Generally, the purchase or sale of securities in the secondary market may be undertaken without prior authorization of the Superintendence. Secondary market securities transactions may be performed on the over-the-counter (over-the-counter) market or through trading systems.

In addition, Colombian regulations provide that, with some specific exceptions, any transaction involving listed shares that represent an amount equal to or greater than the equivalent in Colombian Pesos of 66,000 UVR (Unidades de Valor Real), approximately COP $14,080,000 in 2014, must be made through a stock exchange. Pursuant to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, the following are exceptions to undertaking transactions through a stock exchange:

- Transactions executed between a same beneficial owner;
- The sale or purchase of shares owned by financial institutions subject to a liquidation proceeding;
- Repurchase of shares;
- Transactions carried out abroad for securities being publicly offered in a foreign country; or
- Transactions carried out abroad for securities being publicly offered in Colombia.

The Superintendence may approve any other transaction to be carried out without using a stock exchange's trading system. Even though purchases or sales of securities on the secondary market are generally not subject to prior authorization by the Superintendence, there are certain situations when the trading of securities must be made through a public tender offer, which requires authorization from the Superintendence. Likewise, authorization from the Superintendence is required to carry out trades for securities pursuant to either public procedures, or public auctions and democratization public offers.

Public Tender Offers

Pursuant to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, any person or group of persons willing to acquire or become the beneficial owner(s) of 25 per cent or more of the shares of a listed company or being already the beneficial owner(s) of 25 per cent of the shares of a listed company, intending to increase participation by more than five per cent, must launch a public tender offer (oferta pública de adquisición, OPA). An OPA in the Colombian market must be addressed to all the shareholders of the relevant company and constitute an offer to acquire at least five per cent of the total outstanding shares of the company.

When a beneficial owner of more than 25 per cent of the shares of a listed company has privately acquired less than five percent (5 per cent) of the total shares outstanding, such person or group of persons must launch an OPA at the moment that such private transactions add up to reach the five per cent threshold. Notwithstanding the above, the obligation to launch an OPA will not apply when:

- There is unanimous written consent of the voting shareholders of the target company expressing their agreement to conduct all transactions privately;
- The shares are acquired through a privatization process;
- The company is repurchasing its own shares;
- The company issues new capital;
- The company is conducting debt-for-equity swaps; and
- The person or group of persons becomes the beneficial owner of the shares by means of a: (a) donation; (b) succession; (c) court order; (d) company liquidation; (e) liquidation of marital property; or (f) payment in kind (Dación en pago).

In addition, the notion of 'beneficial owner' is defined in Decree Number 2555 of 2010 as any person or group of persons that, directly or indirectly, due to a contract or any other legal act, has or may have influence to affect the decisions of a company and has capacity to sell the respective shares. Companies and their subsidiaries are considered ultimate beneficiaries, as well as married couples and relatives upon second grade of blood relation.

Public Auctions

The public auction (martillo) is a public process for the purchase of securities initiated by a seller, which takes place through the BVC. A public auction for securities of an issuer requires prior authorization from the Superintendence of Industry and Trade if required by the competition regulations. To carry out a public auction, the sellers must present a written request to the BVC for the transfer of securities to be put up for public auction, which has 10 days to accept or reject the request for a public auction.

If the BVC accepts the proposal for a public auction, the BVC must inform the member brokers within two days of its acceptance, and request authorization from the Superintendence to carry out the public auction. The Superintendence has five business days to respond to the BVC's request for authorization of the public offer. If the Superintendence authorizes the holding of a public auction, the sales prospectus of the public auction must be presented to the BVC at least 10 business days prior to the date of publication of the first notice of the public auction. The sales prospectus also must be submitted for comment to the Superintendence at least five days prior to the publication of the first notice.

Once the BVC approves the content of the sales prospectus and if there are no objections from the Superintendence, three consecutive notices, issued at minimum intervals of five business days, must be published to announce the public auction in a nationwide newspaper and in the daily bulletin of the BVC.

The president of the public auction must present the notice proposal to the Superintendence, which must provide any comments it may have within five business days from the date of receipt of such notice proposal.

Once the Superintendence issues its authorization, the sales prospectus for the public auction must be presented to the BVC, at least 10 business days prior to the date of publication of the first notice. The sales prospectus also must be submitted to the Superintendence at least five business days prior to the publication date of the first notice. The trading of securities subject to the public auction will be suspended as of the date when the notice is presented to the Superintendence until the day following the first publication. The seller must deposit the securities to be auctioned with the BVC, for subsequent transfer to any winning bidders, no later than the date of publication of the third and final notice to announce the public auction.

Once the three notices have been circulated, the interested bidders must submit guarantees of their position to support their prospective bid to the BVC no later than one business day prior to the day of the auction. The admissible guarantees to participate in public auctions are similar to those required to participate as bidder in a public tender offer of shares. Once these requirements have been met, the public auction may be held at the BVC, and upon completion of the public auction, the necessary payments may be made, as well as DECEVAL registration of the new owner or owners of the auctioned securities.

Democratization Offers

The democratization offers are those in which the controlling shareholder of an issuer offers, under conditions that allow for broad participation, part or all of the securities it owns, using procedures for the sale that guarantee wide publicity and free attendance, such as advertising campaigns through the media. For the democratization offer to be effective, it is necessary that the securities offered be:

- Registered with the BVC at least six months prior to the date of the operation; and
- Not subject to any liens or encumbrances, including tax liens, domain constraints, or any pending lawsuits or claims that may affect the property or its trading.

To carry out democratization offers, there must be a request authorization from the Superintendence to carry out the offer. The Superintendence has five business days, as of the first business day following the date when the request is presented, to make the observations it deems pertinent. The term during which the offer must remain in force may not exceed three months. Having met the above requirements, the transfer of securities may be done by means of the regular trading rounds of the BVC, or by means of special trading rounds authorized by the Superintendence.

Pooled Funds and Private Equity

Pooled Funds. The formation and management of pooled funds is subject to Decree Number 2555 of 2010, which defines pooled funds (fondos de inversion colectiva) as financial vehicles created for raising capital from third parties. These vehicles are formed with input from a plurality of the participating investors. The capital raised is managed professionally to achieve collective economic results.

Pooled funds are subject to supervision by the Superintendence. Decree Number 2555 establishes two kinds of pooled funds—open pooled funds, in which the equity interests may be redeemed before the expiration of the fund's term, and closed pooled funds, which means that equity interests may only be redeemed upon expiration of the fund's term unless partial and advanced redemptions are required by law, or the fund is required to distribute the appreciated value of equity interests. However, it is feasible to structure staggered pooled funds in which the placement rules of the fund establish different terms for the redemption of the equity interests over the life of the fund.

Private Equity. Pursuant to Decree Number 2555, private equity funds are defined as Fondos de Capital Privado, FCPs), which are closed pooled funds (fondos de inversión colectiva cerradas) in which at least two-thirds of the capital contributions are invested in assets other than publicly traded securities registered with the National Registry of Securities and Issuers (Registro Nacional de Valores y Emisores, RNVE).

An FCP is a special-purpose vehicle that is not considered a separate legal entity. As such, an FCP must be administrated by an authorized company such as a fiduciary entity (sociedad fiduciaria), a brokerage firm (sociedad comisionista de bolsa), or an investment management corporation (sociedad administradora de inversión). Such companies are generally referred to as 'Management Companies', and they are responsible for the general administration of the FCP.

In addition, Decree Number 2555 establishes that FCPs must be managed by either a professional manager or general partner (gestor profesional, GP) designated or hired by the Management Company. The GP must be an expert in the management of investment portfolios or the types of assets in which the fund aims to invest, and must have at least five years of relevant experience. The GP makes the investment decisions and is responsible for the formulation of the FCP's overall investment strategy.

Any locally incorporated FCP must have a minimum of two investors, each with a contribution of at least US $194,526.[9] FCPs are subject to administrative regulations issued by the Colombian Central Bank with respect to currency and foreign exchange matters, as well as administrative and technical regulations issued by specific supervisory governmental agencies, particularly the Superintendence. The Superintendence's regulations address specific issues for FCPs, such as fund formation monitoring, fund portfolio and individual equity valuation methodologies and reporting standards, management, compliance issues, and profitability disclosure rules.

Approaches to Jurisdictional Conflicts

Conflict of Laws

The Constitutional Court has established that, in Colombia, conflict of laws rules are included in articles 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the Civil Code and article 38 of Law Number 153 of 1887.[10] Based on the criteria of residence, article 18 states the unconditional principle of territoriality of Colombian law as mandatory for citizens and foreigners.

Based on the criteria of nationality, article 19 states the principle of extraterritoriality of Colombian law, in relation to Colombian residents or Colombians domiciled abroad, regarding civil status, capacity to undertake certain acts that have effect in Colombia, and obligations and rights derived from domestic relations.

Based on the criteria of the place of location (lex rei sitae), paragraph 1 of article 20 establishes the unconditional principle of territoriality of Colombian law in connection with movable goods and real property, owned by citizens or foreigners and affairs over which the country has interest or right.

Based on the criteria of the place of execution of the contracts (lex loci contractus), paragraph 2° of article 20 authorizes the application of a foreign law to contracts validly executed abroad, provided that they do not relate to goods or assets located in Colombia.

Based on the criteria of the place of performance of the contracts (lex loci solutionis), paragraph 3° of article 20 states that if the contract must be complied with in Colombian territory or generates effects inherent to the rights or interests of the country, Colombian law must be applied.

Based on the principle of the place of signature (locus regit actum), article 21 of the Civil Code and article 38 of Law Number 153 of 1887 remit the solution of the merits regarding the form of the public deeds to the laws of the country in which these have been granted.

The Colombian legal system adopts the mandatory principle of international private law of lex loci solutionis, in which the applicable law to any contract is the law of the place of its performance, regardless of the choice of law and forum selection included in the contract. Article 869 of the Commercial Code is deemed as a public policy rule and, as such, its observance is mandatory.

The Civil Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice has held that under principles of private international law, the manner in which the obligations are extinguished must be governed by the law of the place set forth by the compliance of such obligations. In this regard, the lex loci solutionis becomes applicable to any case related to the form in which the payment must be made, the goods that must be paid for, and the people to whom such payment can be made.

Notwithstanding the above, the lex loci solution also is has been interpreted in the sense that, if a substantial portion of the obligations derived from an agreement to be entered into by a Colombian resident is performed outside Colombia, Colombian courts would uphold as valid the choice of a foreign law. Due to reciprocity and territoriality principles, it must be concluded that, as with the application of Colombian law being mandatory in the performance of contracts that were executed abroad, it must be acceptable that the compliance with obligations in other countries is governed by the legal systems of such countries, regardless of the fact that the obligations derive from agreements executed in Colombia.

The Civil Procedure Code provides that the courts sitting at the place of domicile of the defendant or the place where the contract at issue was performed will decide disputes arising out of contracts. As a result, a choice of forum provision whereby the parties agree to submit their disputes to a specific court would be considered null and void. Notwithstanding the above, if the contract is performed outside Colombia, foreign courts may have jurisdiction. Although parties may not agree to submit the dispute to a specific court, they are entitled to submit their disputes to international arbitration. Pursuant to Law Number 1563 of 2012, parties may agree to submit their disputes to international arbitration when:

- The parties have their domiciles in different states;
- A substantial part of the obligations will be performed outside of the state in which the parties have their principal domicile; and
- The dispute relates to international commerce interests.

In this event, the parties may agree upon the procedural rules or to submit the dispute to an arbitration center such as the International Chamber of Commerce, the American Arbitration Association, or the London Court of International Arbitration. The parties to such an agreement also may decide the substantive law applicable to the dispute, language, number of arbitrators, and seat of the arbitration.

Colombia is party to the New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards. However, the enforcement of awards handed down by international arbitration panels requires the completion of exequatur proceedings before the Colombian Supreme Court of Justice, in accordance with article 695 of the Code of Civil Procedure (which will be abrogated by article 607 subject to the entry into force of Law Number 1564 of 2012 (Código General del Proceso) pursuant to the terms of article 627, paragraph 6).

Pursuant to articles 693 and 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure (which will be abrogated by articles 605 and 606 subject to the entry into force of Law Number 1564 of 2012 (Código General del Proceso) pursuant to the terms of article 627, paragraph 6), the courts of Colombia will give effect to and enforce a judgment obtained in a court outside Colombia without re-trial or re-examination of the merits of the case if there is a treaty or convention relating to recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments between Colombia and the country of origin of the judgment.

In the absence of such treaty, proper evidence must be provided to the Supreme Court of Justice to the effect that the courts of the country of the subject judgment would recognize and enforce Colombian judgments and the foreign judgment fulfills the following requirements:

- The judgment does not refer to in rem rights over assets located in Colombia as of the date of filing of the proceedings;
- The judgment is not contrary to Colombian public policy (mandatory) provisions, except for rules of procedure;
- The judgment is final and executory in accordance with the laws of the country of origin, and a duly authenticated and legalized copy is filed with the plaintiff's request for exequatur (article 605 of Law Number 1564 of 2012 only requires a legalized copy of the foreign judgment);
- The matter of the judgment is not subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of Colombia;
- There are no ongoing proceedings in Colombia or any final judgment rendered by Colombian courts in connection with the same subject matter; and
- If the judgment has been rendered in a contentious matter, the requirements of due service of process to the defendant was complied with in accordance with the laws of the country of origin.

Introduction

In General

The modern era for the securities sector in Cyprus began in 1996 with the inauguration of the Cyprus Stock Exchange (CSE), the first official stock exchange in Cyprus.

The CSE is modeled on current international securities rules and practices and aspires to consolidate the position of Cyprus as a regional business and financial services centre and boost the growth of capital markets in Cyprus.

Sources of Law

The principal legislation governing the issue and trade of securities in Cyprus is as follows:

- Securities and Stock Exchange Law, 14(I) of 1993, as amended;[1]
- Securities and Stock Exchange Regulations of 1995–2005 (Part 1);[2]
- Securities and Stock Exchange Regulations of 1995-2005 (Part 2—Supplements);
- Trading Rules (Regulatory Administrative Act) 409/2006, as amended;[3]

Regulatory Authorities

The CSE was established under the Securities and Stock Exchange Law in April 1993. A seven-member Council (CSE Council) is responsible for the day-to-day management of the CSE and the implementation of its policies.

The CSE is supervised by the Cyprus Securities and Exchange Commission (CySEC), which comprises a government commissioner, a representative of the Central Bank, and three other members appointed by the Council of Ministers.

The regulatory regime aims to balance the interests of issuers and investors, by providing proper protection to local and foreign investors, without making it unduly onerous for companies to obtain and maintain a listing on the CSE.

Admission to Cyprus Stock Exchange

The CSE is the only official investment exchange in Cyprus. The roots of the CSE date to 1979 when the Cyprus Chamber of Commerce and Industry established an unofficial over-the-counter exchange to regulate the growing securities market. As a result, a dynamic market had developed by the time the CSE opened its doors.

Market Participants

Only members of the CSE holding the requisite licence from the CSE Council may exercise the profession of stockbroker. The licence is readily granted if the broker satisfies a set of prerequisites relating to educational qualifications, professional experience, and personal and financial integrity.

Types of Traded Securities

Under the Securities and Stock Exchange Law, listed public sector securities, corporate securities of listed companies, and other securities which the CSE Council has declared as Stock Exchange securities can be traded on the CSE. These securities include shares, rights, warrants, corporate bonds, government bonds, and treasury bills.

Types of Transactions

The CSE boasts advanced technology comparable with that of established overseas exchanges. Its fully automated computerised trading system (consisting of the Central Registry Depository and Clearing & Settlement System) became fully operational on 7 May 1999 under section 22 of the Securities and Stock Exchange Law and regulation 33 of the Securities and Stock Exchange Regulations.

Opening Trading Account

All securities traded under the Central Registry Depository and Clearing & Settlement System are in dematerialised form with transfers effected through a central electronic book entry system maintained at the CSE. Investors who wish to execute stock exchange transactions can do so only if they have trading accounts. There are two types of trading accounts, namely:

- A general trading account where an investor gives discretion to a member of the CSE to effect stock exchange transactions in relation to listed securities; in particular, the member is given the right to sell any security which the investor has or will have transferred to the general trading account, as well as the right to buy any security; and
- A special trading account where the investor gives discretion to a member of the CSE to purchase (but not to sell) securities which will be transferred to the depository account of the investor as soon as they are acquired; the member is not given access to those securities and does not have the discretion to sell them.

Generally, an investor can open a number of trading accounts with various brokers and for a number of different purposes including for ‘buy only’ or ‘buy/sell’ trades.

General or special trading accounts are easily opened using the prescribed form of application, namely, Form 10A for a general trading account and Form 11 for a special trading account.

A prerequisite to the opening of a trading account is the opening by the investor of a depository account, irrespective of whether or not there are any securities in the depository account. A depository account is the account in which all the dematerialised securities which an investor holds at the CSE Central Registry are recorded. A person wishing to acquire listed securities for the first time must open a depository account by application to the CSE using prescribed Form 1.

Central Registry and Depository and Settlement System

The Securities and Stock Exchange (Central Securities Depository and Central Registry) Law, 27(I) of 1996, provides for the establishment and operation of a central register for all securities listed on the Cyprus Stock Exchange, the dematerialisation of these securities, the settlement of transactions in respect of dematerialised securities, and related matters.

The Central Registry and Depository contains personal information on individual investors, details of the securities owned by them, and any changes in their shareholdings. More specifically, the Central Depository and Securities Register entails the replacement of share certificates by electronic computer records. Instead of certificates of securities, beneficiaries of registered securities are granted a certification of their status, the securities involved, and any charges they carry.

The Settlement System is the part of the Cyprus Securities Depository by which trades and transactions due for settlement are processed within the CSE. The Settlement System deals with the securities side of settlement at the individual investor level as well as the funds side of settlement at the market participant level (brokerage firms).

Security positions occur automatically within the system on the settlement date, while the settlement of cash positions between market participants and the clearing house occurs on the settlement date through the banking system. The system supports delivery versus payment settlement. There are two settlement methods which are utilised and which have as their intention the reduction of settlement risk and the enhancement of investor confidence and volume of trading. These are as follows:

- Contractual Netting Settlement — where cash is netted by a market participant who is either a net buyer or a net seller; and
- Trade-for-Trade Settlement — where each trade is settled for cash separately with no netting.

Over-the-Counter Transactions

As a general rule, the Securities and Stock Exchange Law prohibits over-the-counter trading of securities. However, certain transactions set out in section

23(1) of the Securities and Stock Exchange Law may be executed outside the CSE provided that they are notified to the CSE within three working days. To transfer securities in accordance with the Stock Exchange laws and regulations, the following must be delivered to the CSE:

- A transfer document in the prescribed form (Form 2), signed by both the transferor and the transferee;
- A form for notification of practices involving listed securities (Form 3); and
- Transaction fees payable to the CSE[9] in accordance with the Fees for Stock Exchange Transactions, Law Number 161(1) of 1999, as amended.[10]

Issuer Requirements

In General

An issuer (whether local or foreign) seeking a listing on the CSE must satisfy certain basic requirements which vary according to the market on which it intends to list its securities. These are as follows:

- The issuer must have been duly incorporated and must operate in accordance with the laws of its jurisdiction of incorporation;
- The laws of the jurisdiction of incorporation of the issuer and its constitutional documents must allow the issuer to issue the specific securities intended to be listed;
- The listing must be in respect of securities issued or proposed to be issued of the same category;
- The issuer must ensure that existing shareholders have the opportunity to take advantage of pre-emptive rights in subsequent share issues;
- The listing must relate to fully paid securities;
- The issuer must prove (to the CSE Council) that it has sufficient working capital at its disposal;
- The issuer must comply with all statutory reporting and disclosure requirements under the scrutiny of the CSE Council;
- The issuer must be in a position to deliver its register in electronic form to the Central Securities Depository and Central Registry;
- In the case of a financial services firm the application must be related to the financial services firms market;
- The issuer must provide guarantees for the protection of investors; and 9 The seller of the securities or the person notifying the sale to the Stock Exchange, as the case may be, is the party responsible for the payment of the relevant transaction fees to the Stock Exchange.

10 Laws 167(I) of 2001, 28(I) of 2002, 92(I) of 2002, 231(I) of 2002, 187(I) of 2003, 60(I) of 2005, 150(I) of 2005, 192(I) of 2007, 142(I) of 2009, 177(I) of 2011, and 87(I)/2012.

- The issuer must not undertake any obligations inconsistent with the interests of its other shareholders.

In 2008, with the implementation of the Common Trading Platform between the CSE and the Athens Stock Exchange, the market of listed companies was completely overhauled through the creation of a number of specialised markets, making the market provided by the CSE more flexible and bringing it into line with its international counterparts.

The new markets are the Main Market, Parallel Market, Alternative Market, Investment Firms' Market, Major Projects Market, Shipping Companies Market, Special Category Market, Corporate Bonds Market, and the Undertakings of Collective Investments in Transferable Securities (UCITS) Market. In late 2009, the CSE introduced an Emerging Companies Market in the form of a multilateral trading facility as defined in Council Directive 2004/39/EC.

Prospectus Requirements

Requirements under Securities and Stock Exchange Law and Regulations

The prospectus and listing particulars requirements imposed on issuers seeking a listing on the CSE closely follow the principal body of EU Directives and Regulations in this area. Prospective issuers may list their securities on the CSE by one of the following methods:

- Public offer for subscription for the purchase of shares which have not yet been issued or allotted;
- Public offer for sale of shares which have already been issued or allotted;
- Offer for sale through the introduction of shares already issued or allotted; and
- Private placement, through marketing exclusively to specific investors for the sale of shares which have already been issued or are about to be issued.

To apply for a listing, a company must submit to the Council of the CSE a signed application and a number of other supporting documents, including a suitability questionnaire, a corporate profile and, most importantly, the listing particulars which vary according to the market on which the relevant securities are proposed to be listed.

Aside from serving disclosure and screening purposes, the listing requirements are designed to help investors evaluate the assets and liabilities, financial position, and the prospects of the issuer and of the rights attaching to the securities to be listed.

In the case of initial public offerings, the level of information required for the preparation of the listing particulars is substantial: for subsequent issues these requirements are less stringent. Furthermore, the CSE Council has the discretion to wholly or partially exempt an issuer from the obligation to prepare listing particulars, under the conditions outlined in Regulatory Administrative Act 596/2005.

The degree of disclosure also varies according to the status of the issuer (general corporate issuer, an investment company, or the government), the type of placement (private or public), and the type of securities proposed to be offered (shares, rights, warrants, or bonds).

Requirements under Companies Law

The Companies Law also lays down certain prospectus requirements with regard to public issues of securities. Following the enactment of Law 99(I) of 2009, the prospectus requirements set out in sections 37–46 of the Companies Law do not apply in relation to shares or debentures to which the Public Offer and Prospectus Law[11] or the UCITS Law[12] apply.

Section 2(1) of the Companies Law defines a prospectus as any prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation offering to the public for subscription or purchase of any shares or debentures of a company. The main requirements can be found in the prospectus and allotment provisions and in the Third, Fourth, and Fifth Schedules to the Companies Law.

The prospectus provisions of the Companies Law are mainly concerned with invitations to the public to acquire shares or debentures. The definition of a public offer given in section 54 is very broad and encompasses any section of the public, whether selected as members or debenture holders of the company concerned or as clients of the person issuing the prospectus or in any other manner. This formula is not only wide but also flexible, enabling the courts to deal with each case on its own merits and in accordance with its specific circumstances. As a result, companies must comply with the prospectus requirements of the Companies Law not only in cases of direct offers for subscription or rights and conversion issues but also whenever they publish a document of any kind to the effect that they allot or agree to allot any securities with a view to their being offered for sale to the public. Therefore, the latter provision also covers offers for sale and placements unless they are of a purely domestic nature and do not involve either renounceable allotment letters or a stock exchange introduction.

The Companies Law provides that a copy of the prospectus signed by the directors must be filed with the Registrar of Companies before its issue, which must contain specific information as set out in the Fourth Schedule to the Companies Law. An abridged prospectus which does not need to comply with the requirements of section 39 and the Fourth Schedule to the Companies Law is admitted whenever shares or debentures are in all respects uniform with those already issued and quoted on a prescribed stock exchange.[13]

11 Law 114(I) of 2005, as amended.
12 Law 200(I) of 2004, as amended.
13 Companies Law, s 39(5)(b).

If a public company, on its formation or after its conversion from a private company, does not publish a prospectus or subsequent to publication does not proceed with the allotment of its securities, it is obliged to file a statement in lieu of a prospectus with the Registrar of Companies in accordance with sections 31 and 48 and the Third and Fifth Schedules to the Companies Law.

Registration of Public Offerings

When the issuer applies for the registration of a public offer for subscription for the purchase of shares which have not yet been issued or allotted, the issue must be underwritten by at least one underwriter, who may be a member of the CSE, a commercial bank, or other person approved by the CSE Council.

Public offerings are subject to full prospectus requirements to enable potential investors to make informed investment decisions based on publicly available and readily accessible information.

To be able to publish a prospectus for the introduction of shares on the CSE, the prospective issuer requires a licence from the CSE Council which, once obtained, obliges the issuer to publish the listing particulars within 15 days in at least two daily national newspapers. The prospectus also must be made available at an address in Cyprus where interested parties can obtain a copy of it.

Within 48 hours of publication, the issuer must deposit with the CSE Council three copies of the newspapers. The final step is for the CSE Council officially to announce its decision to accept the listing of the shares and to fix a date for the commencement of trading.

Registration of Placements

According to the Prospectus Law, 114(I) of 2005, which implemented EU Directives 2001/34 and 2003/71, a 'public offer of securities' is defined as a communication to persons in any form and by any means by which sufficient information on the terms of the offer and the securities to be offered is provided so that a potential investor can decide whether or not to purchase those securities.

According to section 4(1) of the Prospectus Law, no offer of securities may be made without the publication of a prospectus which has been approved by CySEC. The publication of a prospectus under the provisions of the Prospectus Law applies to the placement of securities through market intermediaries, provided that such placement falls under the definition of a public offer.

The offers to which the Prospectus Law applies are determined by elimination of the relevant exemptions set out in the Law. An offer not falling within one of the following exceptions should be categorised as a public offer to which the Prospectus Law should apply:

- Offers addressed solely to qualified or professional investors;
- Offers addressed to a limited number of persons (for the purposes of the Prospectus Law, such persons are confined to natural and legal persons not being qualified investors and not exceeding 100 in number);
- Offers addressed to investors who acquire securities for a consideration of at least €50,000 per investor for each separate offer;
- Offers whose denomination per unit is at least €50,000, provided that the same unit cannot be acquired by more than one investor; and
- Offers whose total consideration does not exceed a limit of €100,000 calculated over a period of 12 months.

Periodic Disclosure

Continuing Disclosure Obligations of Ordinary Corporate Issuers

Issuers of shares must comply with the continuing obligations set out in Regulatory Administrative Act 326/2009. The aim of placing issuers under ongoing scrutiny is to prevent the emergence of a false market where transactions in securities are effected on the basis of incorrect or outdated information. By the same token, periodic disclosure requirements protect investors by keeping them informed about the issuer's activities, current profits or losses, and future prospects.

Listed companies are under an obligation to publish half-yearly accounts, preliminary annual accounts, and annual accounts. Approved investment companies are subject to a stricter reporting regime which requires them to publish accounts on a quarterly basis in full compliance with international accounting standards.

Apart from making financial statements available to the public at large on the indicated dates, listed companies have an obligation to announce at least 10 days in advance the date on which the board of directors is to recommend payment or non-payment of a dividend, to approve financial statements, or to discuss any matter regarding the listed securities of the company concerned. In view of the sensitivity of the price of listed securities to corporate acts, companies must announce to the CSE immediately, and at least one hour before trading, decisions relating to certain matters such as new bond issues, changes to their capital structure, and amendments to their constitutive documents.

Under sections 120 and 121 of the Securities and Stock Exchange Law, any person failing to comply with the obligation to announce information in accordance with the provisions of the Securities and Stock Exchange Law or Regulations commits an offence punishable by the imposition of an administrative fine. In addition, the CSE Council may resolve to suspend the listing of the company concerned.

Exemption from Continuing Disclosure Duties

Under rule 5.2 of Regulatory Administrative Act 596/2005, the Council has the power to exempt issuers from continuing disclosure obligations as regards information which is deemed to be injurious to the issuer's interests as long as non-disclosure is not likely to adversely affect or mislead the investing public.

Disclosure Requirements under Companies Law

With the exception of share warrants, bearer shares or bearer instruments are not permitted under Cyprus law, giving investors valuable information about the status of their investments through the recording procedure for the transfer of securities and by inspection of the registers of securities.

This transparency of dealings in securities is embodied in the Companies Law,[14] in the relevant provisions of Part V of the Securities and Stock Exchange Law, and in Parts IV and V of the Securities and Stock Exchange Regulations.

Trading Rules and Trading Environment

Offerings of Securities

Once the CSE Council has approved the introduction of an issuer's securities in the market, they may be freely transferred from the current holder to any purchaser. Every transfer of listed securities through the CSE must be recorded on a transfer form.

The member of the CSE acting on instructions from the offeror (who need not necessarily be the issuer of the securities being offered) is responsible for presenting the form to the purchaser within the time limit prescribed by the Securities and Stock Exchange Regulations. Following settlement of the transaction, the member acting on instructions from the purchaser must ensure that the certificate of transfer is duly issued.

The transfer of ownership of dematerialised securities following the settlement of a transaction is effective from the time the transaction is registered on the Central Depository and Securities Register.

Rules Pertaining to Stock Exchange Transactions

Exchange transactions are executed and cleared in accordance with the provisions of the Securities and Stock Exchange Regulations. Transactions of registered securities are finalised with the issue of a certificate of transfer, which may only be issued on satisfaction of all of the following conditions:

- Deposit with the CSE of a duly executed transfer document signed by both the seller and the purchaser or their representatives;

14 Companies Law, ss 71–82 and 90–113.

- Completion of the relevant exchange transaction within the prescribed period;
- Deposit of the original share certificate (or ownership certificate) or a valid substitute for it; and
- Payment of the prescribed fees.

The certificate of transfer must bear the official seal of the CSE as evidence that the relevant transaction has been executed through it. Brokers must complete transactions during the period from the day of the execution of the transaction and the hour of the opening of market trading on the day which follows three working days during which the market is open for trading.

By 11 o'clock in the morning of the last working day of the time limit, the two brokers involved in the transaction must have reached the settlement stage of the transaction. This deadline is prescribed by the Securities and Stock Exchange Regulations and, therefore, purchaser and seller cannot agree otherwise.

As a general principle, settlement of transactions in securities through the Cyprus Stock Exchange operates on a delivery versus payment basis which also is implied in regulations 30(2), 41(1)(a), and 49(3) of the Securities and Exchange Regulations.

Regulatory Requirements Applicable to Stockbrokers

Firms acting as stockbrokers in CSE transactions are supervised by CySEC. In addition, CySEC has overall supervisory responsibility for the CSE on behalf of the Minister of Finance.

Subject to certain requirements, banks and insurance companies may be registered as stockbroker members with the CSE and obtain member status.[15] A foreign entity can be licensed as broker provided that it is established in accordance with the Companies Law. If a foreign entity wishes to undertake brokerage activities in Cyprus, it may register either a subsidiary company or a branch. In addition, foreign entities must comply with the necessary requirements of the Securities and Stock Exchange (Central Securities Depository and Central Registry) Law[16] by becoming a registered member of the CSE.

Regulatory Administrative Act 166/2005a sets statutory rules of conduct and duties for CSE members. A person who carries on the business of a broker without being registered as a member of the CSE commits an offence punishable with imprisonment, a fine, or both. The paramount duty of members is to serve the interests of their clients in good faith and in accordance with the existing laws and practice relating to the CSE.

15 Securities and Stock Exchange Law, s 31.
16 Law 27(I) of 1996, as amended (1996–2006).

The relevant committee of the CSE Council may impose an administrative fine on any member who breaches the statutory rules of conduct. In practice, disciplinary measures are most commonly imposed on stockbrokers because of repeated failure to complete a transaction within the prescribed time limit. Violations of the regulations governing the minimum paid-up capital or the required bank guarantee may lead to the suspension of the stockbroker's licence. More serious disciplinary offences are punishable by suspension from the CSE for up to 15 days or temporary or permanent removal from the register of members of the CSE.

A compensation fund to provide security for transactions on the CSE was set up by the Securities and Stock Exchange Law. The fund assists in cases where a member faces financial difficulties in meeting obligations to principals or third parties. All members of the CSE are required to contribute to the fund.

- Alternative Investment Fund Managers Law, 56(I) of 2013.

Cyprus Securities and Exchange Commission

CySEC is responsible for the supervision of the capital market, securing its smooth operation and methodical development and monitoring transactions in transferable securities taking place in Cyprus, in accordance with the provisions of the Cyprus Securities and Exchange Commission Law of 2009.

Insider Dealing and Market Manipulation (Market Abuse) Law

In General

Matters concerning the possessors of confidential information relating to financial instruments which are admitted for trading in a regulated market within Cyprus or in relation to which admission to trading has been requested from Cyprus are regulated by the Insider Dealing and Market Manipulation (Market Abuse) Law, 116(I) of 2005, as amended (the 'Market Abuse Law'). The Market Abuse Law, which transposed EU Directives 2003/6/EC, 2003/124/EC, 2003/125/EC, and 2004/72/EC, applies irrespective of whether or not the transaction itself is actually concluded in Cyprus. In 2005, CySEC issued a number of directives defining acceptable market practices:

- Directive 1-2005 regarding obligations of issuers of financial instruments;
- Directive 2-2005 regarding elements to be considered;
- Directive 3-2005 regarding market abuse methods;
- Directive 4-2005 regarding accepted market practices;
- Directive 5-2005 regarding code of conduct of directors and related persons; and
- Directive 6-2005 regarding notification of persons having managerial responsibilities for transactions.

Amendments to Market Abuse Law

In 2007, the Insider Dealing and Market Manipulation (Market Abuse) (Amendment) Law, 191(I) of 2007, amended the provisions of the Market Abuse Law relating to:

- The definition of a transaction;
- The scope of the Market Abuse Law;
- The public announcement of a transaction; and
- CySEC's cooperation and relations with its counterparts in other countries.

The amended definition of a transaction for the purposes of the Market Abuse Law includes a sale or acquisition and an agreement to sell or acquire financial instruments through an issuer, as well as the provision, acceptance, acquisition, disposal, and exercise of warrants or any other rights or obligations with the intention to acquire or dispose of a financial instrument or any other interest in a financial instrument through an issuer.

The second amendment made clear that the Market Abuse Law applies only to financial instruments that are listed on, or in respect of which an application for listing has been made to, a regulated market within Cyprus. Financial instruments listed on a regulated market outside Cyprus or in respect of which an application for listing has been made to such a market are excluded from its scope.

The third of the amendments requires persons holding a managerial position in an issuer, persons connected with it, and significant shareholders (those who directly or indirectly control five per cent or more of the issuer's shares, or five per cent or more of the voting rights attached to such shares) to disclose publicly their transactions connected with the issuer's financial instruments. Shareholders are now required to make a public announcement in relation to any transaction undertaken on their own account in connection with the issuer's financial instruments.

The final amendment requires CySEC to co-operate with the relevant authorities of other countries as well as with other organisations having the same or similar responsibilities, which include the monitoring of issuers and related persons to ensure their compliance with the relevant provisions of the Market Abuse Law, cooperation with other supervisory authorities, and the imposition of administrative sanctions. In furtherance of its duties, CySEC has the power to suspend trading of affected financial instruments, to freeze assets, and to suspend market participants' activities.

In 2012, the Insider Dealing and Market Manipulation (Market Abuse) (Amendment) Law of 2012, L. 142(I) of 2012, further amended the Market Abuse Law in order to transpose EU Directive 2010/78/EC into Cyprus law. The main change made by the amending law concerns the requirement for CySEC to cooperate with the European Securities and Markets Authority.

The Insider Dealing and Market Manipulation (Market Abuse) (Amendment) Law of 2013, L. 61(I) of 2013, further amended the Market Abuse Law in order to fully transpose Article 1, paragraph 2 of EU Directive 2004/72/EC into Cyprus law. The main change made by the amending law concerns the deletion and substitution of the Annex to the principal law by a new Annex concerning the interpretation of "close association" of one person with another person discharging managerial responsibilities within an issuer, and the amendment to the thresholds regarding publication of notice as set out in section 18 of the principal law.

Penalties for Non-Compliance

Breaches of the Market Abuse Law are punishable by administrative fines imposed by CySEC. Certain breaches also may result in criminal penalties. In addition to these sanctions, which are outlined below, the breach also may result in civil liability to compensate those who have suffered damage or loss of profit or both as a result of the act or omission concerned.

Insider Trading

Persons in possession of inside information, whether directly or indirectly, are prohibited from exploiting that information by acquiring or disposing of, or by trying to acquire or dispose of, for their own account or for the account of third parties, or through persons closely associated with them, financial instruments to which that information relates. Breaches of the prohibition regarding insider trading attract the following sanctions:

- Criminal liability punishable by imprisonment for up to 10 years, a fine of up to €171,000, or both;
- Administrative fine by CySEC of up to €855,000 (the upper limit is doubled to €1,710,000 in the event of a repeat violation); or
- Deprivation of the right to trade, directly or indirectly, in financial instruments for a period of five years from the date of the sentence.

Where the person responsible for the violation obtains a gain from the violation, exceeding the sum of the administrative fines specified above, the Commission may impose administrative fines of up to double the amount of the gain. Where a person has been deprived of the right to trade as set out above, a violation of this provision constitutes a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment for up to one year, a fine of up to €8,550, or both.

Deficiencies in Disclosure

Sections 11–14 of the Market Abuse Law impose obligations on issuers of financial instruments regarding disclosure, violations of which may result in the imposition of an administrative fine of up to €342,000 (the upper limit is doubled to €684,000 in the event of a repeat violation). A violation of section 11 also constitutes a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment for up to five years, a fine of up to €85,500, or both.

Market Manipulation

The Market Abuse Law prohibits transactions or orders to trade which give, or are likely to give, false or misleading signals about the supply of, demand for, or price of financial instruments, or which secure, by a person or persons acting in collaboration, the price of one or several financial instruments at an abnormal or artificial level. Such acts of market manipulation are punishable by a fine of up to €855,000. The upper limit is doubled to €1,710,000 in the event of a repeat violation.

Violation of the market manipulation provisions also is a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment for up to 10 years, a fine of up to €171,000, or both, as well as deprivation of the right to trade for a period of five years from the date of sentencing.

Failure to Notify Suspected Insider Dealing or Market Manipulation

A professional who reasonably suspects that a transaction or order to trade might constitute insider dealing or market manipulation must notify CySEC without delay. Failure to do so is punishable by a fine of up to €513,000 (up to €1,026,000 for a repeat violation).

Transparency Requirements Law

Scope of Law

The Transparency Requirements Law, 190(I) of 2007, as amended (the 'Transparency Law'), transposed into domestic legislation EU Directive 2004/109 on transparency requirements for listed transferable securities and, in part, Directive 2007/14, which sets out detailed rules for the implementation of certain provisions of Directive 2004/109.

The Transparency Law applies to all issuers of transferable securities listed for trading on a regulated market which have the Republic of Cyprus as their EU home member state. Transferable securities are categories of transferable securities that are traded on a stock exchange apart from instruments of payment and money market instruments. The Transparency Law does not apply to units issued by and traded in UCITS, unless they are close-ended funds.

The definition of member state of an issuer of shares or debt securities depends on whether the nominal value of the security is less or more than €1,000. In the former case, it is the location of the registered office: in the latter case the issuer may choose between the member state in which its registered office is located or a member state where its securities have been admitted to trading on a regulated market. The choice of home member state remains in place for a minimum of three years, unless the securities are no longer admitted for trading on a regulated market.

Periodic Financial Reports

Issuers must publish accurate and concise information in relation to their business performance and their assets, including annual and half-yearly financial statements and quarterly financial reports.

Continuous Reporting Obligations

An issuer is obliged to report to the public, no later than the end of the day after it was notified, the total amounts of shareholdings in it, as well as any notifications it receives from its significant shareholders (those holding more than five per cent of the issued capital) in relation to their transactions. Issuers also must notify CySEC of any change in:

- Their capital or the total amount of the voting rights attached to their shares (at the end of each calendar month);
- The rights attaching to their shares and derivatives or of any loan agreement into which they enter; or
- Their constitution.

Shareholders' Obligations

A shareholder who acquires or disposes of shares of an issuer whose shares are admitted to trading on a regulated market and to which voting rights are attached must notify the issuer and the competent authority of the proportion of voting rights held as a result of the acquisition or disposal in the event that the proportion reaches, exceeds, or falls below five per cent (the minimum threshold) and other significant holdings (10 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent, 30 per cent, 50 per cent, and 75 per cent). This notification requirement does not apply to:

- Shares acquired for the sole purpose of clearing and settling within a maximum of three days from the date of the relevant transaction;
- Persons holding shares in a custodian capacity, provided that they cannot exercise the voting rights attached to the shares except under instructions given in writing or by electronic means;
- Market makers where the proportion reaches or exceeds five per cent under certain conditions; and
- Shares acquired by the central banks of EU member states in their capacity as monetary institutions.

Special rules apply to investment firms in relation to the investment activity of portfolio management and management companies of UCITS.

Equal Treatment of Stockholders

Issuers must treat all share and bond holders of the same class of transferable securities equally in terms of data protection, the provision of information, and all other aspects of their relationship.

Miscellaneous

Information which is obliged to be disclosed under the Transparency Law and the Market Abuse Law is to be made available and safeguarded under an officially appointed set of procedures in order to ensure easier and more uniform access.

Investment Services and Activities and Regulated Markets Law

In General

The EU Markets in Financial Instruments Directive 2004/39/EC (MIFID), as amended by Directive 2006/31/EC and Directive 2006/73/EC, have been transposed into domestic law by the Investment Services and Activities and Regulated Markets Law, 144(I) of 2007, as amended (the 'Investment Services Law'). Together with Regulation 1287/2006, these Directives are intended to enhance investor protection, to develop a single market in investment services across the EU, and to promote fair and transparent integrated financial markets.

The Investment Services Law, which replaced the Investment Firms Law of 2002, implements MIFID and harmonises domestic law with the relevant EU directives regarding investor compensation schemes, capital adequacy of investment firms and credit institutions, organisational requirements, operating conditions and record-keeping obligations for investment firms, transaction reporting, market transparency, and admission of financial instruments to trading.

One of the goals of MIFID is a single passport for investment firms, banks, and stock markets to enable them to offer their services on a cross-border basis throughout the EU on the strength of home country authorisations granted on the basis of uniform prerequisites in all member states. According to section 6(5) of the Investment Services Law, the licence to provide investment services is valid in all member states, either through a branch or by simply providing services or activities in any member state.

Section 77 of the Investment Services Law recognises the reciprocal right of investment firms licensed by other member states to operate in Cyprus, provided that their activities are within the scope of the authorisation granted by the home state regulator. Section 4(2) of the Investment Services Law restricts the provision of investment services to:

- Cyprus investment firms authorised to operate under section 6(2);
- Domestic banks and cooperative societies authorised to operate under sections 118 and 122, respectively;
- Investment firms from other EU member states authorised to operate under sections 77(1) and 80(1); and
- Third-country investment firms authorised to operate under section 78(1).

Cypriot investment firms must be licensed by CySEC. Banks and cooperative societies are regulated by the Central Bank of Cyprus and the Authority for the Supervision and Development of Cooperative Societies, respectively. Business descriptions such as investment services, investment activities, regulated market, stock exchange, financial services, stock broking services, broker, or any other similar words in any language may not be used by anyone unless they are licensed according to the provisions of the Investment Services Law.

Any document, publication, or announcement issued by a Cyprus investment firm must include the number of its authorisation and a statement that it is supervised by CySEC. Investment firms must maintain a website showing at least the same information.

The Investment Services Law makes it a criminal offence punishable by a fine, imprisonment, or both, to provide investment services on a paid basis without prior authorisation. Any person found guilty of an offence may be disqualified for up to five years from providing any services regulated by the Investment Services Law. Pending trial, the activities of the person charged may be suspended.

Criteria for Granting Licence

The Investment Services Law sets out the following minimum requirements in terms of capital, management, and investor protection:

- Investment firms providing reception, transmission, execution, portfolio management, and investment advice require a minimum share capital of €200,000. For own account trading, underwriting, and operation of multilateral trading facilities, the minimum capital requirement is €1 million;
- For reception, transmission, and investment advice without handling any clients' funds, the minimum capital is reduced to €80,000. Alternatively, the firm may opt for a lower minimum capital supplemented by appropriate professional indemnity insurance;
- The management of the company must be fit and proper and there must be at least two of them (the four eyes principle);
- The identities and respective interests of the shareholders or the ultimate beneficial owners must be disclosed to and approved by the Commission;
- The company must be adequately resourced with people of the necessary integrity, good repute, skills, and knowledge to enable them to discharge their duties properly;
- The objects clause of the company's memorandum of association must provide that the company operates as an investment company providing the services detailed in its licence issued by the Commission;
- The company's head office must be located in Cyprus, and the company must be a member of the investor compensation fund; and
- Authorisation will be refused if the laws, regulations, or administrative provisions of a third country prevent CySEC from effectively exercising its supervisory functions in respect of the company.

Organisational Requirements

The Investment Services Law also includes a number of organisational requirements aimed at protecting investors' interests. As a minimum, the company must have specific and adequate policies and procedures in the following areas:

- Compliance with the legislation;
- Regulation of personal transactions;
- Protection of clients from any conflict of interest;
- Continuity of operations and services;
- Internal control;
- Proper corporate governance;
- Accounting;
- Segregation and protection of clients' funds;

- Internal audit;
- Risk management;
- Recording of instructions and transactions; and
- Prevention of money laundering.

These must be documented in an internal procedures manual with which all employees must be familiar. There are additional requirements for multilateral trading facilities (MTF) relating to the rules and procedures for trading and criteria for the execution of orders and determination of the instruments, provision of publicly available information and access to such information, access to the MTF, provision of information to users in respect of their responsibility for the settlement of transactions, and procedures to facilitate the settlement of transactions.

Authorisation under Investment Services Law

Applications for authorisation must be submitted to CySEC using the prescribed forms. Once all the required information has been submitted, CySEC must reach a decision within six months. Any decision is subject to judicial review by the Supreme Court under article 146 of the Constitution.

The authorisation will automatically lapse if the holder does not start to use it within 12 months of the date of its issue or if the holder ceases to provide investment services or carry out investment activities for six months.

There also may be a partial lapse affecting only some of the authorised activities. An authorised business may voluntarily surrender its authorisation at any time. The holder is required to inform CySEC of the circumstances and to settle any obligations arising from the discontinued business within three months.

Withdrawal of Authorisation

Section 25 of the Investment Services Law sets out the circumstances in which CySEC may withdraw an authorisation, as follows:

- If it determines that the authorisation was obtained on the basis of false or misleading details or by any other irregular means or if the holder has submitted, notified, or otherwise issued in any way false or misleading information, details, or documents;
- If the holder no longer meets the conditions under which authorisation was granted;
- If the holder has seriously or systematically infringed the operating requirements of the Investment Services Law; and
- If the holder breaches any other domestic legislation which provides for the withdrawal of authorisation.

CySEC specifies on a case-by-case basis how authorisations are (wholly or partially) withdrawn. Once an authorisation has been withdrawn, the affected activities must be discontinued immediately and the related obligations must be settled within three months of the notification of CySEC's decision. Failure to comply is punishable by an administrative fine of up to €350,000.

Where an authorisation has been wholly withdrawn, CySEC will continue to supervise the company concerned until it is satisfied that all its requirements have been complied with. CySEC also may apply to the court for the liquidation of the company and the appointment of a liquidator under the Companies Law.

Suspension of Authorisation

CySEC may suspend an investment firm's authorisation at the same time as it begins withdrawal proceedings. Alternatively, it may temporarily suspend an authorisation for up to three months (which may be extended) as a sanction short of permanent withdrawal.

An authorisation also may be suspended where there is a suspicion of breaches of the Investment Services Law or any associated regulations and directives that threaten the interests of clients or investors or the orderly operation of the capital market. The decision to suspend the authorisation may be taken by the President or the Vice President of CySEC.

Takeover Bids Law

Transposition of Take-Over Directive

Following its accession to the EU on 1 May 2004, Cyprus aligned its legislation with Directive 2004/25 of 21 April 2004 on takeover bids (the 'Take-Over Directive')[17] by means of the Takeover Bids Law, as amended, which was complemented by four directives issued by CySEC.[18]

Facilitation of Takeovers

Takeovers are facilitated by:

- The board neutrality principle — While the bid period is running, the board of the target company may not take any action potentially or actually resulting in the frustration of the bid without the prior authorisation of a general meeting of shareholders;[19]

17 Directive 1/2007 on announcing the intention or final decision to make a bid, Official Gazette 4188, Appendix III, Part I, at p 957; Directive 2/2007 on the fees payable concerning the bid, Official Gazette 4188, Appendix III, Part I, at p 960; Directive 3/2007 on the content of the bid document, Official Gazette 4188, Appendix III, Part I, at p 962; and Directive 4/2007 on the criteria for assessing the expert's independence, Official Gazette 4188, Appendix III, Part I, at p 969.

19 Take-Over Directive, art 9.

- The breakthrough rule — The rule neutralises a number of pre-bid defences such as share transfer and voting restrictions, and makes it easier for a successful bidder to replace board members of the target company and amend its articles of association;[20] and
- The squeeze-out right — The right enables a bidder who has obtained a specified level of acceptances compulsorily to acquire the outstanding securities at a fair price.[21]

Member states are free to decide whether or not to make the first two principles mandatory.[22] If they do not, member states may not preclude companies from adopting them voluntarily.[23] Companies also may be allowed to reciprocate against a bidder not bound by the board neutrality or breakthrough rules.[24]

Cyprus did not exercise the option granted by article 12 with respect to the application of article 9 of the Takeover Directive, and the restrictions on frustrating action without shareholders' approval are therefore imposed by law. Article 34(1) of the Takeover Bids Law provides that, apart from seeking alternative bids, the board of the target company may not take any action which may result in the frustration of the bid without the prior authorisation of a general meeting of shareholders. This restriction applies from the time the board becomes aware of a possible takeover bid until the bid is withdrawn or annulled.

In contrast to the board neutrality principle, the breakthrough rule is not mandatory, and its application is left to the discretion of companies. Article 35(1) of the Takeover Bids Law gives a target company with a registered office in Cyprus the reversible option of dismantling any obstacles to being taken over, by decision of a general meeting of shareholders. These obstacles are set out in sub-paragraphs 2–6 of article 35 and include restrictions on the transfer of shares, on voting rights, and on multiple-vote securities. The relevant decision of the general meeting must be immediately notified to CySEC and to the regulated markets in which the target company's securities have been or are intended to be traded.

With regard to the squeeze-out right, article 36(1) of the Takeover Bids Law provides that a bidder who has made an offer to all holders of the target company's securities for all of their securities has the right to require all the holders of any outstanding securities to sell him those securities if:

- He holds securities representing at least 90 per cent of the capital carrying voting rights and at least 90 per cent of the voting rights in the target company;[25] or

21 Take-Over Directive, art 15.
22 Take-Over Directive, art 12(1).
23 Take-Over Directive, art 12(2).
24 Take-Over Directive, art 12(3).
25 Article 15(2) of the Takeover Directive gives member states the option to set a higher threshold (up to 95 per cent) in the case referred to above, but Cyprus did not avail itself of this option.

- Following acceptance of the bid, he has acquired or has firmly contracted to acquire securities representing at least 90 per cent of the target company's capital carrying voting rights and at least 90 per cent of the voting rights comprised in the bid.

Shareholder Protection

Article 13 of the Takeover Bids Law protects shareholders' interests by requiring anyone who has built a substantial stake in a company to make a full bid. Article 13(1) obliges any person who, as a result of his own acquisition or the acquisition by persons acting in concert with him, holds securities of a company which, added to his existing holdings and those of persons acting in concert with him, directly or indirectly give him 30 per cent or more of voting rights in that company, to make a bid for the outstanding securities. Such a bid must be addressed immediately to all of the remaining shareholders for all their securities at a fair price, determined by CySEC.

Article 18(1) of the Takeover Bids Law stipulates that the fair price must be not less than the highest price paid for the same securities by the bidder or by persons acting in concert with him during the 12 months before the announcement of the decision to launch the bid. CySEC may at its full discretion permit the payment of a lower price in the case of voluntary takeover bids.

Article 37 of the Takeover Bids Law gives shareholders the right to compel a successful bidder for the company to acquire their shares at a fair price. This 'sell-out' right is exercisable under the same conditions as the squeeze-out right. If the bidder holds securities representing at least 90 per cent of the capital carrying voting rights and at least 90 per cent of the voting rights in the target company, or if, following acceptance of the bid, the bidder has acquired or has firmly contracted to acquire securities representing at least 90 per cent of the target company's capital carrying voting rights and at least 90 per cent of the voting rights comprised in the bid, the minority shareholders may require the bidder to buy their securities at the fair price set by CySEC.

Companies to Which Takeover Bids Law Applies

CySEC supervises the application of the Takeover Bids Law and the related directives where the target company has its registered office, and its shares admitted to trading on a regulated market, in Cyprus. If the target company does not have its registered office and its shares admitted to trading on a regulated market in the same member state, CySEC may oversee the bid if any of the following circumstances apply:

- The shares of the target company are admitted to trading only on a regulated market in Cyprus;
- The shares of the target company were initially admitted to trading on a regulated market in Cyprus and subsequently on a regulated market in a member state different from that in which the registered office of the target company is situated; or

- The shares of the target company have been admitted to trading simultaneously on a regulated market in Cyprus and in another member state different from that in which the registered office of the target company is situated, and the target company designated CySEC as the competent authority for the supervision of the bid, announced it to CySEC on the first transaction day, and had its decision published immediately in accordance with the rules set out in section 7 of the Takeover Bids Law.

The Takeover Bids Law regulates the issues relating to consideration of the take-over bid and the bid process if any of these circumstances apply. Issues relating to the information to be provided to the target company's employees, and company law matters, are regulated by the law and the competent authority of the member state in which the registered office of the target company is situated.

Public Offer and Prospectus Law

The Prospectus Law implements Directive 2003/71/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 on the prospectus to be published when securities are offered to the public or admitted to trading and amending Directive 2001/34/EC. Section 4 prohibits any offer of securities to the public except on the basis of a prospectus which complies with the Prospectus Law and any other relevant law and which has been approved by CySEC.

Government securities are exempt, as are non-equity securities issued by credit institutions, provided that they meet the criteria set out in section 3(2)(f) of the Prospectus Law. Certain offers (those confined to qualified investors, or to fewer than 100 investors, or where the minimum investment per investor is at least €50,000 or where the total amount raised is less than €100,000 in any period of 12 months) are not treated as offers to the public and no prospectus is required. In this case, any material information provided to one potential investor must be disclosed to all investors to whom the offer is exclusively addressed.

Breach of section 4 is a criminal offence, punishable by imprisonment for up to two years, a fine of up to €170,860, or both. In the case of a second or subsequent conviction, both the maximum penalties are doubled.

Section 8 provides that the prospectus should contain all the information necessary to enable investors to make an informed assessment of the assets and liabilities, financial position, profit and losses, and prospects of the issuer and of any guarantor, and of the rights attaching to the securities. It must comply with the relevant EU Directives regarding information contained in prospectuses as well as the format, incorporation by reference, and publication of such prospectuses and dissemination of advertisements.

The Annexes to the Prospectus Law specify the information required, which must be in a language that is readily comprehensible by potential investors.

Undertakings for Collective Investment in Transferable Securities Law

In General

The Undertakings for Collective Investment in Transferable Securities Law, 200(I) of 2004, as amended, was repealed by the Open-ended Undertakings of Collective Investments in Transferable Securities Law, 78(I) of 2012, which harmonises domestic law with EU Directive 2009/65/EC and other relevant EU Directives and legislation[26] regarding open-ended Undertakings for Collective Investment in Transferable Securities (UCITS) and their products, UCITS management companies, and the marketing of their units (the 'UCITS Law').

The UCITS Law recognises the reciprocal rights of UCITS and their management companies authorised by the relevant authorities of other EEA member states to market their products, offer their services, and operate generally in Cyprus. As the EU directives relating to UCITS are product-based rather than service-based, it is the issuer or the person providing the UCITS products who needs to be authorised and licensed. The relevant authority for authorisation and supervision is CySEC, which is vested with power to issue further directives to clarify the legislative provisions of the UCITS regime.

Recent Developments in UCITS Law

The recent amendments to the UCITS Law are designed to facilitate the provision of management services on a cross-border basis (a so-called 'management company passport' or MCP), including general improvements to the regulatory framework governing the conduct of business and risk management of UCITS; improve retail pre-contractual disclosures regarding funds; facilitate asset pooling (by means of cross-border mergers and a new concept of 'master' and 'feeder' UCITS); and streamline the steps UCITS need to take to be sold cross-border (the notification procedure).

Forms of Undertakings for Collective Investment in Transferable Securities

UCITS within the scope of the UCITS Law may take the form of either a mutual fund or a variable capital investment company, namely a company with variable capital limited by shares.

Scope of Application

The UCITS Law applies to UCITS, management companies registered in Cyprus, and their respective depositaries. A mutual fund is deemed to be domiciled in Cyprus if its management company has both its registered office and central administration in Cyprus. A variable capital investment company is deemed to be domiciled in Cyprus if it has both its registered office and central administration in Cyprus.

26 Directive 2009/65/EC, Articles 11 and 13 of Directive 2010/78/EU, and Commission Regulations (EU) 583/2010 and 584/2010.

Harmonised UCITS Authorised in a Member State Other Than Cyprus

A UCITS within the meaning of the UCITS Law registered in another member state and holding an operating licence from the competent authorities of its home member state may distribute its units in Cyprus without the need for further authorisation, subject to providing CySEC with a notification letter and the information required under paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 93 of Directive 2009/65/EC and the certifications required in section 3 of article 67 of the UCITS Law, namely its fund rules or its instruments of incorporation, its prospectus and, where appropriate, its latest annual report and any subsequent half-yearly report and its key investor information, together with confirmation that the information and documents fulfill the relevant requirements and that the UCITS fulfills the requirements of Directive 2009/65/EC.

The form and content of the UCITS notification and confirmation letter and the procedure for the exchange of information and the use of electronic communication between CySEC and the competent authorities are set out in Regulation (EU) Number 584/2010.

A UCITS originating from a member state marketing units in Cyprus is required to designate a credit institution to assure the payment, repurchase, or redemption of units of unit holders that are in Cyprus, and to make available the information that UCITS are required to provide.

Marketing Arrangements

UCITS must take adequate steps to ensure that facilities are available in Cyprus for making payments to unit-holders, for the repurchase or redemption of units, and for making available to unit-holders all the information which UCITS are obliged to provide.

Accordingly, CySEC also must be provided with written confirmation from the entity providing these facilities that it has agreed to act as the distributor of the UCITS for the marketing of its units in Cyprus, and details of the arrangements made for the marketing of the UCITS in Cyprus.

Commencement of Distribution

A UCITS may start marketing in Cyprus on notice from CySEC that its marketing arrangements comply with the provisions set out above. CySEC must respond with its final decision within two months after the date on which it receives a complete notification in accordance with the provisions or within six months in the case of a variable capital company that has not appointed a management company.

Distribution on a cross-border basis may commence as soon as the UCITS has been notified by its respective member state authority that it has communicated all necessary information to the host member state authority.

Depositary

Safekeeping of the assets of the UCITS is entrusted to the Depositary, which effectively acts as treasurer of the UCITS.

Depositary duties may be undertaken by a credit institution with a registered office in Cyprus or one established in another member state with a branch in Cyprus, provided always that it is capable of providing depositary and custody services in accordance with the relevant licence and provided it meets the requisite standards with respect to infrastructure and organisation.

Distributors of UCITS Units

Distibution of units is undertaken by the management company or the UCITS itself. The management company or the UCITS, as the case may be, may distribute units through a credit institution, investment firm, or other investment company including the management company, provided that the distributor complies with the requirements of the Investment Services and Activities and Regulated Markets Law and all other Directives issued by CySEC pursuant to the UCITS Law.

Prospectuses, Periodical Reports, and Summarised Statements

The management company for each mutual fund or variable capital company must prepare, submit to CySEC for approval, and publish the following in the prescribed form under the UCITS Law:

- A prospectus;
- An annual report in respect of every financial year;
- A report for the first six months of every financial year;
- A summarised income statement and balance sheet at the end of the first, second, and third quarters of the financial year; and
- A summarised statement of the assets and expenses at the end of the financial year, which includes a profit and loss account and the distribution of profits for the whole financial year.

Publication of Other Information

The net asset value of the UCITS, the number of units, the unit net asset value, and the unit issue and redemption prices must be calculated every working day by the management company or the investment company and made public the day after the next business day in at least two national daily newspapers or by any other additional means as CySEC may determine from time to time pursuant to specific provisions of the UCITS Law.

Non-Harmonised UCITS

There is no legal framework in Cyprus providing for the establishment or incorporation of UCITS that do not fall within the scope of the UCITS Law, ie, non-harmonised UCITS.

However, CySEC has issued directives regarding the establishment of non-harmonised UCITS domiciled in an EU member state and UCITS of third countries in Cyprus and the marketing of their products in Cyprus.

International Collective Investment Schemes Law

In General

The UCITS Law does not apply to international collective investment schemes (ICIS), which instead are subject to the International Collective Investment Schemes Law, 47(I) of 1999 ('the ICIS Law'). An ICIS is a body of a specified form (see text, below) whose sole object is the collective investment of the funds of the unit-holders.

The units of the scheme are redeemed or repurchased directly out of the assets of the scheme at the option of unit-holders, unless otherwise provided by the ICIS Law, any other applicable law, or the constitutional documentation of the scheme. The ICIS Law provides for the designation of three types of ICIS, namely ICIS marketed to the public, ICIS marketed to experienced investors, and private ICIS having a maximum of 100 investors. The policy of the Central Bank of Cyprus ("CBC"), which is currently responsible for regulation and supervision of ICIS, is to accept applications only for private ICIS on the grounds that public funds are supervised by CySEC as UCITS.

Forms of Schemes

An ICIS may take one of the following forms:

- An international investment limited partnership;
- An international unit trust scheme;
- An international fixed capital company; or
- An international variable capital company.

All four legal types of scheme can be of limited or unlimited duration. The ICIS Law is to be amended so as to transfer responsibility for supervision of ICIS from the CBC to CySEC. Applications to the CBC for schemes are currently suspended and only applications for private schemes are being accepted.

Private Schemes

A private international collective investment scheme is defined as a scheme which by its constitutional documentation:

- Restricts the right to transfer its units;

- Limits the maximum number of unit-holders to 100;
- Prohibits any invitation to the public to subscribe for any units of the scheme; and
- Prohibits the issue of bearer units.

Private schemes are obliged to appoint a custodian (which must be a Cyprus bank), unless specifically exempted from this requirement by the CBC. Private schemes which do not have a physical presence in Cyprus also must appoint a company to carry out the administrative work of the scheme; the company must be based in Cyprus and be approved by the CBC. On approval, the CBC provides the applicant with a recognition letter with certain conditions attached to it.

Marketing of Units in Private Schemes

A private scheme is prohibited from inviting the public to subscribe for any of its units. However, the ICIS Law provides that an invitation to an experienced investor does not constitute an invitation to the public.

Experienced Investors

Under the ICIS Law, any person, natural or legal, may be regarded as an experienced investor if that person provides financial services to the public or frequently enters into investment transactions which, on average, are of a substantial size and the person, having regard to all relevant facts, can reasonably be expected to appreciate the risks inherent in investment transactions.

An ICIS designated to be marketed to experienced investors must contain in its constitutional documentation and offering memorandum clearly defined rules and procedures to ensure that marketing of the ICIS is restricted to persons who fall within the definition of experienced investors.

AIFMD

The EU Alternative Investment Fund Managers Directive ("AIFMD") must be transposed into the national laws of EU member states and in operation by 22 July 2013. The AIFMD regulates the hedge, private equity, and alternative investment fund industry in Europe. It imposes organisational, management, and systems requirements on alternative investment fund managers who are either domiciled in the EU or which manage investment funds domiciled in the EU ("AIFM").

The AIFMD permits AIFM that are authorised in accordance with the requirements of the directive and that manage EU-domiciled investment funds (and, from July 2015, non-EU-domiciled investment funds) to market those funds to "professional investors" on a pan-European basis. From 2015, the AIFMD will permit investment managers domiciled outside of the EU, but which are registered with an EU "reference state" and comply with the requirements of the Directive, to market those funds to "professional investors" on a "passported" pan-European basis.

The AIFMD allows (but does not compel) each EU member state to permit (until July 2018) a non-EU investment manager (that is, a manager that is not domiciled in the EU and which does not manage a fund domiciled in the EU) to market its fund to professional investors in that member state on a private placement basis, but only where the non-EU investment manager (and fund) complies with specified pre- and post-sale transparency requirements, including the requirement for the fund to have an audited annual report.

The AIFMD was transposed into Cyprus domestic law on 5 July 2013 by the Alternative Investment Fund Managers Law, Law Number 56(I) of 2013. This fully harmonises Cyprus law with the AIFMD, the provisions of which are essentially mirrored in the domestic law.

CySEC has issued a series of consultation papers regarding the proposed legislation for Alternative Investment Funds (AIFs) and Collective Investment Schemes with Limited Number of Persons and regarding proposed Directives for the implementation of the new legislation. When the new legislation is enacted, it will, in conjunction with the AIF law, establish the legal framework regulating alternative investment funds in Cyprus. New ICIS will be governed and regulated under the AIF law and responsibility for regulation and supervision of existing ICIS will be transferred from the Central Bank of Cyprus to CySEC. The ICIS Law will most likely be gradually repealed subject to any transitional periods for existing ICIS.

Introduction

Regulatory System

The structure of market supervision in Germany is complex because market supervision is divided among the federal (Bund), state (Bundesländer), and (stock) exchange levels.[1] The federal government has passed all relevant securities legislation for which it is competent. The state governments generally have the duty to enforce and monitor compliance with federal laws, unless a statute specifically provides otherwise. New legislation is usually drafted and tabled by the federal administration. As the consent of the Federal Council (Bundesrat), the Upper House of the German Parliament, is normally required, the state governments also are involved in the legislation process.

German Capital Markets were reformed by the Fourth Financial Markets Promotion Act taking effect from 1 July 2002. The Act particularly aims at:

- Strengthening the position of the German stock exchanges and their participants in European and international competition;
- Ameliorating the business opportunities of investment funds;
- Strengthening the protection of investors; and
- Ameliorating the efficiency of supervision of, inter alia, credit institutions.

Other legislation enacted with substantial impact on German Securities Law includes:

- The Act for the Improvement of the Competitiveness of German Groups on the Capital Markets and for Simplification of Receiving Shareholder Loans (Gesetz zur Verbesserung der Wettbewerbsfähigkeit deutscher Konzerne an Kapitalmärkten und zur Erleichterung der Aufnahme von Gesellschafterdarlehen/Kapitalaufnahmeerleichterungsgesetz — KapAEG) of 20 April 1998,[2] allowing the ultimate parent of a group of companies to draw up consolidated financial statements and consolidated business reports for the group in accordance with internationally recognised accounting principles (eg, IAS or United States–GAAP) rather than with the German accounting standards;

2 The Act for the Improvement of the Competitiveness of German Groups on the Capital Markets and for Simplification of Receiving Shareholder Loans of 20 April 1998, Federal Law Gazette (BGBl I) of 23 April 1998, at p 707.

- The Act for the Control and Transparency in the Area of Enterprises (Gesetz zur Kontrolle und Transparenz im Unternehmensbereich — KonTraG) of 27 April 1998,[3] bringing changes to the rules under which companies may buy back their own shares which they may now do in an amount of up to 10 per cent of the company's stated capital;
- The Act for the Introduction of the Euro (Gesetz zur Einführung des Euro/Euro-Einführungsgesetz — EuroEG) of 9 June 1998,[4] coming into force on 1 January 1999 and implementing basic changes in the banking and finance area in preparation for the third stage of the European economic and monetary union;
- The Act for Implementation of the European Community Deposit Protection Directive and the European Community Investor Compensation Directive (Gesetz zur Umsetzung der EG-Einlagensicherungsrichtlinie und der EG-Anleger-Entschädigungsrichtlinie),[5] coming into force on 1 August 1998 and requiring for first-time credit institutions and investment firms engaging in securities trading to become members of investor compensation schemes which are newly established by the Act as special funds of the German Federal State (Bund) under the Kreditanstalt für Wiederaufbau (KfW);
- German Act to modernise the law of obligations (Gesetz zur Modernisierung des Schuldrechts) of 26 November 2001;
- German Act to Regulate Public Tender Offers for the Purchase of Securities and Company Take-Overs (Gesetz zur Regelung von öffentlichen Angeboten zum Erwerb von Wertpapieren und von Unternehmensübernahmen) of 20 December 2001;
- Law regarding an integrated Financial Supervision (Gesetz über die integrierte Finanzdienstleistungsaufsicht) of 22 April 2002; and
- The Transparency and Disclosure Act (Gesetz zur weiteren Reform des Aktien- und Bilanzrechts, zur Transparenz und Publizität, Transparenz- und Publizitätsgesetz) of 19 July 2002.

Legal Sources

There is no single securities statute in Germany. Instead, the relevant provisions concerning the German capital markets and securities are found in numerous laws and regulations, including:

- The Banking Act (Kreditwesengesetz);
- The Securities Trading Act (Wertpapierhandelsgesetz);
- The Stock Exchange Act (Börsengesetz);
- The Exchange Admission Regulation (Börsenzulassungsverordnung);

3 Act for the Control and Transparency in the Area of Enterprises, Federal Law Gazette (BGBl I) of 30 April 1998, at p 786.
4 Act for the Introduction of the Euro, Federal Law Gazette (BGBl I) of 15 June 1998, at p 1242.
5 Act for Implementation of the European Community Deposit Protection Directive and the European Community Investor Compensation Directive, Federal Law Gazette (BGBl I) of 22 July 1998, at p 1842.

- The Sales Prospectus Act (Verkaufsprospektgesetz); and
- The Sale Prospectes Regulation (Verkaufsprospektverordung).

To date, Germany has implemented a number of European Union (EU) Directives on capital market regulations, including:

- The Issuance Directive;[6]
- The Transparency Directive;[7]
- The Admission of Securities to Official Stock Exchange Listing Directive;[8]
- The Listing Particulars Directive;[9]
- The Disclosure Directive;[10]
- The Public Offer Prospectus Directive;[11]
- The Insider Dealing Directive;[12]
- The Money Laundering Directive;[13] and
- The Capital Adequacy Directive.[14]

Authorities

In General

Supervision over the securities markets is organised on the federal, state, and stock exchange levels.

Functional Separation of the Supervising Authorities

In General. There are three major supervising authorities in the area of banking and securities regulations, namely:

- The Federal Financial Supervisory Authority (Bundesanstalt für Finanzdienstleistungsaufsicht — BaFin);
- The state exchange supervisory authorities of the different states (Börsenaufsichtsbehörden der Bundesländer); and
- The trading supervisory departments (Handelsüberwachungsstelle) of each of the stock exchanges.

13 European Community Directive 91/308/EEC, 10 June 1991, OJ L 166/77.
14 European Community Directive 98/31/EEC, 22 June 1998, OJ L 204/13.

The separate functions of the BaFin, the state exchange supervisory authority, and the trading supervisory departments are examined below.

Banking Supervision. The BaFin supervises the German credit institutions and investment firms. The regulations concerning the jurisdiction of the BaFin are set forth in the Banking Act. Because the acquisition and disposition of securities on behalf of others, the safekeeping and administration of securities for others, as well as investment transactions qualify as banking business under the Banking Act, the BaFin also has jurisdiction over the securities business of credit institutions and investment firms. The BaFin is in charge of inter alia:

- Granting and revoking admission for credit institutions and investment firms;
- Assessing the personal reliability and professional qualification of the managers and non-acceptance of the managers;
- Monitoring the ownership structure of banks;
- Compliance with information and periodic disclosure duties;
- Supervising the economic and financial situation of credit institutions and investment firms, including their liquidity and profitability; and
- Prosecuting illicit banking activities and investment services.

Securities Trading Supervision. The regulations concerning the jurisdiction of the BaFin with regard to the supervision of securities trading are set forth in the Securities Trading Act. The market supervision of the BaFin focuses, in particular, on:

- Compliance with the conduct of business rules applicable to credit institutions and investment firms;
- The prevention of insider dealings;[15]
- Compliance with immediate disclosure duties of issuers;
- Compliance with the disclosure rules for shareholders (transparency); and
- Compliance with the duty to publish securities sales prospectuses in case of public offers in respect of securities not admitted on the Official Market (amtlicher Markt) or on the Regulated Market (geregelter Markt) of a stock exchange.

The BaFin serves as depository agent for securities sales prospectuses. The BaFin's jurisdiction is not limited to transactions executed on the organised market segments but also covers transactions in the unregulated over-the-counter market. Furthermore, the BaFin represents the German regulators in matters of international co-operation.

15 Market participants, ie, credit institutions and brokers, are required to report all transactions executed within one day to the BaFin regardless of whether such transactions were performed for their own or a third party's account, as provided by section 9 of the Securities Trading Act. The BaFin analyses the information so obtained to determine if there are indications of insider trading. Once any suspicion arises that insider trading has taken place, the BaFin passes the case to the competent public prosecution department.

State Exchange Supervisory Authorities. The state exchange supervisory authorities traditionally had exclusive jurisdiction for the supervision of securities trading. Notwithstanding the creation of the BaFin, the state exchange supervisory authorities still remain responsible for the supervision of the transactions executed on the (state) stock exchanges. While prior to the enactment of the Securities Trading Act, the Bundesländer were restricted to supervising merely the legality of the trading, they now also supervise the orderly and proper execution of the transactions.

Trading Supervisory Departments. The trading supervisory departments (Handelsüberwachungsstelle) monitor the day-to-day business on the exchanges. The trading supervisory departments supervise:

- Price quotation;
- Proper performance of transactions; and
- Conduct of market participants.

They collect and analyse all available data and information about transactions executed on the stock exchanges, thus monitoring the day-to-day business on the stock exchanges. The trading supervisory departments are obliged to:

- Record stock-market transactions and their settlement systematically and completely;
- Analyse the relevant data; and
- Conduct investigations.

The trading supervisory departments conduct investigations when insider trading is suspected and decide whether to inform the BaFin. They report immediately to the management of the stock exchange and the state exchange supervisory authorities if they discover that exchange rules were violated or actions were committed which might interfere with orderly exchange trading. In addition, the head of the relevant trading supervisory department is obliged to report on a regular basis to the competent state exchange supervisory authority. The head of the relevant trading supervisory department is appointed by the supervisory board of the stock exchange (Börsenrat) in agreement with the state exchange supervisory authority.

The state exchange supervisory authorities may give instructions to the trading supervisory department of the stock exchange and take over investigations conducted by the latter at any time. The BaFin, in turn, may give instructions to the state exchange supervisory authorities, in particular if urgent measures need to be taken against insider trading. As exchange brokers qualify as investment firms, the Federal Banking Supervisory Authority has jurisdiction to supervise their solvency.

Other Authorities

German Central Bank. The German Central Bank (Deutsche Bundesbank or Bundesbank) is an integral part of the European System of Central Banks (ESCB). The Bundesbank, which maintains nine regional offices in the German federal states, participates in the performance of the ESCB's tasks with the primary objective of maintaining price stability, ensures the orderly execution of domestic and cross-border payments and contributes to the stability of payment and clearing systems. Therefore, the Bundesbank has jurisdiction in matters relating to the securities market if they have an impact on currency policy. The Bundesbank regularly monitors banks' business. Banks are required to supply the Bundesbank with monthly statements about significant developments and provide figures, and the Bundesbank prepares statistics on market developments. Further, banks have to report loans exceeding a certain threshold to the Bundesbank. If the Bundesbank comes to know of any failure by a bank to comply with its duties, it forwards this information to the BaFin.

Securities Board. The Securities Board (Wertpapierrat) is established with the BaFin. The Securities Board assists the BaFin in its supervising functions and consists of one representative of each of the federal states. Members of the Ministry of Finance, the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Economic Affairs and Technology and members of the Bundesbank may also attend its meetings. The main function of the Wertpapierrat is to advise the BaFin about:

- The issuance of rules and regulations;
- The effect of supervision measures on the exchange and market structure and competition; and
- Delimiting competences of the BaFin and the exchange supervisory authorities and questions of co-operation.

Supervisory Board of the Stock Exchange. Each German Stock exchange is required to establish a Supervisory Board (Börsenrat) that consists of up to 24 persons. The Supervisory Board's main tasks are to:

- Enact the by-laws and the fee regulations of the respective exchange;
- Appoint and remove members of the managing board of the respective exchange;
- Supervise the managing board of the respective exchange; and
- Enact the business terms and conditions applicable to the transactions executed on the respective exchange.

Co-Operation and Flow of Information among Regulators

In General. Although the responsibilities and jurisdictions for the various areas of the capital markets' matters are split, all the authorities are required by law to co-operate closely.

BaFin and the Bundesbank. The BaFin and the Bundesbank inform each other about observations and findings relevant for the performance of the relevant other side's duties. The BaFin is entitled to use data submitted to the Bundesbank for statistical purposes.

BaFin and Foreign Regulators. Co-operation with the competent authorities outside Germany covers operations in securities, derivatives, money, and currency markets.

Trading Supervisory Department and BaFin. The trading supervisory department must inform the BaFin if it comes to know of information which would be relevant for the BaFin to fulfil its duties (in particular, with respect to insider dealings or stock- and market price manipulations).

Trading Supervisory Department and Foreign Regulators. The trading supervisory department may also transfers information on transactions to foreign authorities competent for supervising foreign exchanges, and it may receive from them data necessary for orderly execution and settlement of exchange transactions. The trading supervisory department must inform the state exchange supervisory authority, the management board of the exchange and the BaFin of the foreign addressee and the type of data it intends to submit.

The management board of the relevant exchange may:

- Suspend market participants based outside the member states of the EU or EEA from trading on the exchange for a term of up to six months; or
- Revoke their admission completely, if the compliance with the duty to provide information pursuant to the Securities Trading Act or the obligations with regard to insider dealings or market price-manipulations is not guaranteed with the competent authority of the state where such a market participant is located.

Legal Order and Regulatory Interests

Admission

Market Participants

German Exchanges. Traditionally, there are basically two categories of market participants on German securities exchanges, namely:

- Credit institutions; and
- Financial services institutions (Finanzdienstleistungsinstitute).

Brokers which solely act as intermediaries between the credit institutions and which are divided into two categories — exchange brokers (Skontoführer) and free brokers (Freimakler) — also qualify as financial services institutions under the Banking Act.

Credit Institutions. In Germany, no clear distinction is made between commercial and investment banking. The Banking Act provides for a list of regulated banking activities and financial services. A credit institution or financial services institution may be licensed for one, several, or all of those banking activities or financial services. Banks holding a full banking licence are permitted to engage in all areas of banking, including securities transactions (all-round banking, Universalbankenprinzip). German banks are the traditional market participants.

German branches of EU credit institutions which fulfil the prerequisites of the 'single passport' regime under the Banking Directive[16] also may act as dealers in Germany without needing further authorisation from the German regulators. They are, in principle, only subject to home member state supervision. German regulators, however, supervise the liquidity of such branches as well as their compliance with the regulations enacted to protect public interests.

Only 'EU credit institutions', as defined in the Banking Directive, qualify for the single passport. Once a credit institution is authorised to conduct these business activities in the EU or EEA member state where it has its registered office, it may apply to its competent authorities for the single passport. Notably, subsidiaries of non-EU/EEA banks having their seat in an EU/EEA member state which hold a banking licence also may qualify as EU credit institutions.

To establish a branch in Germany, the EU credit institution must apply to its competent authority, stating the services it intends to provide in Germany, outlining its proposed programme of operations, and providing the names of the persons responsible for managing the branch. The competent authority is required to notify the BaFin within three months and to inform the applicant about the notice. After a maximum of two months from receipt of this information from the home member state authorities, the applicant may commence its passported business in Germany.

Financial Services Institutions under the Investment Services Directive. The BaFin has jurisdiction over investment firms as competent authorities. Inbound EU investment firms holding a single passport under the Investment Services Directive may carry on their activities without being required to obtain any further authorisation in Germany. In particular, inbound EU investment firms are exempted under the single passport regime from the requirement of obtaining a German banking licence even if their activities would otherwise qualify as banking business under the Banking Act. This is most significant as, of the 'core services' listed in section A of the Annex to the Investment Services Directive, securities business qualifies as banking business under the Banking Act. While domestic firms and branches of foreign (non-EU) investment firms require a banking licence before they may conduct any such business, outwardly passported EU investment firms do not require a German banking licence if they are authorised to conduct these activities in their home member state.

Pursuant to the Investment Services Directive, EU member states are required to ensure that investment firms can, directly or indirectly, become members of or have access to the regulated markets in their host member states. Both the Frankfurt Stock Exchange (Frankfurter Wertpapierbörse) and EUREX acknowledge this obligation and allow branches of outwardly passported investment firms to become members subject to the same requirements applicable to domestic firms.

Brokers. The Fourth Financial Markets Promotion Act brought fundamental changes to the price determination system on German stock exchanges and to the structure of brokers. The relevant price on German stock exchanges is determined either by use of an electronic trading system or by enterprises admitted for the determination of stock exchange prices which are called 'exchange brokers' (Skontoführer). Pursuant to German law, two type of brokers exist: exchange brokers and free brokers.

Exchange brokers may be credit institutions or financial services institutions. Exchange brokers and persons acting on behalf of exchange brokers are admitted by the managing board of the relevant stock exchange. The appointed exchange broker is obliged to carry out the brokerage and the trade of exchange transactions in the securities allocated to him. The exchange broker must conduct his business in an impartial way.

Free Brokers. Free brokers are admitted to the stock exchange by the relevant managing board. A free broker does not fulfil any public function. He may act in the name of his customer or in his own name. Free brokers may trade in all three market segments of a stock exchange.

Transborder Electronic Trading Systems. In 1990, the Frankfurt Stock Exchange introduced new electronic trading systems, providing for the decentralised, remote access to these systems. Today, two electronic trading systems for benchmark products, EUREX and XETRA, are based in Frankfurt, Germany. Both electronic trading systems cater for remote members from abroad who may become remote members of EUREX or XETRA, while being subject to practically the same requirements as domestic firms.

EUREX. In 1998, the German Futures and Options Exchange, formerly known as DTB (Deutsche Terminbörse), and the Swiss Futures and Options Exchange SOFFEX merged to create EUREX. The operational and technical merger of the two markets was completed on 28 September 1998. Since then, all DTB and SOFFEX participants have been united on a common trading and settlement platform and the newly established EUREX clearing house has commenced its activities. EUREX is purely a computer exchange and clearing system. EUREX allows direct decentralised access of foreign participants who have their official seat in a state party to the Convention on the European Economic Area, in Switzerland or, since 1996, in the United States.[17] To facilitate access to EUREX outside of Germany and Switzerland, access points have so far been installed in Finland, France, the Netherlands, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States. Currently, approximately 700 locations worldwide are connected to EUREX.

17 DTB was the first foreign exchange authorised by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) to install trading terminals in the United States.

EUREX membership generally is open to any company fulfilling the following requirements. The company applying for EUREX membership must:

- Engage in securities trading and provide evidence that it is subject to supervision by a banking or supervisory authority in the country of origin;
- Provide to EUREX evidence of the personal qualification and reliability of the persons acting on behalf of the company (ie, the directors of the company);
- If not a credit institution, provide evidence of a paid-up equity capital of at least €50,000;
- Admit and register at least one exchange trader;
- Fulfil the technical requirements of EUREX;
- Participate in the clearing process, either as a General Clearing Member or Direct-Clearing Member, or by entering into a clearing agreement with a General Clearing Member as a Non-Clearing Member; and
- Keep at its disposal IT installations ensuring the orderly processing of trading and settlement through the exchange's electronic system.

All EUREX Members are required to participate in the clearing process as:

- A General Clearing Member (GCM) — A general-clearing licence authorises to clear both members' transactions as well as those of their clients and Non-Clearing Members. All GCMs must have a minimum capital of €125 million and provide a clearing guarantee of at least €5 million.
- A Direct-Clearing Member (DCM) — A direct-clearing licence only authorises to clear a member's own transactions as well as those of its clients. All DCMs must have a minimum capital of €12.5 million and provide a clearing guarantee of at least €1 million.
- A Non-Clearing Member (NCM) — The settlement for the Non-Clearing Member is governed by an agreement to be concluded with a General-Clearing Member.

EUREX currently accepts financial institutions located within the European Union or Switzerland authorised to operate custody business, credit operations and receipt of margin by customers in the form of securities and cash as General Clearing Members or Direct Clearing Members.

XETRA. Xetra is the electronic trading system for the cash market of the Frankfurt Stock Exchange. It was introduced on 10 June 1997, replacing the former IBIS system for share trading and has been continuously updated. The latest updates were made on 1 August 2002 (Release 7) and on 27 March 2003 (introduction of the CCP — the central counter party for the cash market). In the future, XETRA will be enhanced continuously. Through XETRA, investors are able to trade all equities listed on the Frankfurt Stock Exchange. Xetra grants access to almost 6,000 securities from countries world wide and maintains approximately 90 per cent of the market share for all stocks traded in Germany. This includes all securities contained in the DAX, MDAX, TecDAX, SDAX, XTF, and XETRA STARS as well as other stocks, such as shares from the European indices, the Dow Jones Stoxx 50, the Global Titans 50, and all liquid German government bonds and Jumbo bonds. The minimum trading size for all instruments on XETRA is one share.

Since its introduction, XETRA has almost entirely replaced floor trading in Germany. In accordance with this development, under the provisions introduced by the Fourth Financial Markets Promotion Act, the respective stock exchange may decide at its sole discretion whether the trade will be performed entirely or partly by an electronic trading system and whether there will be an additional price determination by exchange brokers.

Admission to the Frankfurt Stock Exchange or another German securities exchange is required for direct participation in XETRA. Banks, securities trading firms, and brokerages can apply for admission. The main prerequisites are:

- Activity in commercial trading operations in securities;
- Designation of a person who is authorised to manage the business operation and has experience and knowledge in the securities business;
- Status as qualified stock exchange traders;
- Maintenance of an account with the Landeszentralbank in Hessen and with Clearstream Banking AG or instruction of such an accountholder to process transactions on the participants' behalf;
- Compliance with the technical guidelines provided by Deutsche Börse Systems AG; and
- Conclusion of an XETRA connection agreement.

Development. From the start, both the electronic trading systems experienced steady growth in the number of exchange participants. This growth is bolstered primarily by small firms and specialists from abroad. In contrast, the number of exchange participants admitted to floor trading has been stagnant for years, probably because, in the medium term, decentralised access to the markets is more practical and cost effective. Electronic links are by far cheaper than maintaining staff, premises, information technology installations, and the like on the spot for participation in floor trading.

Furthermore, by providing simpler access to the capital markets in Germany, all German electronic trading systems nurture a growing market for German securities and related products. The share of crossborder trading in the overall volume traded in Germany is high in bonds, derivatives and equities. With its electronic trading systems, the Frankfurt Stock Exchange is a powerful supplier of computerised services for all German stock exchanges.

Designated Sponsor. Since October 1998, credit institutions or investment firms being admitted as market participants may be assigned as designated sponsors for one or more securities being traded on Xetra, the electronic trading system of Deutsche Börse AG. For one security, one or more designated sponsors may be admitted. Designated sponsors will ensure a higher liquidity by giving binding prices for the bid and ask side. Except for the stocks listed in the DAX, designated sponsors may be admitted for all shares listed at the Frankfurt Stock Exchange. If supported by a designated sponsor, a security may be traded continuously instead of being traded in one daily auction only. Securities being listed in the DAX 30, Dow Jones Stoxx 50, Dow Jones Euro Stoxx 50 and the 100 top turnover stocks traded in Xetra may be traded continuously without a designated sponsor.

Securities

National Treatment and Reciprocity. Issuers incorporated in another jurisdiction enjoy national treatment and can list on the German stock exchanges. The listing requirements that apply to foreign issuers in practice are identical to those applicable to domestic issuers. However, securities listed by foreign issuers also must comply with the applicable laws of the issuer's jurisdiction and be freely transferable. Germany has implemented the mutual recognition regime set forth in the Public Offer Prospectus Directive and the Listing Particulars Directive. German regulators and stock exchanges, therefore, do recognise prospectuses which are prepared and approved by the relevant regulator or stock exchange in another EU or EEA member state to be used 'inward', on the basis of mutual recognition, to publicly offer or list securities in Germany. The applicable statutory provisions and the question as to which authority is competent to review and approve of the prospectus depend on whether the offeror seeks listing of the securities (see text, below).

Securities Offerings. Under section 1 of the Securities Sales Prospectus Act, any person publicity offering securities for sale on the domestic German market which are not admitted for trading on a domestic stock exchange must publish a sales prospectus in the German language, unless certain exemptions as set forth in sections 2–4 of the Sales Prospectus Act apply or unless a prospectus for such securities has already been published in accordance with the Securities Sales Prospect Act.

Exemptions. Pursuant to section 2 of the Sales Prospectus Act, the offeror does not need to publish a sales prospectus if the securities:

- Are offered for sale only to persons who, for professional or commercial reasons, acquire or dispose of securities for their own or someone else's account (ie, market participants and institutional investors);
- Are offered for sale to a limited class of persons (ie, private placement exemption);
- Are only offered for sale to employees by their employer or by a company associated with the employer (eg, stock option plans and stock purchase plans);
- Can only be acquired in minimum denominations of at least €40,000 or at an aggregate purchase price of at least €40,000 per investor or if the aggregate price for all securities offered for sale does not exceed €40,000; or
- Are part of an issue or securities for which a sales prospectus has already been published in the German market.

Section 3 of the Securities Sales Prospectus Act constitutes certain exemptions for specific issuers. Among others, a sales prospectus does not need to be published if the securities:

- Are issued by an EU or EEA member state or one of its regional administrative authorities or an international public institution to which at least one EU or EEA member state is party; or
- Are debt securities publicly offered by issuers, including banks and investment firms within the meaning of the Banking Act or the Kreditanstalt für Wiederaufbau, or passported branches of EU credit institutions or EU investment firms, which offer debt securities continuously or repeatedly ('constant issuers'). It should be noted, however, that formerly the Federal Securities Trading Commissions followed a very narrow interpretation of the term 'debt securities' under this exemption. Certain equity-linked instruments (ie, so-called reverse convertible notes, which also contain an option element on a specific equity instrument) do not qualify as 'debt securities', and cannot be distributed without an approved sales prospectus.

Section 4 of the Securities Sales Prospectus Act provides for certain exemptions from the prospectus requirements for specific securities, including, but not limited to, those which are:

- 'Euro-securities', which comprise all securities within the meaning of section 1 of the Securities Sales Prospectus Act, including warrants if such securities are not subject to a public advertisement, not offered door-to-door, and are acquired or offered to be acquired and distributed by a syndicate whose members are not based in the same country, a substantial proportion of which are not offered in the country in which the issuer has its seat, and may only be subscribed to by, or initially acquired through, an eligible credit institution or other eligible financial institution; and
- Debt securities with an agreed maturity of less than one year.[18]

Interpretative Statements. The former Federal Securities Trading Commission published several Official Statements ('Statements') on the interpretation of certain terms of the Sales Prospectus Act, including the following:

- Securities — The term 'securities' in the Securities Sales Prospectus Act has a rather broad meaning. It comprises all transferable instruments or security rights which, by their nature, can be traded on a market. Transferable securities within this definition are shares and other tradable securities equivalent to shares, debt instruments, or other tradeable securities equivalent to debt instruments, as well as any other tradeable financial instrument enabling the acquisition of such securities, either by way of subscription or by way of conversion or exchange, or which entitles to a cash payment. The term 'securities' also includes warrants and certificates of participation, both of which are treated as individual classes of securities. Foreign securities which meet the above criteria are subject to the provisions of the Securities Sales Prospectus Act, irrespective of their classification in their country of origin.

- Public offer — Generally, an offer is deemed to be public if it is directed at the general public and is designed to solicit purchase orders from its addresses. An offer is deemed not to be public if it is directed at a limited group of persons consisting of persons who are individually known to the issuer, approached by the issuer, selected on the basis of individual criteria, and who do not need, in view of their specific knowledge, disclosure by way of a sales prospectus. It is, however, not sufficient for the definition of a limited group of persons that the offer is directed at an unspecified group of persons, an occupational group, or clients who are not further individualised. A public offer, is any form of media or postal advertising directed at the general public which solicits purchase orders. Publications will not constitute a public offer if they are limited to general information about the issuer or its enterprise and/or issues planned in the future. The same applies to information conveyed via electronic dissemination systems and internet publications. A 'Roadshow' where information about the issue is presented to mostly institutional investors is to be considered a public offer if the presentation includes information and price data in relation to a particular security to be issued.

Public offers are 'domestic' offers, if they are targeted at potential investors within the area of application of the securities Sales Prospectus Act. While the Statement fail to comment on whether advertisements in foreign newspapers constitute public offers under the Sales Prospectus Act, this is likely to be the case if and to the extent the newspapers publishing such advertisements, are distributed to the general public in Germany. In the case of internet publications, it is likely that they may constitute, in addition to being public offers under the Securities Sales Prospectus Act, unauthorised offers of securities or investment advisory activities in other jurisdictions, in particular in the United States and the United Kingdom.

The establishment of a personal relationship with the potential investor through the offer itself does not constitute an exemption under the Sales Prospectus Act because such a relationship must be already existing prior to the offer. In view of this requirement, it is unclear whether private placements may be marketed via a net of intermediaries since, in such cases, the issuer (and not the respective intermediary) is the offeror of the securities. Thus, it would not be sufficient if an intermediary has a personal relationship with an investor. The publication of subscription rights in the context of a capital increase in a stock corporation does not constitute a public offer if it is clearly directed only to existing shareholders as a limited class of persons.

Inclusion in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market (Freiverkehr) on one of the regional stock exchanges without any advertising (except the publication of a reference to the quotation and the publication of information about the relevant security to be issued) does not constitute a public offer. Presumably, this also covers the trading of securities in the free market, which would mean that such trading would also not be deemed a public offer. In a book-building process, a public offer generally starts with an invitation to submit a subscription offer at the beginning of the offer period. The pre-market phase in which the issuer or the offeror identify interest from possible investors and determine the basis for the pricing of the securities is not seen as a public offer. Under the Sales Prospectus Act, the 'offeror' is the person responsible for the public offer of the issue, ie, not necessarily the issuer itself. Especially in the context of underwriting consortiums, the offeror will be the party who, under the underwriting agreement, assumes the responsibility or risk for the issue vis-à-vis third parties. Thus, it is likely that the BaFin will regard an acquirer of privately placed securities who offers them publicly for the first time as the 'offeror' of such securities and as the person responsible for the publication of the prospectus.

Procedures. Prior to its publication, the sales prospectus must be submitted to the BaFin. The BaFin is obliged to keep the contents of the sales prospectus confidential. It, however, will determine whether the written document constitutes a sales prospectus in accordance with the applicable provisions of the Securities Sales Prospectus Act. A sales prospectus which has been submitted is treated differently according to whether an application has been made, but not approved, in respect of the relevant securities for admission to the Official Market or the Regulated Market on a domestic stock exchange.

If an application for admission to the Official Market has been filed, but has not been approved, and the securities are to be publicly offered for the first time, a sales prospectus must be published in accordance with the procedural rules set forth in section 9, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Securities Sales Prospectus Act. Such a prospectus must be approved by the listing office of the relevant stock exchange prior to the public offer or the listing of the relevant securities, but it need not be submitted to the BaFin. In the event that an application for admission to the Regulated Market has been filed but has not yet been approved and published in accordance with the Stock Exchange Admission Regulation and the exchange regulations of the relevant stock exchange, and the applicant wants to offer the relevant securities to the public, the applicant must submit to the BaFin a sales prospectus drafted in accordance with the Securities Sales Prospectus Act and the Sales Prospectus Regulation. When submitting the sales prospectus to the BaFin, an offeror should inform the BaFin about the following:

- When and in which nationwide newspaper approved by the relevant exchange the sales prospectus will be published, or a notice to that effect will be given; only shortly before the date of the public offer, provided that the sales prospectus indicates how such information will be made available subsequently and provided further that such additional information is published in accordance with the Securities Sales Prospectus Act. An incomplete sales prospectus must indicate that it is incomplete. Non-verified fictitious data may not be used. Instead, the incomplete sales prospectus must indicate any gaps there may be with respect to certain terms and conditions. As to the definition of the phrase 'certain terms of the issue', the BaFin takes a very restrictive view. The phrase 'certain terms of the issue' only applies to such terms and conditions of an issue which, because of their special nature, can only be determined shortly before the offer is made public, such as issue price, interest and maturity;

- When the notice (under section 9, paragraph 3, of the Sales Prospectus Act) will be published in the Federal Gazette (Bundesanzeiger); and
- The date of the first public offer.

According to section 9, subsection 3 of the Securities Sales Prospectus Act, the notice has to contain information about where the sales prospectus can be found on electronic information systems (eg, the internet) if the sales prospectus is being published in this manner.

If the sales prospectus is to be published in an nation-wide newspaper approved by the relevant stock exchange, the date on which such a newspaper is published is deemed to be the publication date with regard to the securities. With respect to multiple-day issues (eg, the Friday–Saturday edition of the Handelsblatt, or special holiday editions), the first day of such editions will be deemed the date of publication. The deadlines may be met either by depositing the sales prospectus in the 'deadline mailbox' of the BaFin or by telefax transmission of the sales prospectus. A telefax transmission is only sufficient if:

- The telefax is identical to the original sales prospectus;
- The telefax contains the signatures of the issuer; and
- The original sales prospectus is submitted thereafter to the BaFin without undue delay.

The sales prospectus must be published at least one full business day[19] prior to the public offer. Hence, if a sales prospectus is published on a Monday, then the corresponding public offer may not be made before Wednesday of that week. A notice under the Securities Sales Prospectus Act which needs to be published in the Federal Gazette should be timed as closely as possible to the date of publication of the sales prospectus. If a book-building process takes place, the sales prospectus must be published one full business day before the start of the offer period during which investors may submit their subscription bids. It is recommended to describe the chronology of the book-building process in the sales prospectus.

Incomplete Sales Prospectus. An incomplete sales prospectus may be published without certain terms of the issue in cases where such terms can be determined only shortly before the public offer, provided the sales prospectus indicates how such information will be made available subsequently and provided further that such additional information is published in accordance with the Sales Prospectus Act. Incomplete sales prospectuses must indicate that they are incomplete. Non-verified fictitious data may not be used. Instead, the incomplete sales prospectus must indicate any gaps there may be with respect to certain terms and conditions. As to the definition of the phrase 'certain terms of the issue', the BaFin has taken a very restrictive view. The phrase 'certain terms of the issue' only applies to such terms and conditions of an issue which, because of their special nature, can only be determined shortly before the offer is made public.

19 Saturday is deemed to be a business day for this purpose.

In the case of an incomplete sales prospectus for the issuance of warrants, such incomplete sales prospectus must contain a general description of the underlying instrument given (eg, whether the underlying instruments are shares, indices, currencies, commodities, interest rates, or futures).

The BaFin accepts the accumulation of several incomplete sales prospectuses in one document. In the case of shares or bonds, the market segment (Official Quotation, the Regulated Market, or the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market) on which such securities are traded must be described. In addition, in respect of bonds, the incomplete sales prospectus must identify the issuer. Finally, in respect of foreign exchanges, the currency zone must be indicated.

Supplementary information to the incomplete sales prospectus must be submitted to the BaFin as soon as it is available and must be published on or before the date of the public offer under the Securities Sales Prospectus Act. In the event that the publication is made by way of a public notice stating where the supplementary or complete sales prospectus is available, such notice must be made for each submission of supplementary information to the BaFin. All supplementary information is deemed to be a part of the relevant public offer and must be submitted to the BaFin, either through its 'deadline mailbox' or by telefax transmission. Any reference to future supplementary information is prohibited. The supplementary information must be clearly identified as such, and it must be linked to the respective incomplete sales prospectus as well as to all other supplementary information in respect of the same prospectus. Different filings of supplementary information may be combined in one publication if appropriately designated. The BaFin will not raise objections against the distribution of a sales prospectus made up of a former incomplete sales prospectus and attached supplementary information, provided this contains the same information for the investor as a complete sales prospectus for the investor.

It has always been controversial whether the former Federal Securities Trading Commission and the Federal Financial Supervisory Authority have exceeded the authority given to them by the Securities Sales Prospectus Act. Under the Sales Prospectus Act, the former Federal Securities Trading Commission was, and the BaFin is, only authorised to sanction if a sales prospectus is intentionally or negligently not (or not in due time) published or submitted to the regulator. The regulator does not have the authority to sanction the publication or submission of a sales prospectus if it contains inadequate or incorrect information. Rather, whether a sales prospectus is adequate and correct or not, is a question to be answered in the compensation claim of an investor.

Mutual Recognition. If no application to list the securities for Official Quotation or a Regulated Market has been filed, the Federal Financial Supervisory Authority has jurisdiction. The offeror must file with the BaFin:

- The prospectus and a translation thereof into the German language;[20] and 20 The BaFin may waive the translation requirement in whole or in part if the prospectus is written in a language which is not uncommon for securities trading in Germany. For the time being, only prospectuses in the English language may be used. The BaFin does not acccept prospectuses in any other European language.

- A confirmation from the competent authority of the home member state approving of the prospectus.

In the case of mutual recognition, the offeror must deposit the prospectus with the BaFin prior to its publication and publish the prospectus either in a transregional exchange journal (eg, Börsen-Zeitung) or by making it available at the offices of the paying agent named in the prospectus.

If an application for admission to list the securities for Official Quotation or a Regulated Market has been filed, but not yet approved, and the securities are to be offered publicly for the first time, the listing office (Zulassungsstelle) of the relevant official exchange or listing committee (Zulassungsausschuß) of the relevant regulated market has jurisdiction, respectively. The listing office or listing committee, as the case may be, is required to approve of the prospectus without any further review, provided that:

- The prospectus and a translation thereof into the German language have been filed;[21]
- The prospectus had been approved by the competent authority of the home state and a confirmation of approval has been filed; and
- The home state authority had not derogated or waived any prospectus requirements.

The offeror must publish the prospectus once it has been approved either in a transregional exchange journal (eg, Börsen-Zeitung) or by making it available at the offices of the paying agents named in the prospectus.

Listing Requirements. Different listing requirements are applicable to listings on the Official Market, on the Regulated Market, or on the Regulated Over-the- Counter Market (Freiverkehr).

Listing on the Official Market. The procedure and prerequisites for listing securities on the Official Market of a German stock exchange are governed in particular by sections 30–48 of the Stock Exchange Act and the Stock Exchange Admission Regulation. Application for listing on the Official Market must be filed with the listing office (Zulassungsstelle) of the relevant stock exchange by the issuer jointly with a credit institution admitted to trading on a German stock exchange as listing sponsor. If the issuer is itself a credit institution, the issuer may file the application alone. The application for listing must be made in writing and contain:

- The name and place of business of the issuer;
- The type of securities to be listed;
- The nominal value of the securities; and 21 The listing office may waive the requirement that a translation be filed in whole or in part if the prospectus is written in a language which is not uncommon for securities trading in Germany (only English language prospectuses are accepted).

- The official mandatory stock exchange journal (Börsenpflichtblatt) wherein the application will be published (eg, Börsen-Zeitung).

The issuer must state whether:

- It filed a similar application in the past;
- It made application at the same time at another stock exchange in Germany or in another member state of the EU or EEA; or
- Such an application will be filed in the near future.

The application must be published in the Federal Gazette and in the official mandatory exchange journal and announced at the stock exchange where the securities will be listed. The application must be accompanied by a listing prospectus which contains the information required under the Stock Exchange Act and Exchange Admission Regulation to enable the public to correctly evaluate the issuer and the securities. Admission will be granted no earlier than three working days after the first publication of the application. Securities admitted to trading may be introduced to the stock exchange, ie, the price quotation may commence on the next day after the first publication of the prospectus or, if the issuer is exempted from publishing a listing prospectus, after publication of the admission.

In cases of compliance with all formal requirements, the securities will be admitted to trading, unless there are circumstances known under which the admission of the securities would lead to fraud or misrepresentation to the public or would damage a material public interest. Bonds or notes issued by the federal government, its special asset facilities, a state, or a member state of the EU or EEA are per se admitted to the Official Market of any domestic stock exchange. Shares of an issuer having its registered seat in a state outside the EU or EEA and which are not officially listed in such a state or in the state where the shares are mainly distributed may only be admitted if the issuer can show that listing there was not withheld to protect the public.

Securities must be issued in accordance with the laws applicable to the issuer, and they must comply with the statutes and regulations applicable to such securities which must be freely transferable. In the case of shares, their estimated fair market value or, if an estimation is not possible, the stated capital of the issuer, must be at least €1,250,000, unless shares of the same class have already been listed on that stock exchange. If securities other than shares are to be listed, the total nominal value must be at least €250,000. If the securities have no par value, the minimum number of such securities must be at least 10,000. However, the listing office may exempt the issuer from these requirements if it believes that a sufficient market for the securities will emerge.

The par value of securities, in particular small par values and the number of securities issued, must meet the needs of orderly exchange trading and the public. The application for admission of shares must relate to all shares of the same issue. However, the application need not comprise shares which are part of a holding to maintain control over the issuer or which may not be traded for a certain time, provided that it is unlikely that the partial admission of the shares will be to the detriment of potential investors. In case of partial admission, the listing prospectus must state that admission is filed for only a part of the issue and the reasons therefor; if a listing prospectus need not be published, the public must be informed of the partial admission in another appropriate way. An application for admission of securities other than shares, however, must always cover all securities of the same issue.

Shares must be sufficiently distributed among the public (free float) in one or more member states of the EU or EEA. A sufficient free float is deemed to exist if:

- At least 25 per cent of the total nominal value of the shares subject to the listing or, if the shares have no par value, 25 per cent of the number of certificates have been acquired by the public; or
- The number of shares of the same class is so large and their distribution to the public so broad that orderly trading on the Stock Exchange is warranted.

Notwithstanding the above requirements, shares may be admitted if:

- The issuer intends to, and the listing office believes that the issuer will, achieve sufficient distribution within a short period of time after introduction of the securities on the stock exchange;
- Shares of the same class have already been listed on an official market within the EU or EEA, and sufficient distribution will be achieved by taking into account the total number of shares issued; or
- The shares have been listed on an official market outside the EU or EEA and sufficient distribution to the public has been achieved in these states.

An issuer seeking a listing for Official Quotation must have existed as a business operation for at least three years and must disclose the annual financial statements for the three years preceding the filing date of the application. The listing office may exempt the issuer from the three-year period requirement if the entities that comprise the business of the issuer existed for at least three years and pro forma statements are submitted.

In respect of securities not fully paid in, the listing office may admit:

- Securities which are not fully paid in, if exchange trading will not be adversely affected thereby, the listing prospectus explicitly states that payment had not been made in full, and it indicates the applicable procedure or, if a listing prospectus needs to be published, the public had been informed that payment in full had not been made; and
- Shares requiring a consent for the transfer of title, provided that such requirement for consent does not adversely affect orderly exchange trading.

Subscription rights or convertible securities may only be admitted if the securities to which the conversion or subscription rights relate are already admitted to trading on a domestic stock exchange or are included in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market or will be admitted or included concurrently. The listing office, however, may admit such rights or securities if the securities to which the conversion or subscription rights relate are admitted to trading on an organised market within the EU or EEA, and the public can regularly obtain the price quotation for these securities from the foreign markets. The listing prospectus must contain information about how the public in Germany can obtain such information.

Certificates representing shares may be admitted if:

- The issuer of the shares represented by the certificates has signed the application for admission;
- The issuer has complied with the requirements applicable to the issuer and the minimum amount requirement;
- The issuer has submitted to the listing office a written covenant stating that it will comply with the duties that are usually imposed on issuers of listed shares;
- The certificates comply with the general conditions applicable to securities; and
- The issuer of the certificates covenants that it will comply with its obligations to certificate holders.

If the certificates represent shares of an issuer having its place of business in a country outside the EU or EEA and if the shares are not listed on an official market of a stock exchange in such country or in the country where the shares are mainly distributed, the applicant must demonstrate that a listing in that country was not omitted to protect the public.

If certificated securities are issued they must be printed at a standard which provides adequate protection against forgery and falsification and facilitates easy and safe execution of transactions. In the case of securities of an issuer with its place of business in another member state of the EU or EEA, it suffices that the securities are printed in compliance with the regulations of that state. If the printing standards do not provide sufficient protection against forgery and falsification, the prospectus must contain a notice to that effect; if a prospectus need not be published, the public must be informed appropriately.

Delisting. On request of the issuer, the admission office may delist the issuer. Delisting may, however, not be contrary to investors' interests. Further regulations for delisting are contained in the exchange rules of the respective stock exchange.

Listing on the Regulated Market. Listing on the Regulated Market (geregelter Markt) is, in essence, regulated by the exchange rules of the respective stock exchange. In particular, the exchange regulations contain rules about the procedures for admission. Although each stock exchange has its own exchange regulations, the rules applicable for listing on the Regulated Market do not differ substantially. The listing office (Zulassungsstelle) of the relevant stock exchange decides on the listing on the Regulated Market. The application must be filed by the issuer together with a credit institution admitted to trading on a domestic stock exchange. If the issuer itself is such a credit institution, it may file the application alone. The exchange regulations contain provisions under which the managing board of the stock exchange may allow enterprises other than credit institutions to apply together with the issuer for admission of the securities. Securities will be admitted to the Regulated Market if:

- The issuer and the securities comply with the formal requirements necessary for orderly trading on the stock exchange; and
- The application is accompanied by a business report for publication signed by the issuer.

Admission is refused if circumstances are known under which admission of the securities would mislead the public or would substantially damage public interest. Bonds issued by the federal government, its special funds, a state, or another member state of the EU or EEA are per se admitted to the Regulated Market on any domestic stock exchange, unless they have been admitted to the Official Market.

Securities will be admitted to the Regulated Market if the issuer and the securities comply with the formal requirements necessary for orderly trading on the stock exchange. Further, the application must be filed together with a business report for publication containing information regarding the issuer and the securities in order to enable potential investors to take an informed decision concerning an investment in the securities. The business report must, as a minimum requirement, contain the information required for a prospectus in a public offer of securities.

Mutual Recognition. Listing particulars prepared in another European Union or EEA member state may be used 'inward', on the basis of mutual recognition, to list securities on an official exchange in Germany if the following requirements are met:

- The issuer being domiciled in another EU or EEA member state has filed a listing application simultaneously or nearly simultaneously both on an exchange in its home member state and on an official exchange in Germany;
- The prospectus and a translation thereof into the German language has been filed with the listing office of the relevant exchange;[22]
- The prospectus has been approved by the competent authority of the home member state and a confirmation of approval has been filed with the listing office; and
- The home member state authority had not derogated or waived any prospectus requirements.

The listing office may require additional information to be included in the prospectus, inter alia, with regard to domestic paying agents, the German income tax system, and the method of notification of investors. These rules apply mutatis mutandis if an application for listing of the securities on the Regulated Market is made.

Trading participants may apply for inclusion of securities on the Regulated Market. This allows securities to be included and traded on the Regulated Market at facilitated conditions without the need for a listing. To be eligible for inclusion in the Regulated Market securities must already be listed on:

- An official market or regulated market in Germany;
- An organised market in the EU or EEA;
- An organised market in a third country with similar listing and transparency rules; or
- Where an exchange of information with the respective supervisory authorities is ensured. Further, no facts must be known that might lead to damage to investors or public interests.

Inclusion in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market. Securities which are not admitted to the Official Market or the Regulated Market or included in the Regulates Market or the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market (Freiverkehr) must not be traded on the exchange floor during the business hours of the stock exchange, and the making of an open outcry for securities not listed or included is prohibited. The stock exchanges may only allow over-the-counter trading in securities which are not admitted to the Official Market or to the Regulated Market, provided that there are trading regulations in force that ensure that trading and settlement will be conducted in an orderly manner. Such regulations, as well as the conditions precedent for inclusion and the applicable procedures, are set out in the Guidelines for Regulated Over-the-Counter Trading (Richtlinien für den Freiverkehr) of the respective stock exchanges.

On application, securities may be included in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Markets of the respective stock exchanges. The conditions precedent for inclusion as well as the applicable procedures are set forth in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market Guidelines of the respective stock exchanges. The rules set out below are based upon the Frankfurt Regulated Over-the-Counter Market Guidelines as enacted by Deutsche Börse AG (sponsor to the Frankfurt Stock Exchange), which also decides upon the inclusion of securities in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market of the Frankfurt Stock Exchange.

The application for inclusion must be filed by an enterprise that has unlimited admission to trading on the Frankfurt Stock Exchange. The issuer will be notified by Deutsche Börse AG of the intended inclusion. The inclusion will not take place if the issuer objects unless the issuer has its seat in a member state of the EU or EEA or other countries specified in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market Guidelines (inter alia, Canada and the United States). The application for inclusion must contain an exact designation of the securities and information on the domestic or foreign organised markets where prices for such securities are already quoted. For securities for which such quotes are not available, the applicant must provide further information on the issuer in form of an Exposé. For inclusion purposes, the applicant must determine a paying and depositary agent within Germany. The applicant must ensure orderly trading on the stock exchange requiring the applicant, inter alia, to immediately inform Deutsche Börse AG of forthcoming shareholders' meetings, dividend payments, changes in the capital structure and other information substantially affecting the evaluation of the securities or the issuer.

Listing of Futures and Options on Stock Exchanges. The execution of futures and options contracts on a stock exchange requires the admission by the managing board in accordance with the exchange regulations of the relevant stock exchange. Prior to admission, the managing board of the stock exchange must determine the terms and conditions for such trade and, in the case of commodities, the managing board must in each case hear the expert opinion of representatives of the business circles concerned. Admission of securities to exchange futures and options trading may only be granted if the total number of underlying securities subject to such trading attains a nominal value of at least €5 million. Futures in shares of a German company may only be admitted to exchange futures and options trading if the issuer has given its consent.

At the request of the issuer, the admission will be revoked, provided that such request is made to the managing board within one year of admission. In the event that the price for exchange futures and options contracts is subject to the official price quotation, the quotation procedures which apply to securities also apply to the futures and options transactions. In the event that stock exchange futures and options trading is executed on an exchange in a form that deviates from the terms and conditions set forth by the managing board, or if commodities or futures or options are traded which are not admitted to exchange futures trading, the managing board must order such trading to stop and exclude the relevant dealer from making use of the facilities of the stock exchange. On exclusion, price lists for such transactions may not be published or disseminated as copies.

Introduction of Products on EUREX. The management of EUREX has discretion to decide on the products to be admitted for trading on EUREX. Prerequisites for the 'introduction' of any derivative product are that orderly trading in such product is ensured and that the market-maker function is fulfilled. 'Product' means any option or future contract relating to a certain base value; 'base value' means the respective 'object' to which such contract relates. The resolution of the management to the introduction of new products must be published. In contrast to the listing on a stock exchange, there is no specific right for an applicant to have particular products listed on EUREX and, naturally, there are no issuers. The futures contracts are synthetic products.

If it is necessary for the protection of the public, the management board of EUREX may revoke or suspend the admission of certain products, in particular if the quotation of a security to which the contracts relate has been suspended on the stock exchange. During such suspension no orders or quotes may be entered into the system and the positions may not be liquidated. Any existing orders and quotes will be cancelled. The re-commencement of trading in suspended contracts starts with the pre-trading period. The management, however, may decide otherwise. The management may exclude effective delivery in respect of futures contracts if this is necessary for orderly trading. In this case, all rights and obligations are deemed to be fulfilled with the last payment at the end of the term for such contract. The management also may exclude the exercise of options related to shares and provide for settlement in cash instead of actual delivery. The amount to be paid is then to be determined according to the difference between the average of the opening, cash market and closing prices, and the basis prices of the option multiplied by the number of shares to which the option relates.

Prospectus Requirements. Prospectus requirements are imposed for listing on the Official Market and for listing on the Regulated Market.

Listing on the Official Market. The Exchange Admission Regulation requires that an information sheet, the listing prospectus, or 'listing particulars', complying with the disclosure requirements of the Exchange Admission Regulation and a prescribed format, be filed and approved for admitting securities to be listed on the Official Market on any securities exchange in Germany. Matters to be disclosed include, inter alia, information concerning:

- The parties responsible for preparing the listing particulars and auditing the financial statements;
- The securities and the listing application;
- The capitalisation of the issuer;
- The issuer's principal business activities, including a breakdown of net turnover by category and geographical markets for the past three years, material contracts, patents, licences, legal proceedings, employees, and investment policies;
- The issuer's assets and liabilities, financial position, and profits and losses;
- The issuer's administration management and supervision, including remuneration, unusual transactions, and equity interests; and
- Recent developments and prospects of the issuer.[23]

The listing office may grant an exemption in whole or in part from the duty to publish listing particulars for admission to the Official Market if the securities concerned:

- Were subject to an initial public offering or were issued in connection with a public tender offer, a merger, a split, an acquisition of all or part of the assets of a company, or as consideration for contributions in kind, provided a written description was published in Germany within 12 months prior to admission;[24]
- Were distributed to the owners of shares listed on the Official Market on the same stock exchange through an increase in the stated capital of the issuer from retained earnings;
- Were issued as shares through the exercise of conversion or subscription rights attached to other securities provided that the shares of the company whose shares are offered for conversion or subscription are listed on the Official Market on the same stock exchange;
- Were issued in lieu of shares listed on the Official Market of the same stock exchange, unless the issuance of such new shares is linked to a change in the stated capital and the 23 Different disclosure requirements apply to bonds and shares.

24 The description must (a) be available to the public at the places of business of the issuer and the paying agents; and (b) supply all information that would have to be disclosed in a listing prospectus (all information which has occurred since the preparation of such a description which has a material effect on the evaluation of the issuer and the securities must be published in accordance with the publication procedure for a listing prospectus).

information required to be given in respect of shares was published in accordance with the publication procedure for sales prospectuses;

- Have been admitted to the Official Market of another German stock exchange and a listing prospectus was published for such securities;
- Are shares and their number, estimated fair market value or par value or, if the shares have no par value, their fair market value, is less than 10 per cent of the number or value, as the case may be, of shares of the same class listed on the Official Market on the same stock exchange, provided the issuer has complied with the publication requirements for the admission; shares which differ only as to the date for accrual of the dividends are deemed to be in the same class;
- Are issued to employees, if shares of the same class are listed on the Official Market on the same stock exchange;[25]
- Are issued in consideration of a waiver, in part or in full, by the personally liable partners of a limited partnership based on shares, of their rights to the profits under the articles of the partnership, provided shares of the same class are listed on the Official Market on the same stock exchange;[26]
- Are bonds or notes issued by legal entities which (a) have their place of business in a member state of the EU or EEA, (b) conduct their business under a state monopoly, and (c) have been established by a specific statute or by virtue of a specific statute or are regulated by such statute, or bonds or notes for which the payment of interest and principal is unconditionally and irrevocably guaranteed by a member state of the EU or EEA or one of the federal states of such member state, if any;
- Are bonds or notes issued by legal entities other than companies, such legal entities having their place of business in a member state of the EU or EEA and which were established by a specific statute, provided the sole purpose of such legal entities is to raise capital under governmental supervision by issuing bonds or notes to finance the production of goods or the rendering of services, the bonds or notes of which, for purposes of admission onto the Official Market, are treated under the law of their home country as being legally equivalent to bonds or notes issued by the government or for which the government guarantees payment of interest and principal; and
- Are certificates representing shares issued in exchange, unless this is accompanied by a change in the stated capital, provided certificates representing such shares are listed on the Official Market on the same stock exchange and provided further that information about the number and type of securities to be admitted and the terms for their issuance are published in the same manner as that for a listing prospectus.

The listing office may allow certain information to be omitted from the listing or to be published in a summarised prospectus for admission to the Official Market only if the securities concerned are, by reason of their characteristics, only purchased normally by 25 Shares which differ only as to the date for accrual of the dividends are deemed to be in the same class.

26 Any shares which differ only as to the date of accrual of the dividends are deemed to be in the same class.

sophisticated investors who usually trade such securities among themselves, unless such information would have been material to these investors. The listing office may further allow information to be omitted from a listing particular which would otherwise be required, if it believes that:

- Such information is not material and not likely to influence the evaluation of the net worth, the financial situation and earnings, and the prospective business development of the issuer;
- The dissemination of such information would be contrary to the public interest; or
- The dissemination of such information would cause substantial damage to the issuer, provided omission does not mislead the public about any material information.

If an application for listing to the Official Market has been filed, the listing prospectus, prior to its publication, must be approved by the listing office of the stock exchange where the application for listing was filed. If the issuer filed its application at several domestic stock exchanges, the issuer may appoint one of the listing offices to be competent for granting such an approval. The listing office must decide on approval within 15 stock exchange days after receipt of the listing particulars. Furthermore, the listing office monitors that the duties of the offeror are complied with and must issue a certificate approving the listing prospectus on request of the offeror.

If securities also are to be publicly offered in another member state of the EU or EEA, the offeror must forward a draft of the listing prospectus to the competent authorities of that other state. The listing offices co-operate with the competent authorities in the other member states of the EU or EEA, according to their competencies, and forward to each other the necessary information, as long as confidentiality is observed. Insofar, the members and employees of the listing offices are released from their duty to secrecy. If securities to which subscription rights are attached are subject to the offering by an issuer having its place of business in another member state of the EU or EEA and having its shares listed on an official market in this state, the listing office, prior to its decision, must obtain a statement from the competent authority of that other state.

If the securities of an issuer having its place of business in another member state of the EU or EEA are to be offered publicly simultaneously or almost simultaneously both in that state and domestically, the listing office must approve the listing prospectus without passing on its contents if the listing prospectus were approved by the competent authority of that other state, provided it has received a translation of the prospectus in the German language and a written confirmation from the competent authority of that other state that it has approved the prospectus. If the competent authority of the other member state of the EU or EEA had granted an exemption for certain information or had permitted deviations from otherwise statutorily prescribed matters, the listing office will only approve the listing prospectus if:

- The exemption or deviation also is permissible under the German laws and regulations on listing particulars;
- The same circumstances which justified the exemptions also exist within Germany; and

- The exemption or deviation is not subject to any further contingency which would cause the listing office to refuse the exemption or deviation.

Issuers who have been admitted to listing in a regulated domestic market for at least two years may be exempted from issuing a listing prospectus when applying for admission to the Official Market. In this respect, issuers which have been officially listed on a recognised exchange in the EU or EEA for at least three years may be allowed to be listed in Germany on the basis of abbreviated listing particulars without having to publish a full prospectus. Moreover, the prospectus verification is limited to one listing authority, and a foreign language prospectus is accepted by the relevant listing office without translation, provided certain conditions are met. Currently, the Frankfurt Stock Exchange accepts foreign language documents only if they are drafted in the English language. Languages from other EU member states are not accepted.

No listing prospectus for the admission of shares to the Official Market is required if the relevant shares have been listed for at least two years on the Regulated Market of a domestic stock exchange. No prospectus must be published if securities of a foreign issuer have already been listed on the Official Market on a stock exchange in another EU or EEA member state for at least three years and certain further requirements are met. If securities are to be listed simultaneously on more than one domestic stock exchange, the issuer may select the listing office which shall be competent to approve of the listing prospectus.

Listing on the Regulated Market. An issuer seeking listing on the Regulated Market must publish a so-called 'business report'. The business report must contain all material information on the factual and legal situation of the issuer and the issue and must be correct, complete, and signed by the applicant. In particular, information about the development of the issuer, the current business situation, and the business prospects, as well as the latest published financial statements, must be provided. The business report needed for listing on the Regulated Market must be submitted in the German language. In the case of a listing on the New Market, the business report also must be published in the English language.

An issuer of securities listed on another domestic stock exchange either on the Official Market or on the Regulated Market is exempted from submitting a business report, in the case of debt securities, if less than three years, and, in the case of securities other than debt securities, if less than six months, have elapsed since the latest publication of the business report or listing prospectus, as the case may be. The exchange regulations may provide for other circumstances under which an issuer is exempted from submitting a business report, provided the public can be adequately informed otherwise.

Prospectus Liability. In the case of listed securities, no prospectus liability exists unless the relevant securities were acquired within six months from the date of commencement of trading on a German stock exchange. The same applies mutatis mutandis to securities not admitted to trading on a stock exchange: no prospectus liability exists unless the relevant securities were acquired within six months from the date when the securities had been publicly offered for the first time in Germany. The statute of limitations for prospectus liability is three years. Investors are not required to prove in litigation cases that they relied on the prospectus when investing in the relevant securities or that they still hold the securities. Further, investors also are entitled to reimbursement of their acquisition costs.

Corporate Governance. In general, the corporate action required for the issuance of securities is governed by the law of the country in which the company is incorporated. The issuance of bonds by a German issuer in the form of a stock corporation (Aktiengesellschaft) constitutes a management decision and, therefore, requires the approval of the management board (Vorstand). The articles of association (Satzung) may provide for the approval of the supervisory board (Aufsichtsrat). Bonds which provide holders with a conversion right or stock warrant (Wandelschuldverschreibungen) and bonds in which the rights of the holders are related to dividends paid to shareholders (Gewinnschuldverschreibungen) may only be issued on the basis of a resolution by the shareholders' meeting, which requires a majority of not less than three-fourths of the share capital being represented at the passing of such resolution. The articles of association may provide for a different capital majority and additional requirements. The management board may be authorised for a period of not more than five years to issue convertible bonds.

A capital increase of a stock corporation needs an amendment to the articles of association by the general shareholders' meeting (Hauptversammlung), and it must be registered in the Commercial Register (Handelsregister). Each shareholder is entitled, on demand, to subscribe to new shares in proportion to his holdings in the existing share capital (Bezugsrecht). Pre-emptive rights may be excluded in whole or in part only in the resolution on the share capital increase and the relevant resolution requires, in addition to the requirements prescribed by law or the articles of association for such capital increase, a majority of not less than three-fourths of the share capital being represented at the passing of such resolution. The articles of association may provide for a larger capital majority and additional requirements. In particular, the exclusion of pre-emptive rights is permitted if a capital increase against contributions in cash does not exceed 10 per cent of the share capital and the issue price is not materially below the stock exchange price.

Authorised capital (genehmigtes Kapital) requires a shareholders' resolution amending the articles of association, and it must not exceed 50 per cent of the existing issued and outstanding capital. The authorisation is given for a maximum period of five years from registration of the authorised capital in the commercial register. The management board is authorised to issue the new shares with the consent of the supervisory board.

The shareholders' meeting may also authorise an increase of share capital conditional on conversion rights or stock warrants obligating the stock corporation to issue new shares being exercised (contingent capital increase, or bedingte Kapitalerhöhung). A resolution on a contingent capital increase may be adopted only for a limited number of purposes, including the granting of conversion rights or stock warrants to holders of convertible bonds or warrant bonds. The conditional capital may not exceed 50 per cent of the existing issued and outstanding capital of the stock company.

Registration of Public Offers. It is important to emphasise that, unlike in the United States, an offer deemed public in Germany does not require registration; it only necessitates the preparation of a prospectus (see text, above).

Registration of Placements. Under German law, no registration of private placements is required.

Underwriting. Banks typically engage as underwriters for shares during the capital increase of a stock corporation, while it is less common that the newly created shares are placed in the market immediately after incorporation of a company. Under German corporate law, the term 'capital increase' means that the stated capital as registered in the Commercial Register is increased by a change of the articles of association of the relevant corporation pursuant to a shareholders' resolution to that effect. The initial placement needs, however, to be registered, but the capital increase only becomes effective on its registration in the Commercial Register.

Periodic Disclosure

Securities Listed for Official Quotation

In General. An issuer whose securities are listed on the Official Market is in particular required to inform the public and the listing office in an appropriate manner about itself and the listed securities. The specific requirements are set forth in the Exchange Admission Regulation. In particular, an issuer is required to publish the following information:

Corporate Events. The issuer of officially listed shares must publish the convening of a shareholders' meeting and information about payment of dividends, the issuance of new shares, and the exercise of conversion and subscription rights. The issuer of securities other than shares must publish the convening of a bondholders' meeting, the exercise of conversion and subscription rights, and payment of interest and redemption of principal.

Changes in the Legal Status of the Issuer. An issuer of shares admitted on the Official Market must notify the listing office of any change or amendment of its articles of association, and it must inform the listing office at the latest at the convocation of the shareholders' meeting to decide on such change or amendment. The issuer of securities other than shares must likewise inform the listing office about any intended change or amendment of its articles of association at the latest when the persons entitled to decide on such change or amendment are called.

Financial Statements. The issuer must regularly make available to the public at the paying agent its annual financial statements and, if applicable, the consolidated financial statements of the conglomerate and the report of the business situation appendixed, unless both the annual financial statement and the business report were published in Germany.

Interim Reports. At least once each fiscal year, the issuer must produce an interim report which reflects a true picture of the financial and general business situation. The interim report must facilitate an evaluation about how the business of the issuer had developed within the first six months of the fiscal year. It must contain figures about the business activities and the earnings of the issuer for that reporting period as well as explanations thereon. The figures provided in the interim report must state the turnover and the earnings before and after taxes in accordance with the applicable accounting standards. If the figures are audited by a certified accountant, the auditors' certificate, including any additional comments or restrictions or the refusal of approval, must be provided in full. The issuer must provide explanations necessary to evaluate the development of the business and earnings and must provide specific information about:

- The orders, costs, and prices of goods;
- The number of employees;
- Investments; and
- Other events of particular importance which may have an impact on the business of the issuer.

For each figure, a comparative figure for the corresponding period of time in the preceding fiscal year must be provided. If possible, the issuer must make a projection for the current fiscal year.

Additional Information. Any change of the rights conferred by the listed securities must be immediately published by the issuer. The issuer of securities other than shares must immediately publish the issuance of debt securities and the guarantees granted for them, unless there is an exemption to that effect; in respect of securities which grant their holders conversion or subscription rights, any changes to the rights conferred by the shares to which such subscription or conversion rights relate also must be published.

Regulated Market

The periodic reporting requirements for securities listed on the Regulated Market are set forth in the exchange regulations of the respective stock exchanges.

Additional Disclosure Duties. With the taking effect of the Fourth Financial Markets Promotion Act, a German stock exchange is permitted to create sub-sectors to the Official Market and Regulated Market. It may implement additional obligations arising from the admission of shares or certificates representing the shares for the purpose of the protection of the public or of an orderly trading. The Frankfurt Stock Exchange has made use of this permission and divided its Official Market and Regulated Market each into a sub-sector 'General Standard' and a sub-sector 'Prime Standard'. Admission to the Prime Standard first requires admission to the General Standard of the Official Market, respectively the Regulated Market. Such application must include all shares or certificates representing shares of the same class admitted to the General Standard. The application may be submitted together with the application for admission to the General Standard.

Regulated Over-the-Counter Market

No particular reporting requirements apply to issuers of securities which are included in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market.

Accounting Standards

If the issuer is a German company, it must comply with the accounting principles generally accepted in Germany. In the case of groups of companies, if the ultimate parent company is domiciled in Germany, it is required to draw up consolidated financial statements (Konzernabschluß) and a consolidated business report (Konzernlagebericht) under the German standards. However, under the recently promulgated Act for the Improvement of the Competitiveness of German Groups on the Capital Markets and for Simplification of Receiving Shareholder Loans, the ultimate German parent company is relieved from the requirement of drawing up consolidated financial statements and a business report under the German standards if it draws up consolidated financial statements and statements of affairs in accordance with internationally recognised accounting standards (ie, IAS or United States–GAAP), provided that certain further requirements are met.

Proxy Disclosure

The relevant rules for proxy voting are set forth in the Stock Corporation Act. A bank is required to obtain written proxy. It must inform the customer about how it intends to vote and is bound by the customer's instructions, if any. At the general shareholders' meeting, the credit institution must indicate that it is voting on behalf of a third party. However, it needs to disclose the identity of the relevant shareholder to safeguard its client's anonymity. Proxy voting by banks plays an important role in corporate governance since it has become a common practice for German credit institutions to exercise, for and on behalf of their clients, voting rights attached to shares kept by them in the safe custody account.

Trading Rules

Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings

Disclosure Requirements under the Securities Trading Act. Particular disclosure requirements apply to shareholders and companies under the Securities Trading Act.

Shareholder Requirements. Sections 21 et seq of the Securities Trading Act implemented the EC Transparency Directive[27] into German law. Under section 21 of the 27 European Community Directive 88/627/EEC, 12 December 1988.

Securities Trading Act, a shareholder of a listed company is required to disclose the percentage of his shares conferring voting rights in the issuer if such shareholding reaches, exceeds, or falls below five per cent, 10 per cent, 25 per cent, 50 per cent, or 75 per cent of the voting rights by means of acquisition, disposition, or otherwise.

The shareholder must disclose this information in writing to the issuer and the BaFin without undue delay, at the latest within seven calendar days. If the entity concerned is part of a group of companies, the parent company or, if the parent company is itself a subsidiary, the latter's parent may file the information on behalf of that entity. The period commences when the person or entity concerned becomes aware or should have become aware that its voting rights have reached, exceeded, or fallen below the percentages mentioned.

Subjected to this disclosure requirement are shareholders of issuers having their place of business in Germany and whose shares are admitted to an organised Market on a domestic Stock Exchange or a Stock Exchange in a member state of the EU or EEA. Therefore, securities traded on the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market are not subject to the disclosure rules.

In order to determine whether the respective threshold has been reached, exceeded, or fallen below, the voting rights attached to the following shares are deemed as voting rights of the person concerned:

- Shares belonging to a subsidiary of the person obliged to notify;
- Shares belonging to a third person, who holds those shares for the account of the person obliged to notify;
- Shares that the person obliged to notify transferred to a third party as collateral unless the third party is entitled to exercise the voting rights of these shares and expresses the intention to exercise the voting rights independently of any directions by the person obliged to notify;
- Shares in which the person obliged to notify has been granted a right of usufruct;
- Shares which the person obliged to notify has an unconditional right to acquire; and
- Shares which are entrusted to the person obliged to notify, to the extent that it has discretion to exercise the voting rights attached to the shares if no particular directions are given by the holder of the shares.

For the attribution of voting rights, subsidiaries of the person obliged to notify are treated as equivalent to the person obliged to notify. Voting rights of the subsidiary are fully attributed to the person obliged to notify. The voting rights in the listed company held by a third purty with whom the person obliged to notify or its subsidiary co-ordinates its conduct in relation to the listed company are also fully attributed to the person obliged to notify; agreements on the exercise of voting rights on single occasions are excepted. Subsidiaries are enterprises that are subsidiaries within the meaning of section 290 of the Commercial Code or enterprises over which a controlling influence can be exercised, regardless of their legal form or their seat.

Information as to voting rights which are subject to the aforesaid rules, and are thus included in the calculation for purposes of the disclosure duties, must be separately shown in the notice to the BaFin.

On written application, the BaFin may permit voting rights to be disregarded for calculating the relevant thresholds if the applicant:

- Is a company which renders securities services and is admitted to trading on a stock exchange in a member state of the EU or EEA;
- Holds or intends to hold the shares concerned in its portfolio; and
- Demonstrates that it does not intend by means of its acquisition of the shares to exercise influence over the management of the company; or
- As far as the calculation of the five per cent threshold is concerned, (a) is a company which has its registered place of business within a member state of the EU or EEA and does not meet the requirements for the above exemptions; (b) holds or intends to hold the shares concerned to realise short-term profits through existing or expected differences between purchase and sales price; and (c) demonstrates that it does not intend through its acquisition of the shares to exercise influence over the management of the company.

Voting rights attached to shares which are disregarded for calculating the applicable threshold under the above exemptions may not be exercised if disclosure is otherwise required.

Any person who filed a notice under the foregoing rules must, on request, provide to the BaFin or the issuer evidence of its shareholding. The BaFin may further request from the shareholders and issuer of the shares information and documents necessary to monitor compliance with these disclosure duties.

Any person who intentionally or recklessly fails to properly notify the BaFin and the issuer may be fined up to €250,000. Furthermore, voting rights for which a notice is necessary must not be exercised as long as the notice is not filed.

Company Requirements. In respect of German companies, on receipt of a notification pursuant to section 21 of the Securities Trading Act, the exchange listed company must promptly, but no later than nine calendar days after receipt of such notice, publish in a national newspaper any notification designated for exchange notices. The company must thereby identify the reporting party by name and address. Moreover, the company must promptly disclose in the Federal Gazette the relevant newspaper in which notification had been published.

If the shares of the company are admitted to an organised market in another EU or EEA member state, it also must promptly, but no later than nine calendar days after receipt of the notice, effect publication in a newspaper which is designated for exchange notices in such country or, if the laws of such country provide for other means of informing the public, the publication must then be in the language approved for such publication in the host country.

Companies whose registered offices are located in another EU member state or another state party to the Treaty on the EEA and whose shares are admitted to an organised market not only in their home member state exchange, but also on a German exchange, must make publications required by the law in the home country pursuant to article 10 of the Transparency Directive in the German language in a German national newspaper which is designated for exchange notices.

If the proportion of voting rights held by a shareholder of a non-EU company whose shares are admitted to an organised market on a German exchange reaches, exceeds, or falls below the thresholds referred to in section 21 of the Securities Trading Act, the company is obligated to promptly publish such information and the percentage of the shareholder's voting participation but, in any event, within nine calendar days, in a national newspaper designated for exchange notices. The period begins at the time the company obtains knowledge that the shareholder's voting rights have reached, exceeded, or fallen below the specified thresholds.

Reporting Requirements under the Stock Corporation Act. The disclosure requirements of the Stock Corporation Act pertaining to the acquisition of substantial holdings do not apply if the relevant shareholder is subject to the disclosure requirements under the Securities Trading Act (ie, if the target company is listed on an organised market). Consequently, the following rules apply only if the target company is unlisted or is included in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market. Under section 20 of the Stock Corporation Act, once a 'company' had acquired, directly or indirectly, more than 25 per cent of the shares in a domestic stock corporation ('qualified interest'), it must notify the stock corporation concerned, in writing without undue delay. The same applies if a qualified majority interest is acquired or if an interest has been increased to a majority. Likewise, a reduction of an interest below such thresholds also must be notified to that stock corporation in writing.

Although the Stock Corporation Act does not define the term 'company', it is the predominant view that any judicial or natural person who engages in business activities other than holding an interest in the relevant corporation is a 'company' provided such person pursues objectives different from those of the corporation such that the shareholders' business activity may result in a conflict of interests. The company or a dependent company is barred from exercising the membership rights (eg, voting rights) from its shareholding until these notification requirements are satisfied. Any attempt to circumvent this prohibition on the exercise of voting rights would constitute an offence subject to a fine. The stock corporation, having received a notification of qualified or majority interest, must publish such notification in the newspapers designated by the company for publication. The publication must state the name of the acquirer. The same applies to notifications of a reduction in a previously existing qualified or majority interest.

Under section 21 of the Stock Corporation Act, if a stock corporation has acquired more than 25 per cent of the shares of another domestic corporation, it must notify the other corporation in writing without undue delay. The same applies to the acquisition by the stock corporation of a qualified majority interest in another corporation. A stock corporation which is required to notify cannot exercise its membership rights arising from the shareholding concerned until the requisite notification is effected.

Notification Obligations of Directors. Members of the management board, the supervisory body, or comparable bodies ('directors') of a company whose securities are listed on a German stock exchange must notify the purchase or sale of:

- Shares of such a company or other securities that are exchangeable for such shares or that give any other right to purchase or sell such shares; and
- A right which is not contained in the above and the price of which is directly dependent on the stock exchange price of such shares.

The director must immediately notify dealings in such securities to the related company and the BaFin. The notification must contain the specification of the security or right, the security identification number, the date of the transaction, the purchase/sale price, the number and the nominal amount of the securities or rights. The director's spouse, the director's registered partner (eingetragene Lebenspartner) and the director's parents and children must also notify their respective dealings in securities of the company. Non-compliance with such notification duty may be fined with up to €100,000. No notification is necessary if the purchase of securities is based on the employment relationship with the company, forms part of the director's remuneration; or if the total value of the dealings does not exceed €25,000 within a period of 30 days. The company is obliged to publish any notification forwarded to it immediately on the internet under its homepage, or in a qualifying stock exchange newspaper if the publication on the internet is too burdensome for the company. A copy of such a publication must immediately be sent to the BaFin. Non compliance with this duty can trigger a fine of up to €100,000.

Insider Trading and Fraud

In General. The BaFin supervises trading in securities. As securities services companies are required to report on a daily basis every transaction they have executed, the BaFin is in the position to identify exceptional trading volumes and price changes and to route the orders to the person who placed the order. In the event that the BaFin obtains any hint that insider trading had occurred, it may undertake further investigations on its own, in particular, it may conduct investigations at the premises of banks and brokers. The BaFin also may request that the issuer and associated companies, provided their place of business is within Germany or their securities are listed on a domestic stock exchange, disclose information about such insider information and the persons who had knowledge thereof.

Information that justifies the suspicion that insider trading was committed will be forwarded to the public prosecutor for criminal proceedings. If necessary, the BaFin will disclose all relevant information to the competent authorities of the other member states of the EU and EEA to ensure effective supervision of compliance with the insider rules. In addition, the trading supervisory department collects and monitors the trading activities on the stock exchange floors, XETRA, and the EUREX. If it learns of suspicious trading activities, it forwards this information to the BaFin for further investigation.

Primary Insider Dealings. There are three categories of insider dealing offences for primary insiders, namely:

- Acquisition and disposition of insider securities;
- Unauthorised disclosure of insider information; and
- A recommendation to third parties.[28]

Acquisition and Disposition of Insider Securities. The insider must acquire or dispose of an 'insider security' (Insiderpapier). The insider must know that the relevant information of which he has knowledge is an 'insider information' (Insidertatsache). The insider must further 'take advantage' (ausnutzen) of his knowledge, which means he must make use of his knowledge in the hope and with the purpose of achieving a monetary advantage which is considered to be a violation of the principle of equal access to information for the investors in the securities markets.

Unauthorised Disclosure of Insider Information. An insider must refrain from disclosing insider information to third parties without authorisation. Furthermore, an insider must refrain from making insider information available to third parties.

Recommendations to Third Parties. It is an offence for an insider to recommend a third party to deal in insider securities on the basis of insider information. The third party does not need to know that the recommendation is based on an insider information and it is irrelevant how the tipper obtained his inside knowledge. It suffices that the recommendation is made on the basis of the tipper's knowledge of the insider information.

Secondary Insider Dealings. It is an offence for any person who is not a 'primary insider' to take advantage of his knowledge of an insider information by acquiring or disposing insider securities for his own account or the account of, or on behalf of, another person. The source of knowledge is irrelevant and no particular relationship is required between such person and the issuer. However, the person must have been aware that the information is an insider information and must act with the intention of achieving a monetary advantage by taking advantage of such information. If a person had learned of an insider information and discloses or makes this information available to another person, such person could be held guilty of solicitation or of aiding and abetting insider trading.

'Primary Insiders' and 'Secondary Insiders'. 'Primary insiders' are persons who have a close relation to the issuer by reason of their:

- Position with the issuer;

28 Securities Trading Act, ss 12 et seq.

- Having an interest in the issuer; or
- Special (contractual) relationship to the issuer.

In contrast, secondary insiders are persons who have no particular relationship to the issuer other than having insider knowledge. The first category of primary insiders comprises any person who is a member of the managing or supervisory board or a personally liable partner, either of the issuer or an associated company. The second category of primary insiders comprises any person who has an equity interest in the issuer or in an associated company. The third category of primary insiders comprises persons who have knowledge of insider information relating to one or more issuers of insider securities through their profession or work, and the learning of such insider information is related specifically to the scope of such profession or work. This category of insiders typically comprises professional advisers, such as accountants, lawyers, management consultants, and their employees. Any other person who learns of insider information is a secondary insider.

'Insider Securities'. 'Insider securities' are securities which are:

- Listed on a German stock exchange;
- Included in the Regulated Market or in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market of a German stock exchange; or
- Listed on the organised market of another member state of the EU or EEA.

The term includes:

- Rights to subscribe to or sell or buy securities;
- Rights to receive payment of the difference which depends on the price of securities futures contracts on a stock or bond index or interest rate futures contracts ('financial futures contracts');
- Rights to subscribe to or buy or sell financial futures contracts if such financial futures contracts are related to securities or an index that is, at least partly, based on the price of securities; and
- Rights to any other futures contracts that obligate the parties to buy or sell securities.

Such rights or futures contracts must be listed on an organised market within a member state of the EU or the EAA and the underlying securities that are subject to such rights, and the futures contracts must themselves be listed on such a market or be included in the Regulated Market or in the Regulated Over-the-Counter Market. In addition, the term 'insider securities' includes securities which have not yet been listed but whose application for listing has been either filed or publicly announced.

'Insider Information'. The term 'insider information' is defined as information that is not publicly known and relates to one or more issuers of insider securities or to insider securities which, if it becomes publicly known, would be apt to influence significantly the price of such insider securities.

Criminal Offence Provision. Pursuant to the Securities Trading Act, insider offences may be punished by imprisonment for a term of up to five years or by a fine. The actual punishment imposed depends, among other things, on the personal wealth and the grade of fault of the offender. No distinction is made between primary insiders and secondary insiders with regard to the limits on punishment. However, the latter might be treated more leniently. The insider rules are not applicable to transactions that are executed for monetary, currency, or debt policy reasons by the federal government, one of the government's special asset facilities, a German state, the Bundesbank, a foreign country or its central bank, or an organisation or persons retained for that purpose.

Immediate Disclosure

In General

Section 15 of the Securities Trading Act provides that the issuer of securities which are listed on a German stock exchange must, without undue delay, disclose (Ad hoc-Publizität) any new information that has emerged within its sphere and which is not publicly known if such new information is apt to significantly influence the price of the securities because of its effect on the assets or the financial or general business situation of the issuer. If the issuer has debt securities outstanding, the issuer has a duty to disclose any new information that may adversely affect its ability to fulfil its obligations thereunder. The publication must be in German, the issuer must be the author of the publication and a reader must be able to identify the issuer as the author. Characteristic financial figures used in the publication must be common to ordinary business transactions and must allow a comparison to figures used in the previous publications. Other information that does not meet the requirements of ad hoc disclosure (eg, advertisement) may not be included in the publication. Untrue information must be immediately corrected by way of a publication pursuant to Section 15 of the Securities Trading Act. The BaFin may, upon request, allow issuers with their principal place of business outside Germany to publish the information in another language provided that sufficient information of the public is ensured.

The Frankfurt Stock Exchange, together with the BaFin, have prepared a guide in which the terms of section 15 of the Securities Trading Act are interpreted by the Stock Exchanges.

'Information'

The term 'information' is undefined. The information must be 'new'. Reports in the economic print media or news agencies which are published by the press and which do not contain mere suspicions or rumours, but factual information, relieve the issuer from its duty to disclose. Therefore, information that is already known to the public does not need to be published in the manner prescribed. The information must be related to, and must have occurred within, the sphere of the issuer. Hence, the term 'insider information' has a broader meaning than information which is subject to the immediate disclosure rules, since insider information also may originate outside the issuer's sphere.

The information also must have an impact on the issuer's assets or financial situation or general business. The Financial Committee of the Bundestag stated that the terms 'assets' and 'financial situation' are to be interpreted in accordance with German accounting rules, which provide that the annual financial statement must represent a true and correct picture of the assets, the financial situation, as well as a description of the overall situation and the business of the company. Hence, information would have an impact on the assets or financial situation if, in accordance with the principles of orderly bookkeeping, such information would cause at least an entry reflected in the annual financial statements or were to be included in the management report. Events whose consequences cannot be determined because the effects of such events could be offset or compensated by other circumstances or by positive countermeasures of the issuer are not 'information' within the meaning of section 15 of the Securities Trading Act.

The question of whether 'information' had actually occurred is particularly significant for internal decision-making processes that consist of several steps, in particular when the managing board's decision requires the approval of the supervisory board.

Likelihood to Significantly Influence Price of the Securities

The information must be likely to change significantly the price of the securities by reason of its impact on the assets or financial or business situation of the issuer. Whether information is likely to influence significantly the price of the security depends on the general life experience; the issuer, in cases of doubt, should obtain professional advice. This suggestion is of no assistance in applying the law but, if a market professional opines that certain information would not be significant, the issuer might have a valid defence in legal proceedings since sanctions for violation of the disclosure duty require recklessness or intent.

If new information with the potential to influence the exchange price (eg, a material gain or loss) results from one incident, this information must be disclosed without undue delay on its occurrence. If isolated incidents, which themselves do not have the potential to materially influence the exchange price, are aggregated in the annual or interim reports, the result of this aggregation may be information with the potential to materially influence the exchange price. In this case, such result must be disclosed under the immediate disclosure rules. Information so disclosed occurs as soon as the results of the aggregation are known to the management board or any person otherwise responsible for disclosure by the company pursuant to section 15 of the Securities Trading Act. This means that, if information having the potential to influence the exchange price is included in an annual report, the information occurs at the latest on the management board having drawn up the annual report. For purposes of reporting pursuant to section 15 of the Securities Trading Act, only information having the potential to influence the exchange price needs to be disclosed, ie, not the entire annual or interim report which contains such information.

Application to BaFin for Exemption

On application, the BaFin may exempt the issuer from its duty to disclose information if the issuer can demonstrate that disclosure is likely to damage its legitimate interests. If such application was filed without undue delay on emergence of information which would otherwise trigger public disclosure, the issuer does not violate its duty to disclose, even if the application is subsequently withdrawn. In the past, the BaFin has granted exemptions (eg, when there were promising reorganisation plans to prevent imminent insolvency which would apparently be jeopardised by early immediate disclosure).

On application, the BaFin may exempt foreign issuers from the requirement to disclose a new fact to the relevant stock exchange and the BaFin prior to making the requisite publication of such fact, provided that such exemption does not negatively affect the examination by the managing board of the relevant stock exchange as to whether trading in the relevant securities should be suspended. If such exemption is granted, the publication and the notification of the stock exchange and the BaFin may be effected by the foreign issuer simultaneously.

Steps and Timing of Immediate Disclosure

Disclosure of Information to BaFin and Stock Exchanges. Prior to the publication, the issuer must disclose the information to the BaFin and the managing board of the stock exchange where the securities are listed. The purpose of the latter requirement is to allow the managing board of the relevant stock exchange to examine whether trading in the securities should be suspended. If trading in the securities is suspended, all unexecuted orders will be deleted. The managing board of the respective stock exchange requires some time to make inquiries prior to its decision as to whether suspension of trading is appropriate. Once made, the publication of the new fact must be forwarded to the BaFin and the managing board of the respective stock exchange.

In any event, disclosure must be made without undue delay. 'Without undue delay' means without negligent or intentional hesitation. The issuer has time to carefully examine the effects of an event to determine whether there is a duty to disclose. On the other hand, since the likelihood of influencing the price is a crucial element, time for review is more restricted.

Publication. The issuer must publish the information in a regional mandatory exchange journal or in an electronic information system that is widely used by the market participants. The reason for this requirement is not only to ensure broad dissemination, but also to control the dissemination before timely publication occurs. Hence, a press release prior to the publication in the above manner would be a violation of section 15 of the Securities Trading Act. The issuer must be the author of the publication, and a reader must be able to identify the issuer as author. The issuer is responsible for ensuring that all relevant information is published without any changes.

The BaFin may exempt the issuer from this requirement in that the issuer may publish the information in summary form if complete information is available at the paying agent of the issuer and a notice to that effect is given. Because the stock exchange board may only make use of the information to determine whether trading should be suspended, the issuer must forward the information separately to the electronic information system provider to he stock exchange if it wants to disseminate the information via such electronic system.

Submission of Notice of Publication to BaFin and Stock Exchanges. The issuer must, without undue delay, submit a notice to the BaFin and the stock exchanges that the prescribed publication has been made.

Publication in the Federal Gazette. A notice must be published in the Federal Gazette about where the publication was made or where the publication may be obtained.

Language for Publication and Disclosure. Publications and disclosure of German issuers must be furnished in the German language and may be made simultaneously in English. Publications and disclosure of foreign issuers having their seat abroad may be made in English.

Sanctions. Pursuant to the Securities Trading Act, violations of the disclosure requirements may attract a fine of up to €1.5 million, provided the issuer acted with intent or was reckless. Representatives of the issuer also can be personally liable to sanctions. In addition, if the disclosure was omitted with the intent of influencing the price, the responsible person may be imprisoned for a term of up to three years, pursuant to the Securities Trading Act.

Pursuant to section 37 b of the Securities Trading Act, investors may claim damage from an issuer who has omitted the immediate disclosure of new facts pursuant to section 15 of the Securities Trading Act. Such a claim requires that the respective investor acquired the securities:

- After the omission and still held the securities at the time when the fact became public; or
- Before the occurrence of the new fact and sold the securities after the omission.

Pursuant to section 37c of the Securities Trading Act, an investor may claim damage from an issuer who has published untrue information in a publication pursuant to section 15 of the Securities Trading Act, if the respective investor acquired the securities:

- After the publication of the untrue information and still held the securities at the time when the inaccuracy of the information became public; or
- Before the publication of the untrue information and sold them before the inaccuracy of the information became public.

Public Take-Over Bids

General

Upon failure of the EC Directive on Take-over Offers in summer 2001, the German legislature implemented the Act to Regulate Public Tender Offers for the Purchase of Securities and Company Take-overs (the 'Take-over Act') on 1 January 2002. Before the coming into force of the Take-over Act, take-overs in Germany were regulated by the Take-over Codex, a voluntary regulation comparable with London's City Code on Take-over and Mergers.

Main Principles

Pursuant to the German legislature the Take-over Act provides for a fair and regulated procedure for public take-over offers in Germany, without preventing or promoting take-over offers. The main principles for such a procedure are:

- The obligation of the bidder to treat all shareholders equally under the same conditions;
- The obligation of the bidder to provide the shareholders with substantial information; and
- The obligation of the bidder to guarantee the financing of the offer.

Applicability

The Take-over Act is applicable to public offers by bidders to buy securities of a target company. Any natural or legal person may be a bidder. Companies qualify as target companies under the Take-over Act if their registered seat is in Germany and if their securities are listed on an organised market within the EU.

The Take-over Act distinguishes among three different kinds of offers:

- Mandatory offers which are required by law after the gaining of control over a target company (the 'Mandatory Offer'); a bidder is deemed to have gained control over a target company if the bidder acquired an interest in the target company of at least 30 per cent;
- Voluntary offers which are aimed at gaining control over a target company (the 'Take-over Offer'); and
- Voluntary offers which are not aimed at gaining control over a target company, ie, aimed at the acquisition of less than a 30 per cent interest in the target company (the 'Public Offer').

Contribution

The contribution offered by the bidder to the shareholders of the target company must consist of cash or shares tradable on an organised market within the EU or a mixture of both. Additional contributions of other kinds (such as non-tradable shares) are permitted. In case of a public offer, the contribution may be made in any other way. The calculation of the contribution is substantially based on the average stock exchange price of the target company's securities during the three months previous to the offer. The contribution will be adjusted to any higher price paid or promised by the bidder (or related parties) for securities of the target company during the offer period or within one year after the termination of the offer period.

Main Obligations of Bidder and Target Company

Once the bidder has taken the decision to make a public offer, it must immediately publish its decision. The take-over offer made by the bidder must be binding. It may be subject to certain conditions, unless such conditions can be influenced by the bidder. The bidder is required to publish an offer document which contains all material information on the take-over offer within four weeks from the time of publication of its decision to make a public offer. During and after the take-over offer period the bidder must publish the amount of voting rights held by it. The managing board and the supervisory board of the target company are obliged to publish a comment on the take-over offer immediately after the publication of the offer document.

After the publication of the decision to make a take-over offer, the management board of the target company is substantially prohibited from taking defence measures which may prevent the success of the take-over offer. However, the general shareholders' meeting may authorise the management board before the publication of a decision to make a public offer to take defence measures in order to prevent a successful take-over. Such authorisation may be granted for a maximum of 18 months. Further, the managing board is entitled to take actions against a public take-over offer which have been approved by the supervisory board of the target company.

Squeeze-Out. Pursuant to the German Stock Exchange Act, a majority shareholder is given the possibility to squeeze out minority shareholders against a contribution in cash. In order to make use of this provision, the majority shareholder must hold an interest of at least 95 per cent in the target company.

Introduction

Securities

Securities are broadly categorized as:

- Debt securities, such as banknotes, bonds, and debentures;
- Equity securities, such as common stocks' shares; and
- Derivative contracts, such as forwards, futures, options, and swaps.

According to Greek legislation, the most common types of securities are the following:

- Securities to the bearer;
- Registered securities; and
- Securities payable to order.

Types of securities were enriched by virtue of Law Number 2651/1998, with any exchangeable value defined as security by decision of the Capital Market Commission. Securities are regulated by various legislative documents, which include certain articles of the Civil Code (especially articles 888–900), the Commercial Code, Law Number 5325/1932 on bills of exchange and promissory notes payable to order, Law Number 5960/1933 on bank checks, Law Number 2190/1920 on companies limited by shares, and Legislative Decree of 17 July/13 August 1923 on special provisions for companies limited by shares.

Athens Stock Exchange

The Athens Stock Exchange (Chrimatistirio Athinon) was initially a public legal entity of the Hellenic State. By virtue of Law Number 2324/1995, it became a company limited by shares, with sole shareholder being the Hellenic State. In 2000 a company's shares were transferred to a holding company, within which the Hellenic State participates with approximately 33.4 per cent and whose shares are listed with the Athens Stock Exchange.

The basic legislative framework regarding the Athens Stock Exchange includes Law Number 3632/1928, Law Number 350/1985, Law Number 1806/1988, Presidential Decree Number 51/1992, Law Number 2188/1994, Law Number 2324/1995, Law Number 2533/1997, Law Number 2651/1998, Law Number 2733/1999, Law Number 2842/2000, Law Number 2892/2001, Law Number 3152/2003, Law Number 3283/2004, Law Number 3371/2005, Law Number 3556/2007, Law Number 3606/2007, Law Number 4141/2013, and the Athens Stock Exchange Regulation (amended by Decision ASE BoD of 9 May 2013). Relevant substantial dispositions also are provided by Ministerial Decisions, Resolutions of the Board of Directors of the Athens Stock Exchange, Decisions of the Capital Market Commission, and European Union (EU) legislation.

In addition, the application of International Financial Reporting Standards to listed companies, introduced by Law Number 3229/2004, has offered coherence and has facilitated the function of the Athens Stock Exchange, enabling the better information of the investors.

The Ministry of Economy and Finance, the Board of Directors of the Athens Stock Exchange SA, and the Hellenic Capital Market Commission are the authorities that supervise the operation of the Athens Stock Exchange. The Hellenic Capital Market Commission is a public legal entity operating under the supervision of the Ministry of Economy and Finance and holds a significant institutional and operational role.

Types of Securities on Athens Stock Exchange

In General

Shares, bonds,[1] and Hellenic certificates (ELPIS)[2] are considered as the most common securities marketed in the Athens Stock Exchange. In all cases, it is imperative that all shares and bonds listed with the Athens Stock Exchange be dematerialized.

Registered Shares – Shares to the Bearer

Registered shares bear the name and other particulars of their beneficiary holder and are registered with the Shareholders' Register. Any company may issue registered shares, provided that such possibility is stipulated in its statutes.

For certain categories of companies, such as banking institutes and insurance companies, the issuance of registered shares is obligatory. This type of share is 1 Securities listed with the Athens Stock Exchange are mainly shares and bonds belonging to Greek and foreign companies (under the condition that they are listed with their national stock exchange), bonds, promissory notes, and treasury bills issued by the Hellenic State, and foreign states.

2 This type of securities refers to foreign shares (and not domestic shares) that a bank has by virtue of a relevant contract with a foreign company (the issuer of the shares). The bank administers or allots the shares on behalf of the foreign issuer. The Hellenic Capital Market Commission's permission is necessary.

transferable by endorsement of the central securities depository titles and registration with the Shareholders' Register. Shares to the bearer are the most common type of shares of the Greek companies. Such shares are transferred by simple handing over.

Common Shares – Privileged Shares

Common shares certify that their owner is associated with the company according to the percentage of the owner's shares. These shares entitle their owner to participate in the company's profits and to vote in the shareholders' general assembly in matters such as the election of the board of directors and amendment of the balance sheet.

Privileged shares offer their owner further rights, among which usually falls the right (privilege) to take a dividend even when there are no profits. Such shares may be issued with or without a voting right. In principle, in Greece, privileged shares are usually issued without a voting right. Law Number 876/1979 on the Development of the Capital Market limits the issuance of privileged without voting right shares, to 40 per cent of the company's capital. However, companies may issue convertibles without the above-mentioned limitation, i.e., privileged shares that may be converted into common shares, the time of conversion already having been defined.

Admission to Athens Stock Exchange

In General

The Athens Stock Exchange operates a Primary Market with two separate markets, the Securities Market and the Derivatives Market. Additionally, the Athens Stock Exchange operates the Alternative Market as a Secondary Market.

The Securities Market is a regulated market operating since 2002 and supervised by the Hellenic Capital Market Committee. In this market, mainly securities, preemption rights to acquire securities, bonds, and Hellenic Certificates are marketed. The Derivatives Market is a regulated market operating since 1999 and is supervised by the Capital Market Committee. Within the Derivatives Market, any financial instrument, including derivatives, future contracts, options, and repos, may be marketed.

The Alternative Market is a multilateral trading facility as provided by European Directive 2004/39/EC, operated by the Athens Stock Exchange and supervised by the Hellenic Capital Market Commission. The Athens Stock Exchange transactions take place during its regular session, with or without the participation of a member (in-market or off-market transaction). Furthermore, transactions may be concluded without participating in the session (transaction by counterbalancing entry). Under Greek legislation, it is possible for foreign companies to become listed, provided specific legal requirements are met that pertain to the company itself and/or its shares. The admission to a market of the Athens Stock Exchange is regulated by its regulation in force and Law Number 3371/2005.

Requirements

Type of Company

Admissible to apply for listing with the Athens Stock Exchange are companies limited by shares (société anonyme, anonymi etaireia).

Minimum Equity

Admissible companies must have a minimum equity of €3,000,000.

Financial Statements

The applicant company must have published or submitted for publishing its annual financial statements for at least the three years prior to its application for listing with the Athens Stock Exchange. The statements must have been audited by a chartered accountant.

According to the law, it is required that the applicant company's last balance sheet show satisfactory operating results and assets. The Athens Stock Exchange Regulation indicates that the applicant's financial statements must be free of remarks that may have a negative effect on the company's real financial status. However, the Hellenic Capital Market Commission, following an opinion of the Athens Stock Exchange Board of Directors, may exceptionally permit a company to become listed, even if it has been operating for less than three years. Such exception is possible if the listing is considered to be in favor of the applicant company or the investors and sufficient information has been given to them.

Distribution of Shares

An applicant's company shares must be sufficiently distributed to the public. A distribution is considered to be sufficient if at least 25 per cent of the shares to become listed are distributed to the public.

In any case, sufficient distribution is accomplished if the shares to become listed are owned by at least 300 persons, among which none holds more than five per cent of the totality of the shares proposed for listing. Shares may become exceptionally listed with the Athens Stock Exchange even without the required distribution if at least five per cent of the totality of the shares to become listed are distributed. The following persons are exempted from the calculation of a sufficient distribution:

- Members of the board of directors of the applicant company;
- Managers and personnel of the applicant company;

- Relatives of first degree of kinship of major shareholders and managing personnel;
- Suppliers or persons collaborating with the company; and
- Existing shareholders who acquired shares within the last year prior to the company's application, unless they are institutional investors or business-sharing companies (etairies epichirimatikon symmetochon).

If the applicant company has shares already listed and negotiated with a stock exchange of one or more member states of the European Union, or of a third country, the distribution of its shares in those markets will be taken into consideration when calculating the distribution for the listing with the Athens Stock Exchange. However, it is necessary for the company to secure a minimum distribution within Greece, regarding both the percentage of the capital and the number of the shareholders.

Tax Audit

The applicant company must have undergone a thorough tax audit covering all financial years prior to the filing of the application. If the applicant company is subject to consolidated financial statements, tax audit covers all integrated companies. If the company subject to tax audit has its headquarters abroad, tax audits must be performed by an international accounting firm.

Special Advisor

The applicant company must appoint a member of the Athens Stock Exchange as its special sponsor advisor. Among the sponsor advisor's duties are the promotion of the newly listed company to investors of the Athens Stock Exchange. The sponsor advisor issues an analysis of the new listed company upon the completion of a 12-month period of listing with the Athens Stock Exchange.

Special Requirements According to Company's Field of Operation

For companies operating in the sector of insurance, construction, or trade of automobiles, special provisions on the requirements of tax audit and their financial status apply.

Admission Cost

Companies to be listed for the first time are subject to a registration fee proportional to the value of the shares to become listed. The value of the shares to become listed is the product of the number of the shares to become listed and the value at which they will become listed. The registration fee amounts to 0.08 per cent for shares having a total value up to €1,500,000,000, and it decreases to 0.04 per cent for a value exceeding the €1,500,000,000 and up to €3,000,000,000, and to 0.02 per cent for a value exceeding the €3,000,000,000. In any case, the minimum registration fee is €10,000.

Listed companies must pay to the Athens Stock Exchange a quarterly subscription, which varies from €1,000 to €8,000, according to the average value that the listed shares had during the month preceding the month within which the subscription is due.

International Accounting and International Financial Reporting Standards

In General

Pursuant to Law Number 2190/1920, the fundamental legislative text for limited liability companies, as amended and in force, and Law Number 3229/2004, companies (including parent companies) having shares or other securities listed are obliged to draft their financial statements in accordance with the International Accounting Standards International Financial Reporting Standards.

The obligation extends to the financial statements of the associated companies to a parent company that reside in Greece or abroad, provided that the respective national legislation provides for the application of the International Accounting Standards International Financial Reporting Standards. Non-listed companies also may adopt the International Accounting Standards International Financial Reporting Standards.

Information Obligations

Information before Listing

A company addressing an invitation to the public, or which is going to become listed with the Athens Stock Exchange, shall issue an informative prospectus pursuant to Presidential Decree Number 350/1985, Law Number 2651/1998, Law Number 3371/2005, Law Number 3401/2005, Directive 2003/71/EC, and Directive 2010/73/EU. The informative prospectus is subject to the approval of the Hellenic Capital Market Commission.

The prospectus must be complete, true, accurate and not misleading to the public. The prospectus must include data as to the features and characteristics of the applicant company and the securities intended to become listed. Abovementioned legislation specifies the content and the pattern of the prospectus. The prospectus should contain information on the persons being responsible for its issuance and its content, on the securities that are going to become listed, on the issuing company, including its capital, activities, property, financial status, and results, and information on the administration, management, supervision and auditing, and possibly on its business plans.

The prospectus is subject to the approval of the Hellenic Capital Market Commission. The Hellenic Capital Market Commission may opt for the partial or entire exemption from disclosing certain information as an exception, such as where the securities are shares given for free to beneficiaries of shares already listed on the Stock Exchange or securities that were the object of public offering or that are listed with a Stock Exchange of another EU member state. Furthermore, the Hellenic Capital Market Commission may permit the applicant company to not disclose certain information, should it consider that such information is insignificant and not able to influence the evaluation of the company's financial status and results, or contradicts, public interest or such that may cause a serious damage to the company (under the condition that such 'concealment' is not likely to mislead the public as to facts and circumstances important for evaluating the securities).

Information following Listing

Regulation of the Athens Stock Exchange provides the obligation for listed companies of periodic and unscheduled disclosure of information. Periodic disclosure has the meaning of provision of information on a company's financial status on a regular basis, being an annual, six-month, and three-month basis.

Listed companies are obliged to provide information regarding events that affect the company, such as general meetings to be convened, distribution and payment of dividends, issuance of new shares, acquisition and transfer of significant participation to a company's shareholding structure and, in general, events important for the company which are not otherwise accessible to the public and may affect the company's financial situation or the course of its operations. Provided that certain requirements are met, a company may be exempted from its obligation for the provision of certain information, if such disclosure is likely to cause serious damage to the company.

Supervision

In general, the rules of the International Organization of Securities Commissions are observed in Greece. Moreover, the Hellenic Capital Market Commission is a member of the International Organization of Securities Com missions. On a national level, supervision of the securities market is exercised by:

- The Ministry of Finance;
- The Hellenic Capital Market Commission;
- The Board of Directors of the Athens Stock Exchange; and
- The Athens Stock Exchange's members themselves, who must abide by the Stock Exchange Code of Ethics and comply with the Athens Stock Exchange Regulation.

Corporate Governance

Corporate governance issues are regulated by Law Number 3016/2002, which encompasses limited liability companies that follow a procedure to list or have already listed their shares or other securities with organized stock exchanges.

It is forbidden for a member of a listed company's board of directors or any third person entrusted with relevant duties to pursue interests that contravene the company's interests. Such persons should disclose potential or existing conflicts of interests to other members of the board. The obligations also cover the applicant or listed company's affiliated companies, as those are defined in Law Number 2190/1920. Unless minority shareholders' representatives participate on the board of directors, it is essential that at least two of the board's non-executive members be independent. Members are considered independent when:

- They do not have a professional or business relationship with the company, or any associated company, which may affect the company's activity;
- They are not the chairman of the board or managers of the company itself or of its affiliated companies; and
- They are connected to the company or to an affiliated by virtue of dependent employment or stipendiary mandate.

During their term with the board, independent members are not allowed to own shares exceeding 0.5 per cent of the company's total share capital. The existence of an internal operating regulation is a prerequisite for a company to become listed with the Athens Stock Exchange. The internal operating regulation is drafted by the company's board of directors, and must include the structure of the company's services, their objects, and the relationship between the services and the administration; the definition of the duties of the board (executive and non-executive members); the procedures for employing and evaluating managers; the monitoring procedures for transactions performed by the members of the board, the company's managers, and any other party who may have had access to internal information on securities, as a result of the person's relationship with the company; the procedures for announcing to the public major transactions; and the rules governing transactions between associated companies, the monitoring of transactions, and their timely disclosure to the company's organs and shareholders.

Moreover, it is required that the company has a completely independent internal audit department. Internal auditors must be independent, in the sense that, under no circumstances may members of the board, managers, or their close relatives become company's auditors.

National Treatment and Reciprocity

Listing of foreign companies with the Athens Stock Exchange is possible and, in principle, they fall under the same restrictions and have the same rights and obligations as Greek companies. A significant role is reserved to the legislation of the state of 'origin' of the foreign company.

The applicant foreign company should indicate in its application whether it has already filed an application with the Stock Exchange of another EU member state or intends to do so in the near future. In such cases, authorities of the EU member states shall cooperate. For instance, if the prospectus of a company having its seat in one of the EU member states has already been approved by the competent authority abroad, the Hellenic Capital Market Commission shall also in principle accept that approval for its own purposes.

In general, the authorities of both countries must exchange any information necessary for the acceleration of the admission procedure. Nevertheless, the Athens Stock Exchange is often cautious in disclosing information concerning the applicant company, since such information is protected by the principle of confidentiality.

Introduction

In General

Hong Kong has consistently been ranked as one of the top international financial centres in the world,[2] and is known to be amongst the world's freest economies.[3] Hong Kong prides itself in a market policy of minimum intervention in the way in which the market operates.

On 1 July 1997, Hong Kong reverted to Chinese sovereignty and became the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (HKSAR) of the People's Republic of China (PRC). The concept of a laissez faire free market is so important in Hong Kong that it is constitutionally enshrined in the Hong Kong Basic Law.[4]

Shortly after reversion to Chinese rule, Hong Kong was severely affected by the 1997 Asian financial crisis. During the Asian financial crisis, several brokerage firms collapsed (for example, CA Pacific Group and the Peregrine Group) resulting in significant client losses. Hong Kong, like much of Asia, also experienced extraordinary turmoil in the currency, securities and futures market, which the Hong Kong Government attributed to hedge funds speculating against the Hong Kong dollar link to the United States dollar. The extraordinary events of the Asian financial crisis highlighted the need for Hong Kong to upgrade its legislative framework for securities and futures market regulation. Against this background, the Securities and Futures Ordinance was implemented in 2003.

3 The Heritage Foundation has voted Hong Kong as the world's freest economy for the past 16 years (1995–2010).

4 Article 112 of the Hong Kong Basic Law provides: 'No foreign exchange control policies shall be applied in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region. The Hong Kong dollar shall be freely convertible. Markets for foreign exchange, gold, securities, futures and the like shall continue. The Government of the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region shall safeguard the free flow of capital within, into and out of the Region'. The Hong Kong Basic Law is the constitutional document of Hong Kong. It was adopted on 4 April 1990 by the Seventh National People's Congress (NPC) of the PRC, and went into effect on 1 July 1997.

One decade later, in September 2008, the global financial system experienced its first systemic crisis since the Great Depression of 1930 following the collapse of Lehman Brothers. Significant interventions by the governments in the United States of America and Europe have so far avoided a global financial system collapse.

However, the full impact of the 2008 global financial crisis is yet to be determined, and, coupled with the Eurozone debt crisis, financial and economic developments are still unfolding. Although Hong Kong was not at the epicentre of this crisis, it has nonetheless been affected.[5] This chapter is written at a time when further reforms are being proposed and implemented in the Hong Kong securities industry to address the challenges from this ongoing global financial crisis. It remains to be seen how extensive the changes instituted will be.

Regulatory System

The Financial Services Branch of the Financial Services and the Treasury Bureau of the Hong Kong Government is charged with the responsibility to maintain and enhance Hong Kong's status as a major international financial centre. It is tasked to ensure that Hong Kong's markets remain open, fair and efficient. While market regulatory functions are performed by independent statutory regulators, the Financial Services Branch facilitates and co-ordinates initiatives to upgrade overall market quality and to ensure that Hong Kong's regulatory regime meets the needs of the ever-changing financial market.[6]

The principal independent statutory regulators are the Securities and Futures Commission (SFC), the Hong Kong Monetary Authority (HKMA), the Office of the Commissioner of Insurance and the Mandatory Provident Fund Schemes Authority. They are responsible, respectively, for the regulation of securities and futures, banking, insurance and retirement scheme industries. The Securities and Futures Ordinance (SFO) is the principal legislation in Hong Kong regulating securities, futures and leveraged foreign exchange contracts, intermediaries and markets of Hong Kong.[7]

5 Examples include a run on Bank of East Asia (late September 2008), panicked policyholders following the US bailout of AIG, the Lehman minibonds fallout (where retail investors in structured investment products linked to Lehman Brothers suffered significant losses), and CITIC Pacific's HK $15.5 billion foreign exchange losses on leveraged structured foreign exchange derivatives (disclosed on 20 October 2008).

Authorities

Securities and Futures Commission

The SFC is an independent, non-governmental statutory body outside the civil service responsible for regulating the securities and futures market in Hong Kong. It was established in May 1989 following the enactment of the Securities and Futures Commission Ordinance (Cap 24).[8] Its regulatory functions and powers were expanded in 2003 when the SFO was implemented. Under the SFO, the SFC has six statutory regulatory objectives to:[9]

- Maintain and promote fairness, efficiency, competitiveness, transparency and orderliness of the securities and futures industry;
- Promote understanding by the public of the operation and functioning of the securities and futures industry;
- Provide protection for members of the public investing in or holding financial products;
- Minimise crime and misconduct in the securities and futures industry;
- Reduce systemic risks in the securities and futures industry; and
- Assist the Financial Secretary in maintaining the financial stability of Hong Kong by taking appropriate steps in relation to the securities and futures industry.

In achieving these objectives, the SFC supervises three main groups of participants in the securities market in Hong Kong, namely:[10]

- Intermediaries — brokers, investment advisers, asset managers and investment bankers who are engaged in regulated activities;
- Issuers of securities — listed companies and investment funds through an authorisation process to ensure that adequate and unbiased information is available to permit informed investment decisions; and
- Market operators — providers of trading platforms of securities, for example, HKEx, which is the holding company of the stock exchange, the futures exchange and the securities clearing company.

futures laws were spread over 10 Ordinances, namely: Securities and Futures Commission Ordinance (Cap 24), Commodities Trading Ordinance (Cap 250), Securities Ordinance (Cap 333), Protection of Investors Ordinance (Cap 335), Stock Exchange Unification Ordinance (Cap 361), Securities (Insider Dealing) Ordinance (Cap 395), Securities (Disclosure of Interests) Ordinance (Cap 396), Securities and Futures (Clearing Houses) Ordinance (Cap 420), Leveraged Foreign Exchange Trading Ordinance (Cap 451), Exchanges and Clearing Houses (Merger) Ordinance (Cap 555), and parts of the Companies Ordinance (Cap 32).

Hong Kong Exchange

The Hong Kong Exchanges and Clearing Limited (HKEx) was formed on 6 March 2000 by a merger of its three main constituent companies, namely, the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong Limited (SEHK),[11] Hong Kong Futures Exchange Limited (HKFE)[12] and Hong Kong Securities Clearing Company Limited.[13] The SFO allows the SFC to recognise a company as an exchange company. The recognition will be given where the SFC is satisfied that to do so is in the public interest or necessary for the purposes of proper regulation of the markets in securities and future contracts.[14]

When a company becomes a recognised exchange company, the SFC must publish notice of that fact in the Gazette.[15] The SEHK and HKFE are currently the only two recognised exchange companies in Hong Kong. Both are deemed to be recognised exchange companies under section 19(2) of the SFO by virtue of section 5(a), Part 1 of Schedule 10 of the SFO.[16] The duties of the recognised exchange companies are to:

- Ensure an orderly, informed and fair market, to operate its facilities in accordance with the rules approved by the SFC;[17]
- Formulate and implement appropriate procedures for ensuring that its exchange participants comply with its rules;[18]
- Notify the SFC in relation to compliance by its exchange participants;[19] and 11 As at 19 July 2012, Hong Kong's stock market was the seventh largest in the world and the third largest in Asia in terms of market capitalisation. There were 1344 companies listed in the SEHK, with a market capitalisation of US $2,376 billion. Among them, 700 were PRC Mainland enterprises which have together raised around HK$ 2,618 billion from 1993 to the end of July 2012. (Source: WFE, HKSE).

12 The HKFE is a trading platform for the derivatives market in Hong Kong. As at the end of July 2012, five types of futures products and two types of options products were traded on the HKFE or SEHK, including index futures, stock futures, RMB currency futures, interest rate futures, bond futures, gold futures, index options and stock options.

13 Hong Kong Exchanges and Clearing Limited (HKEx) is the holding company of the two exchanges (ie, Hong Kong Futures Exchange (HKFE) and SEHK) and the three clearing houses (ie, Hong Kong Securities Clearing Company (HKSCC), Stock Exchange of Hong Kong Options Clearing House Company (SEOCH) and Hong Kong Futures Exchange Clearing Corporation (HKCC)). HKEx is itself listed on the Hong Kong stock exchange (SEHK: 0388). The Hong Kong Government is the single largest shareholder in HKEx.

- Provide and maintain adequate and properly equipped premises, competent personnel and adequate automated systems.[20]

In performing their duties, the exchange companies are required to act in the interests of the public (having particular regard to the interests of the investing public) and to ensure that, where there is a conflict between the interests of the public and any other interest which it is required to serve under any other law, the interests of the public will prevail.[21]

A recognised exchange company, and any person acting on its behalf, acting in good faith in the discharge of its duties, is immunised from civil liability (whether arising in contract, tort, defamation, equity or otherwise).[22]

Hong Kong Mercantile Exchange Limited (HKMEx) obtained authorisation from the SFC on 26 April 2011 to provide the automatic trading system (ATS) and has commenced trading of gold futures contracts since 18 May 2011. While HKMEx is not the first ATS provider to be authorized by the SFC, nevertheless, its authorization is unique in that it is the first authorized ATS to:

- offer an exchange-like platform for the trading of futures contracts (i.e., a platform that matches buy and sell orders for futures contracts); and
- be solely or primarily regulated by the SFC.

Its position is similar to that of the Hong Kong Futures Exchange Limited (HKFE), which also operates a futures market in Hong Kong, albeit as a recognized exchange company rather than as an authorized ATS provider. The HKMEx provided standardised, cleared and exchange-traded products on a transparent pricing platform to the Asia-Pacific time zone. It was created to eliminate market liquidity risks associated with Asian market participants trading in faraway commodities exchanges such as New York and London.

On 18 May 2013, the HKMEx ceased to trade upon surrendering its authorisation to provide ATS. The Hong Kong Police have made a series of arrests in connection with the exchange, and are investigating its chairman, Mr. Barry Cheung.[23]

Procedures

Only Stock Exchange Participants (SEPs) and Futures Exchange Participants (FEPs) are allowed to deal in securities listed on the SEHK and trade in futures contracts on the HKFE, respectively. The SFO stipulates 10 types of regulated

20 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 21(6).

22 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 22(1). The same immunity is given to a recognised clearing house and exchange controller under Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 39.

activities that can be carried on by the SEHK and HKFE participants, corporations or individuals:[24]

- Regulated activity 1: Dealing in securities;
- Regulated activity 2: Dealing in futures contracts;
- Regulated activity 3: Leveraged foreign exchange trading;
- Regulated activity 4: Advising on securities;
- Regulated activity 5: Advising on futures contracts;
- Regulated activity 6: Advising on corporate finance;
- Regulated activity 7: Providing automated trading services;
- Regulated activity 8: Securities margin financing;
- Regulated activity 9: Asset management;[25] and
- Regulated activity 10: Providing credit rating services.[26]

All SEPs and FEPs, corporations or individuals, carrying on any regulated activities have to be licensed by or registered with the SFC. The SFO promulgates a single licensing regime where a person only needs one licence or registration to carry on different types of regulated activities. Each licence holder or regulated institution can hold licences for multiple regulated activities.

For the purpose of obtaining an SFC licence, the corporation will need to appoint at least two responsible officers to supervise each regulated activity it is licensed to 24 On 11 July 2012, the SFC and HKMA published their joint conclusions arising from responses to an earlier consultation paper on the proposed regulatory regime for OTC derivatives in Hong Kong released in October 2011. It was proposed to introduce two new regulated activities: (a) Type 11 regulated activity, which would capture the activities of dealers and advisers in the OTC derivatives market; and (b) Type 12 regulated activity, which will capture the activities of clearing agents including central counterparty (CCP) members and intermediaries between the CCP member and the counterparty. Authorised institutions and authorised money brokers will not have to be licensed (or registered) for the new Type 11 or Type 12 regulated activity; instead, their activities as OTC derivatives dealers, advisers and clearing agents will be overseen by the HKMA. However, they will need to be licensed (or registered) to the extent that their OTC derivatives activities overlap with an existing regulated activity, including the expanded Type 9 regulated activity.

25 The SFC/HKMA conclusion paper of 11 July 2012 (on the proposed regulatory regime for OTC derivatives in Hong Kong) proposed that the existing Type 9 regulated activity will be expanded to cover the management of portfolios of OTC derivatives (and therefore a person holding the expanded Type 9 licence will not be required to have instead a new Type 11 licence).

26 The new Type 10 regulatory regime was introduced in June 2011 to ensure that credit rating agencies are regulated in Hong Kong in a manner that is generally consistent with the enhanced standards that, in recent times, have been adopted in a number of other jurisdictions.

carry on, and at least one of the responsible officers must be a director who actively participates in or is responsible for directly supervising the regulated activity for which the corporation is licensed (known as an Executive Director). Every Executive Director who is an individual must be approved by the SFC as a responsible officer.

The same person may be designated as the responsible officer for different regulated activities, so long as he is found to be fit and proper to be licensed for that regulated activity and has sufficient authority within the corporation to carry out each such activity. In addition, there should not be any conflict of interest or confidentiality issues arising from a responsible officer's multiple functions. At least one of the relevant responsible officers should always be available to supervise each regulated activity, which means that at least one responsible officer must be resident in Hong Kong.

Any individual who carries on a regulated activity on behalf of a corporation will be required to be licensed as a representative accredited to the corporation. The individual will need to satisfy the SFC that he or she is a fit and proper person to be licensed and that grant of the licence will not prejudice the interests of the investing public. A licensed representative may be accredited to more than one licensed corporation. The SFC will refuse to grant a licence to a corporation to carry on a regulated activity unless the applying corporation satisfies the SFC that:

- It is a fit and proper person to be licensed;
- It will be able, if licensed to comply with the financial resources rules; and
- Where required under the SFO and subsidiary legislation, it is insured in accordance with rules made by the SFC.

The insurance requirement is currently only applicable to corporations licensed by the SFC for certain regulated activities. The capital and other financial requirements applicable to corporations licensed under the SFO are set out in the Financial Resources Rules (FRR). All licensed corporations are required to maintain a minimum paid-up share capital (subject to some limited exceptions) and a minimum liquid capital in accordance with the FRR.

The transactions on the SEHK and HKFE are cleared and settled through their three associated clearing houses, namely, the Hong Kong Securities Clearing Company (HKSCC), the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong Options Clearing House Company (SEOCH) and the Hong Kong Futures Exchange Clearing Corporation (HKFCC).[27]

Clearing and settlement in the stock market are carried out by the HKSCC through the Central Clearing and Settlement System (CCASS). For the derivatives market, 27 All three clearing houses are deemed to be 'recognised clearing houses' by virtue of section 6 of Part 1 of Schedule 10 of the Securities and Futures Ordinance.

the HKEx launched the Derivatives Clearing and Settlement System (DCASS) in early 2004. Trading on the SEHK is executed through a customised automated trading system known as the Automatic Order Matching and Execution System AMS/3.

Hong Kong Financial Market. Hong Kong ranks among the world's top financial centres, empowered by its favourable geographical location that bridges the time gap between New York and London, its strong links with Mainland China and the economies in Southeast Asia and excellent communication with the rest of the world, the rule of law, a level playing field for conducting business and a sound regulatory regime.

International financial institutions maintain a strong presence in the city. Of the world's top 100 banks, 71 have operations in Hong Kong. The majority of the licensed banks in Hong Kong are foreign-owned. The stock exchange in Hong Kong ranked sixth globally and second in Asia in terms of market capitalisation (approximately HK $22 trillion as of end 2012). Hong Kong remained in the top five worldwide in terms of raising funds through initial public offerings (IPOs) and HK $215 billion in the secondary market in 2012. The financial sector has a 230,400-strong workforce and contributed to 16.1 per cent of Hong Kong's GDP in 2012.[28] The Hong Kong stock market is an important fund-raising platform for Mainland enterprises. At the end of 2012, the 721 Mainland enterprises listed on the SEHK, raising HK$3.2 trillion from the Hong Kong market since 1993.

Foreign intermediaries were increasingly interested in setting up business operations in Hong Kong. The number of Stock Exchange Participants (SEPs) increased from 498 at the end of 2011 to 511 at the end of 2012. The futures market also saw an increase in the number of Futures Exchange Participants (FEPs), from 182 at the end of 2009 to 185 at the end of 2012.

The asset management industry is characterised by its strong international flavour, in terms of the presence of both global fund managers and the different domiciles of authorised funds. As at the end of 2012, 935 companies were licensed or registered to carry out asset management business, representing an increase of nine per cent from a year earlier. In addition to the SFC licensed corporations, banks and insurance companies also participate in asset management business.

Hong Kong also is a platform for offshore RMB settlement and fundraising. At the end of 2012, 204 banks, including 181 overseas banks, had become a Participating Bank of Hong Kong's RMB clearing platform to enable eligible enterprises to settle their merchandise experts in RMB. Hong Kong also is the first place outside Mainland China that has developed an RMB bond market. In 2012 alone, RMB issuance totalled RMB112.2 billion with outstanding RMB bonds amounting to RMB237.2 billion at the end of 2012, up more than 60 per cent from 2011, from a wide range of issuers from Mainland banks to Hong Kong and international corporations.

Relationship with Mainland China. The Closer Economic Partnership Arrangement (CEPA) between the Mainland and Hong Kong, which went into force in 2004, gives Hong Kong's financial services suppliers and professionals greater market access and flexibility for their operations in the Mainland. It has also enhanced Hong Kong's attractiveness to market users and strengthened the city's competitiveness as an international financial centre and the premier capital formation centre for Mainland enterprises.

Supplement VI was announced on 9 May 2009 and provides for qualified Mainland securities companies, approved by the China Securities Regulatory Commission (Chinese Securities Regulatory Commission), to set up subsidiaries in Hong Kong in accordance with the relevant requirements. This supplement also allows Hong Kong and Mainland securities companies to set up joint venture securities investment advisory companies (JV firms) in Guangdong. (The JV firm must be a subsidiary of the Mainland securities company, while the Hong Kong company's shareholding in the JV must not exceed one-third of the JV company's total shareholding). Supplement VI also allows both sides to study the introduction of open-ended index tracking ETFs, the portfolios of which are constituted of Hong Kong listed stocks, in the Mainland.

Supplement VII to CEPA was signed on 27 May 2010 and provides for Hong Kong bank's operating institution in the Mainland to apply to conduct RMB business to serve Hong Kong enterprises operating in the Mainland. The Mainland and Hong Kong will deepen cooperation in financial services and product developments, and ETF (open-end index-tracking exchange-traded funds) constituted by Hong Kong listed stocks will be launched in the Mainland.

Supplement VIII to CEPA was signed on 3 December 2011 and allows any Mainland-incorporated banking institution established by a Hong Kong bank to engage in the sale and distribution of mutual funds (and further enhancements in the Renminbi Qualified Foreign Institutional Investor).

Supplement IX to CEPA was signed on 29 June 2012 and allows Hong Kong securities companies, which satisfy the qualification requirements as foreign shareholders of foreign-invested securities companies, and Mainland securities companies, which satisfy the requirements for establishing subsidiaries, to set up equity joint venture securities investment advisory companies in the Mainland. The equity joint venture securities investment advisory company shall be a subsidiary of the Mainland securities company, the scope of business of which shall focus specifically on carrying on securities investment advisory businesses.

The shareholding of the Hong Kong securities company could, at a maximum, reach 49% of the total shareholding of such a joint venture securities investment advisory company.

HKEx also signed a Closer Cooperation Agreement (CCA) with the Shanghai Stock Exchange (SSE) on 21 January 2009 and a CCA with the Shenzhen Stock Exchange (SZSE) on 8 April 2009. The agreements commit HKEx to work more closely with the SSE and SZSE towards the common goals of meeting the domestic and international fund-raising needs of Mainland enterprises, and contributing to the greater development of the Mainland's economy.

Stock Exchange of Hong Kong. The function of prudential regulation of SEPs was transferred to the SFC upon the merger. Prior to SEHK, HKFE and HKSCC becoming subsidiaries of HKEx on 6 March 2000, it was necessary for an SEP or FEP to hold a share in the SEHK or HKFE, respectively, in order to trade on it or through its facilities. Furthermore, shareholders in the SEHK or HKFE had certain rights attached to their shareholdings, including voting rights at the Exchange's general meetings. However, they had no right to participate in the profits of the Exchanges. Following the merger, the shareholders of the Exchanges effectively exchanged their ownership rights in the Exchanges for economic interests in HKEx and the conventional right to receive dividends. Additionally, the previous trading rights of the shareholders remain.

Similarly, primary responsibility for the routine inspection of the businesses of Exchange Participants, monitoring their compliance with conduct rules and liquid capital requirements, and ensuring that they have proper systems of management and control in place, was transferred to the SFC. The HKEx became one of the first stock exchanges in the world to go public. Its shares were listed by way of introduction on the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong on 27 June 2000.

The SEHK operates two markets on which companies may choose to list their shares: the Main Board and the Growth Enterprise Market (GEM Board). The two markets target different types of companies and have different listing requirements. In general, the Main Board is for more established companies and has more stringent financial requirements, such as at least three years of track record and profits of HK $50 million in the past three years. GEM, on the other hand, targets growth companies from all industries and sizes that may not have a track record, but the GEM Listing Rules require companies to have at least 24 months of active business. For the purpose of illustrating key rules in securities regulations in Hong Kong, we will only discuss the application of rules as they relate to the Main Board.

Companies seeking to list securities on the SEHK are required to obtain the approval of and comply with the rules of SEHK. A company may list on the SEHK in various ways, through an initial public offering and/or a private placement of its shares or by way of introduction. Initial Public Offering (IPO) is a commonly used method whereby shares in the company are offered to the public at large. Generally speaking, an IPO can be conducted by way of a public offer of new shares for subscription or a public offer of issued shares held by existing shareholders for sale or a combination of both. In an IPO, investors can subscribe for the offer shares by using white forms, yellow forms or by EIPO (electronic application). In a private placement, the company will offer its shares to selected investors.

Often, the shares being offered to the public may consist of new shares to be issued by a company (offer for subscription) or a portion of issued shares held by existing shareholders (offer for sale) or a combination of both new and issued shares. Generally, in an offer for sale, the issued shares offered for sale are held by existing major shareholders who intend to cash out part of their shareholdings at the time of the IPO. If a company offers new shares during an IPO, the funds raised from the issue of the new shares will generate proceeds for the company's future use. Funds raised from the sale of issued shares will benefit only those existing shareholders.

Other than by the IPO, a company also may list on the SEHK by way of introduction. In such a case, the company's shares are already widely held by a large number of shareholders prior to listing so that there will be no offer of new or issued shares to the public. Also, a company will not raise funds through this way of listing. The mechanics of these different methods of applying for listing are discussed in the section 'Public Offerings'.

Transborder Electronic Trading Systems. The SEHK has an entirely automated trading mechanism with the development of its new customised automated trading system known as the Automatic Order Matching and Execution System (AMS). This system supports either the manual or the fully automated method of trade execution. Under the AMS, orders entered in respect of auto-match stocks may be matched and executed automatically on the basis of price/time priority. Orders are matched in the order in which they are entered into the AMS based on the best price. The trading of these securities is governed by the SEHK rules 506A (relating to intra-day quotations for bids) and 507A (relating to intra-day quotations for requests) for intra-day quotations.

Short selling (where, for example, a trader can deal in securities that he does not own) is generally prohibited in Hong Kong. However, short selling is permitted on a limited basis (for example, where a viable stock borrowing and lending market was in existence at the time of the sale). All short selling activity is subject to SEHK Rules (in particular, the Short Selling Regulations in the Eleventh Schedule to the Rules). One such rule is that short selling may only be effected through the use of the auto-matching function of the AMS. This is to provide the SEHK with real-time information to assist in monitoring short selling activity.

Settlement of securities trading in Hong Kong was revolutionised by the introduction of the CCASS in June 1992. The CCASS computerises the whole delivery and payment settlement process, and eliminates the need for physical transfer of securities, thereby reducing the level of risks that all interested parties were previously exposed to (credit risk, liquidity risk, replacement risk and systemic risk). The vast majority of trading on the SEHK now takes place through the CCASS.

Under the CCASS, the HKSCC accepts share certificates from its participants and holds them in the CCASS Depository. Clearing and settlements in the stock market are carried out by the HKSCC through the CCASS. Accordingly, only electronic share credits and values are issued. As the HKSCC is the settlement counterparty to all broker participants, it may be exposed to risk of loss if the other party fails to meet its obligations. Hence, all broker participants of the CCASS are required to, among other things, contribute to a guarantee fund of the HKSCC, have a minimum liquid capital of HK $3,000,000 (as imposed by the Board of HKSCC on 3 October 2005), and, if required by the HKSCC as security, provide a bank guarantee or form of insurance to secure an amount of not less than HK $100 million.

For the derivatives market, the Derivatives Clearing and Settlement System (DCASS) was launched in Hong Kong in April 2004. The DCASS is a fully electronic and automated clearing and settlement system capable of supporting various types of derivatives products. The DCASS comprises the core derivatives clearing and settlement functionality, the margining engine and the Common Collateral Management System (CCMS). The CCMS, which also serves CCASS users, supports the management of collateral for the cash and derivative markets.

Securities Offerings

National Treatment and Reciprocity

The basic conditions which must be met to list securities in Hong Kong are set out in the Rules Governing the Listing of Securities on the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong Limited (Listing Rules)[29] and the Rules Governing the Listing of Securities on the Growth Enterprise Market of The Stock Exchange of Hong Kong Limited (GEM Listing Rules). These rules are applicable to applicants and issuers on the Main Board and GEM Board, respectively. The SEHK is self-regulatory in nature[30] and has the power to make rules, subject to the supervision of the SFC[31]

29 References to 'Listing Rules' in this chapter refer to the relevant rules and appendices of the Listing Rules, unless otherwise specified.

30 In Sanyuan Group Ltd v The Stock Exchange of Hong Kong, FAMV 52/2009, the Court of Appeal confirms the regulator's power to apply a flexible approach to interpret the Listing Rules (Listing Rules 13.24) in a relisting application. The decision is consistent with the function of the Stock Exchange to protect investors and maintain a fair, orderly and efficient market. Applicants seeking to overturn the decision of a regulator should ensure that they have a sound basis for challenge. As Stone J cautioned in the Court of Appeal decision, in the absence of lack of due process or procedural unfairness, 'any court should hesitate long and hard before moving to interfere with the decision of a market regulator'.

31 Section 5(1)(b), Securities and Futures Ordinance. Amendments to the Listing Rules are subject to Securities and Futures Commission's approval under section 24, Securities and Futures Ordinance (Listing Rules 2.05).

and the oversight of the courts. It has absolute discretion to accept or reject an application for listing. Compliance with the conditions set out in the Listing Rules or the GEM Listing Rules does not in itself ensure that an applicant will be accepted as being suitable for listing (or a company could maintain its listed status). The listing of a company on the Exchange is governed in such a way as to ensure that investors have and can maintain confidence in the market.

Prospective applicants are encouraged by the SEHK to approach it for informal and confidential guidance as to the eligibility of a proposed listing at an early stage. The Listing Rules divide securities into two categories, namely, equity securities and debt securities. This chapter presents the key principles and rules governing securities offering with reference to the Main Board Listing Rules only and examines only the rules relating to the listing of equity securities. The key principles of the Main Board Listing Rules and the GEM Listing Rules are set out below:

- Applicants are suitable for listing;
- Issue and marketing of securities are conducted in a fair and orderly manner and potential investors are given sufficient information to enable them to make a properly informed assessment of the issuing company;
- Investors and the public are kept fully informed by the listed companies, and in particular immediate disclosure is made of any information which might reasonably be expected to have a material effect on market activity in, and the prices of, the listed securities;
- All holders of listed securities are treated fairly and equally; and
- Directors of a listed company act in the interests of its shareholders as a whole, particularly where the public represents only a minority of the shareholders.

The conditions set out in the Listing Rules apply to both local and foreign companies, with certain additional requirements, modifications and exceptions which apply in the case of foreign companies. There are also additional rules applicable to investment vehicles,[32] which are beyond the scope of this chapter. Similarly, the Listing Rules apply equally to companies which are new to the capital market and those whose securities are already listed on another exchange. In the case of Mainland incorporated enterprises, certain additional requirements, modifications and exceptions are required to reflect their judicial system and operating environment.[33] The SEHK has also revised rules specific to mineral companies[34] to ensure investors are provided with material, relevant and reliable information relating to mineral and/or petroleum assets.[35]

32 Listing Rules, chs 20 and 21.

33 Listing Rules, ch 19A sets out the additional requirements, modification and exceptions that apply to issuers incorporated in the PRC.

34 'Mineral Company' is defined at Listing Rules 18.01.

35 Listing Rules, ch 18, came into effect 3 June 2010, setting out: (i) additional eligibility and disclosure requirements for new listing of mineral companies; (ii) disclosure

The following sections examine the general requirements of the Listing Rules relating to the company applying for listing, the securities to be listed, and the prospectus to be prepared and distributed in connection with the proposed listing. Rules relating to corporate governance, as well as initiating or registration of public offers, placements and secondary dealings, are also described in the subsequent sections. Any company, local or foreign, seeking to obtain a primary listing on the SEHK must satisfy the conditions set out below.

Issuer Requirements

Due Incorporation. The company applying for listing must be duly incorporated or otherwise established under the laws of the place where it is incorporated or otherwise established and must be in conformity with those laws and its memorandum and articles of association or equivalent documents.[36]

The SEHK reserves the right to refuse to list a foreign company and its securities if it believes that it is either not in the public interest to do so or if it is not satisfied that the foreign company is incorporated or established in a jurisdiction with standards of shareholder protection at least equivalent to those in Hong Kong. Some of these defects may be remedied by amending the foreign company's constitutional documents and/or, in the case of listing of debt securities, the terms of the listing agreement (entered into between the foreign company and SEHK) to provide the requisite standards of shareholder protection.

In general, only companies incorporated in Hong Kong, Bermuda and the Cayman Islands or certain specific types of PRC-incorporated companies are in approved jurisdictions for listing on the SEHK. The SEHK has indicated that a number of other jurisdictions are acceptable for the purpose of a primary listing in Hong Kong.[37]

The SEHK has established a uniform approach for reviewing shareholder protection standards of companies incorporated in other overseas jurisdictions and will view more favourably those jurisdictions whose securities regulators are either full signatories to the International Organization of Securities Commissions Multilateral Memorandum of Understanding concerning Consultation and Co-operation and the Exchange of Information (IOSCO MMoU) or have entered into bi-lateral co-operation agreements with the SFC.

For a Mainland Chinese company, it must be duly incorporated in the PRC as a joint-stock limited company. Its articles of association are required to include all the provisions set out in the set of mandatory provisions for Mainland Chinese enterprises seeking a listing in Hong Kong or elsewhere outside the PRC (ie, Mandatory Provisions for Companies Listed Overseas) which are laid down by requirements for transactions involving mineral and/or petroleum assets; and (iii) continuing obligations to provide update on issuers' mining operations.

the People's Republic of China State Council Securities Policy Committee and the State Commission for Restructuring the Economy System.[38] In addition to these provisions, a Mainland Chinese company is required to include in its articles of association provisions relating to, inter alia, the protection of class rights and the change, removal and resignation of auditors.

Accounts and Financial Periods. The prospectus must contain an accountants' report (including balance sheets, income statements and cash flow statements) on the last three audited financial year results.[39] To ensure that investors are able to rely on information which is as up to date as can reasonably be expected, the most recent financial period reported in the prospectus must not have ended more than six months before the date of the prospectus, otherwise, an interim (or stub) set of accounts is required for part of the current financial year.[40]

The SEHK will not normally consider an application for listing from any company which has changed the dates of its financial year during the 12 months immediately preceding the proposed date of issue of the prospectus; or which intends to change its financial year-end during the period of its profit forecast as set out in the prospectus or during its current financial year. However, where there are genuine and valid reasons for change in a company's financial year-end, the SEHK may be prepared to waive this requirement, subject to a strict scrutiny process.

All accountants' reports must be prepared in conformity with Hong Kong Financial Reporting Standards or International Financial Reporting Standards (or China Accounting Standards for Business Enterprises in the case of a PRC-incorporated company that has adopted such standards for the preparation of its annual financial results).[41]

Adequate Track Record under Same Management. The company must demonstrate management continuity for at least the last three preceding financial years and ownership continuity and control for at least the most recent audited financial year. The company also must satisfy either the profit test, the market capitalisation/revenue/cash flow test, or the market capitalisation/revenue test set out below:

38 Set forth in Zheng Wei Fa (1994), Number 21, issued on 27 August 1994 (Listing Rules Appendix 13, Part D).

39 Listing Rules 4.04 and 4.05, and paras 27 and 32 of the Third Schedule to the Companies Ordinance.

40 Listing Rules 8.06.

41 Listing Rules 4.11. Hong Kong listed entities that are domiciled in Mainland China may submit financial information to Hong Kong securities regulators using China Accounting Standards for Business Enterprises. These companies also can appoint PRC audit firms vetted by China's Ministry of Finance to act as their auditors and reporting accountants.

	Track Record	Requirements
Profit test[42]	A trading record of not less than three financial years during which profit attributable to shareholders in the most recent year must not be less than HK $20 million, and in respect of the two preceding years be in aggregate not less than HK $30 million, in the ordinary course of business
Market capitalisation/ revenue/cash flow test[43]	Trading record of at least three financial years	Market capitalisation of at least HK $2 billion; at the time of listing; revenue of at least HK $500 million for the most-recent audited financial year; and positive cash flow of at least HK $100 million in total for three preceding financial years
Market capitalisation/ revenue test[44]	Trading record of at least three financial years	Market capitalisation of at least HK $4 billion; revenue of at least HK $500 million for the most recent audited financial year

Many potential applicants query whether the company's acquisitions prior to listing can be grouped together to meet the track record criteria. While a company is free to acquire and dispose of assets at any time, it may be difficult to satisfy the SEHK that the company meets the management and ownership continuity requirements where it has acquired new businesses during the track record period or where the companies comprising the group to be listed have been recently organised into a group. The following factors will be taken into account where the company has acquired new businesses during the track record period:[45]

- Whether the new business forms a material part of the company's business at the time of listing;
- Whether the new business is forecast to make a material contribution to the company's profit forecast;

42 Listing Rules 8.05(1).
43 Listing Rules 8.05(2).
44 Listing Rules 8.05(3).
45 Listing Rules, para 4 of PN3.

- Whether the new business is in a similar line to that of the company's previous business activities and is part of the logical growth trend of the business;
- Whether the company has retained the management of the new business and whether it can be demonstrated to the SEHK that necessary continuity and synergy of the management is provided;
- The period of time which has elapsed since completion of the acquisition; and
- Whether the new group has been formed solely for the purpose of satisfying the listing requirements or to enhance the apparent attractiveness of the group as a new applicant for listing.

Generally, the issue of materiality and compliance with the requirements set out above will be determined by the SEHK, in its sole discretion. There are a number of specific rulings on management and ownership continuity which are beyond the scope of this chapter, details of which are available on the HKEx website.

The SEHK encourages potential listing companies which have made acquisitions during the track record period, which intend to make an acquisition prior to listing or where there has been a material change in management or ownership of the company during the track record period to contact the SEHK for confidential advice before submitting a listing application.[46]

Where a new applicant acquires any material subsidiary or business during the trading record period and such an acquisition if made by a listed company would have been classified as a major transaction or a very substantial acquisition,[47] it must disclose pre-acquisition financial information on that material subsidiary or business from the commencement of the trading record period (or, if the material subsidiary or business commenced its business after the commencement of the trading record period, then from the date of the commencing of its business) to the date of acquisition. Pre-acquisition financial information on the material subsidiary or business must normally be drawn up in conformity with accounting policies adopted by the new applicant and be disclosed in the form of a note to the accountants' report or in a separate accountants' report.[48]

Working Capital Requirements. The company applying for listing on the SEHK must include a working capital statement in the prospectus, stating that it and its subsidiaries, if any, have available sufficient working capital for the group's requirements for at least the next 12 months from the date of publication of the prospectus. The sponsor of the new applicant also must confirm to the SEHK that:[49]

- It has obtained written confirmation from the company that the working capital is sufficient; and

46 Listing Rules 2.06.

47 The classification of major transactions and very substantial acquisitions is discussed in the section headed 'Regulated Market and Compliance with Listing Rules', below.

48 Listing Rules 4.05A

49 Listing Rules 8.21A.

- It is satisfied that this confirmation has been given after due and careful enquiry and that the persons/institutions providing finance have stated in writing that the relevant financing facilities exist.

The SEHK makes an exception for a new applicant whose business is entirely or substantially that of the provision of financial services, provided the inclusion of such a statement would not provide significant information for investors; and the new applicant's solvency and capital adequacy are subject to stringent supervision by another regulatory body. In the case of a mineral company, it must have available working capital to meet 125 per cent of the group's working capital needs for the next 12 months.[50]

Suitability for Listing. The company and its business must, in the opinion of the SEHK, be suitable for listing.[51] A company (other than an investment company) whose assets comprise wholly or substantially of cash or short-dated securities will not normally be regarded as suitable for listing. The SEHK retains the discretion to decide on whether an applicant is suitable for listing.

A company that satisfies all the technical requirements, but is rejected for listing on policy grounds (ie, suitability for listing), may appeal such decision to the Listing (Review) Committee[52] (and, if unsuccessful, to the Listing Appeals Committee).[53]

Protection for Minority Shareholders. The Listing Rules provide that, in case of both primary and secondary listing on the SEHK, the foreign company must show that the jurisdiction in which it is incorporated or established provides the same standards of shareholder protection as those provided in Hong Kong.[54]

In respect of companies incorporated in Bermuda, the Cayman Islands and the PRC, additional requirements are set out in Appendix 13 and Chapter 19A of the Listing Rules.

Local Management Presence. The company must have sufficient management presence in Hong Kong.[55] This will usually require at least two of the executive directors to be ordinarily resident in Hong Kong.

In SEHK's guidance letter (GL9-09), the SEHK sets out the conditions it would normally expect to see in any application for a waiver of strict compliance with this requirement, which focus on the communication arrangement with the SEHK.

Securities Requirements

In General. The shares must be admitted to trading on the Main Board[56] or the GEM Board. The securities for which listing is sought must be freely transferable. Partly-paid securities will normally be regarded as fulfilling this condition provided that in the view of the SEHK their transferability is not unreasonably restricted and dealings in them can take place on an open and proper basis.[57]

Existing issued securities which are offered for sale on an instalment payment basis, approved by the Exchange, will normally be regarded as fulfilling this condition.[58]

Sufficient Public Interest and Public Float. There must be an open market in the securities for which listing is sought. This will normally mean that at least 25 per cent of the company's total share capital must at all times be held by the public, subject to exemptions and the discretion of the SEHK in accepting a lower percentage.[59] The definition of 'the public' expressly states the SEHK will not regard any connected person,[60] any person financed by a connected person, or any person who is a customer to take instructions from a connected person in relation to the acquisition, disposal, voting or other disposition of securities, as members of the public.[61] Hong Kong market practice is for there to be a retail part of the Hong Kong offering.

Where a new applicant has a controlling shareholder (holding 30 per cent or more voting rights with specific rules for PRC-incorporated companies) with an interest in a business apart from the applicant's business which competes or is likely to compete, either directly or indirectly, with the applicant's business, the applicant must make certain disclosures and comply with certain requirements to the satisfaction of the SEHK.[62]

Market Capitalisation. At the time of listing, the market capitalisation, including the newly listed shares, must be at least HK $200 million.[63]

Fair Voting Rights. The share capital of the company applying for listing must not include any shares with a voting power which does not bear a reasonable relationship to the equity interest of such shares.[64]

60 The term 'connected person' is very widely defined in the Listing Rules. This generally includes directors (including persons who were directors in the last 12 months), chief executive, substantial shareholders (defined as holders of 10 per cent or more of the listed company's shares) of the listed company or any of its subsidiaries or an associate of any of them.
61 Listing Rules 8.24 (also see discussion under section headed 'Securities Offering - Public').
62 Listing Rules 8.10.
63 Listing Rules 8.08 and 8.09(2).

Transferability. The shares for which listing is sought must be freely transferable.[65]

Eligible Securities. The securities must be accepted as being eligible by the HKSCC for deposit, clearance and settlement in the CCASS in accordance with the General Rules of CCASS from the date on which dealings in the securities are to commence.

The company also must make all the necessary arrangements to ensure that the securities for which listing is sought comply with this requirement and will continue to comply after dealings in them commence. The SEHK has absolute discretion to waive compliance with the above requirement, but will only do so in exceptional circumstances.

Validly Issued Securities. The securities for which listing is sought must conform to the laws of the place where the foreign company is incorporated (or otherwise established), as well as the company's constitutional documents.

All authorisations required for the creation and issue of the securities under such law or constitutional documents of the company must have been duly given.

Listed Securities. Where an application for listing is made in respect of any class of securities, if none of the securities of that class are listed, the application must relate to all the securities of that class issued or proposed to be issued; or if some of the securities of that class are already listed, the application must relate to all further securities of that class issued or proposed to be issued.[66]

Hong Kong Registrar and Register. Every local company must employ an approved share registrar to maintain its register of shareholders in Hong Kong. A foreign company must arrange for a register of Hong Kong shareholders to be maintained and for transfers to be registered in Hong Kong.

Only in exceptional circumstances may the SEHK consider an alternative arrangement for registration of transfers for Hong Kong shareholders, in which case a share transfer agent will have to be appointed in Hong Kong.[67] Usually, only securities registered on the Hong Kong Register may be traded on the SEHK.[68] Where the foreign company has two or more share registers (one of which is maintained in Hong Kong), the Hong Kong register need only contain particulars of the shares registered in Hong Kong.[69]

A scriptless securities regime also will be implemented to provide investors with flexibility of holding securities in physical certificates or in paperless form. The paperless option will enable investors to hold securities in their own names as registered holders. The Companies (Amendment) Ordinance 2010 removes existing limitation in the Companies Ordinance that compels the issue or use of paper documents of title and transfer.

Service of Process. A foreign company is normally required to appoint, and maintain the appointment of, an agent authorised to accept service of process and notices on its behalf in Hong Kong. The SEHK will require certain prescribed information relating to the process agent.

Notice must be given to the SEHK of the appointment of any such process agent,[70] and any termination of appointment. There is an equivalent obligation imposed on the foreign company by Part XI of the Companies Ordinance.[71]

Accountant and Property Valuation Reports. The reporting accountants and property valuers acting for any company must be shown to have the requisite level of skills and experience required by the SEHK.

Debt Securities. The types of debt securities which can be listed on the Exchange are:

- Debt securities listed under Chapter 22 to Chapter 36 of the Listing Rules — this kind of debt securities can be invested by public investors.
- Debt securities listed under Chapter 37 of the Listing Rules — this kind of debt securities are offered to professional investors only and not offered to public investors in Hong Kong.[72]

Debt securities listed on the HKEx can also be categorised into various categories, including Corporate Bonds, Convertible Bonds, Exchange Fund Notes (EFN), and Government/Supranational bonds (GSB) Prospectus Requirements.

In General. 'Prospectus' is defined in section 2 of the Companies Ordinance as follows:

> '(a) subject to paragraph (b), means any prospectus, notice, circular, brochure, advertisement, or other document –
> > '(i) offering any shares in or debentures of a company (including a company incorporated outside Hong Kong, and whether or not it has established a place of business in Hong Kong) to the public for subscription or purchase for cash or other consideration; or

> ‘(ii) calculated to invite offers by the public to subscribe for or purchase for cash or other consideration any shares in or debentures of a company (including a company incorporated outside Hong Kong, and whether or not it has established a place of business in Hong Kong);
> ‘(b) does not include any prospectus, notice, circular, brochure, advertisement, or other document –

> ‘(ii) to the extent that it contains or relates to an offer specified in Part 1 of the Seventeenth Schedule as read with the other Parts of that Schedule.’

Any listing document that is within the definition of ‘prospectus’ must comply with the requirements of the Listing Rules and the Companies Ordinance (in particular, the Third Schedule to the Companies Ordinance). This is irrespective of whether the company is incorporated within or outside Hong Kong.

Every prospectus is required to be registered with the Registrar of Companies. The Registrar of Companies will only register a prospectus if it is authorised to do so by the SEHK. The SEHK will review a prospectus for compliance with both the Listing Rules and the Companies Ordinance.

It will not authorise a prospectus for registration by the Registrar of Companies until it is satisfied that it has no further comments on such prospectus in respect of both the Listing Rules and the Companies Ordinance requirements, and is prepared to grant a listing of the securities to which such prospectus relates. In very limited circumstances, exemptions from compliance with the technical requirements of the Companies Ordinance may be obtained from the SFC.[73]

Companies Ordinance Requirements. A company offering securities (both equity and debt securities) to the public is required to register a prospectus in compliance with the provisions of the Companies Ordinance.[74] A company is exempted from the requirements of the Companies Ordinance where:

- The offer is a bona fide invitation to a person to enter into an underwriting agreement with respect to the securities;[75]
- The securities (or debentures) in question are not offered to the public;[76]

73 Companies Ordinance, ss 38A and 342A.
74 Companies Ordinance, ss 38(3) and 342(3).
75 Companies Ordinance, s 38(3)(a).
76 Companies Ordinance, s 38(3)(a).

- The offer is to existing holders and relates to shares in (or debentures of) the company, whether or not there is a right to renounce in favour of other persons;[77] or
- The offer relates to shares (or debentures) of a type which is in all respects uniform with the shares (or debentures) previously issued and for the time being listed on the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong.[78]

Prospectus Requirements. A prospectus must be dated. Unless the contrary is proved, that date shall be taken as the date of publication of the prospectus.[79]

The prospectus must either be in English and contain a Chinese translation, or in Chinese and contain an English translation.[80] The SFC exercised its powers under section 38A to enable the issue of separate English and Chinese versions of a prospectus, so long as both versions are available to the public at each place where, and for so long as, the distribution of the prospectus continues. The prospectus[81] must contain the following statement in a prominent position:[82]

'Important - If you are in any doubt about any of the contents of this prospectus, you should obtain independent professional advice.'

Under section 38(1) of the Companies Ordinance, a prospectus must contain the information specified in Part I of the Third Schedule, which includes:

- The general nature of the business of the company;
- The authorised and issued share capital;
- The financial condition and profitability of the company;
- The details relating to the directors, including their names, descriptions, addresses and the provisions in the articles of association relating to their remuneration and share qualification;
- The particulars relating to the shares offered to the public for subscription or sale;
- The details of any property to be acquired with the proceeds of the share issue;
- The expenses of the share issue;
- The interests of the directors and the promoters of the company in any property to be acquired by the company;
- The contents of the articles of association of the company with regard to any borrowing powers;

77 Companies Ordinance, s 38(5)(a).
78 Companies Ordinance, s 38(5)(b).
79 Companies Ordinance, s 37.
80 Companies Ordinance, s 38(1).
81 If there is any doubt about any of the contents of this prospectus, one should obtain independent professional advice.
82 Companies Ordinance, s 38(1A). The statement is specified in Part 1 of Schedule 18 to the Companies Ordinance. The Chinese version of the statement also is prescribed.

- The particulars of any bank overdrafts or other similar indebtedness of the company;
- The particulars of any hire purchase commitments, guarantees, or other material contingent liabilities of the company and its subsidiaries;
- The particulars of the issued debentures of the company and its subsidiaries;
- The particulars of the auditors of the company;
- The particulars of the company's material contracts;[83] and
- The gross trading income or sales turnover of the company during the three preceding years.

In addition, Part II of the Third Schedule requires a number of reports to be set out in the prospectus, namely:

- A report by the auditors of the company on the profits and losses, assets and liabilities, and the rates of dividends paid by the company in the three preceding years;
- A report by the accountants of the company on the profits and losses and the assets and liabilities of any business to be acquired with the proceeds of the share issue; and
- A valuation report with respect to all of the company's interests in land or buildings which exceed 10 per cent of the value of the assets of the company, or which have a value which is equal to or more than HK $3 million.

A breach of section 38(1) and (1A) of the Companies Ordinance will render the company and any knowing party liable to a fine.[84] Any contract purporting to exclude the requirements of section 38 of the Companies Ordinance is void.[85] Compliance with section 38 does not limit or diminish any liability under general law or the Companies Ordinance.[86]

Listing Rules. The SEHK's contents requirements set out in Appendix 1 of the Listing Rules apply to all listing documents, whether or not the listing document in question constitutes a prospectus as defined in the Companies Ordinance. Parts A and B of Appendix 1 set out the contents requirements which apply to listing of equity securities. Part C of Appendix 1 deals with listing of debt securities, and 83 The general view is that a contract is material if knowledge of its existence can reasonably be expected to affect the share price of the company (regardless of whether the affect on price is great or small). The dates, parties and general nature of every material contract must be disclosed. Contracts that are entered into in the ordinary course of business of the company, or more than two years before the date of issue of the prospectus, are generally not considered material.

84 Companies Ordinance, s 38(1B).

85 Companies Ordinance, s 38(2).

86 Companies Ordinance, s 38(6).

Part D of Appendix 1 deals with structured products. Parts E and F of Appendix 1 deal with listing of depositary receipts.

Apart from the requirements of Appendix 1, a company applying for listing also is required to consider the modifications set out in the relevant sections of the Listing Rules (eg, the detailed requirements for accountants' and property valuers' reports in chapters 4 and 5 of the Listing Rules). In the case of equity securities, chapter 19 (Foreign issuers) and chapter 19A (Issuers incorporated in the PRC) of the Listing Rules may be relevant.

A listing document is defined[87] as a prospectus, a circular and any equivalent document (including a scheme of arrangement and introduction document) issued or proposed to be issued in connection with an application for listing.[88] The listing document must be in English accompanied by a Chinese translation.[89]

A listing document which is a prospectus within the meaning of the Companies Ordinance[90] also must comply with and be registered with the Registrar of Companies in accordance with the Companies Ordinance.[91] The latest financial period reported on by the reporting accountants in a listing document must not have ended more than six months before the date of the listing document.[92]

The final proof of the listing document must be lodged with the SEHK.[93] A pilot scheme requiring new listing applicants to post a web-proof information pack (WPIP) on the HKEx news or the Growth Enterprise Market website, as applicable, prior to the issue of an IPO prospectus was commenced on 1 January 2008. The pilot scheme is intended to help level the playing field for institutional and retail investors in the receipt of information about a listing applicant prior to the commencement of the public offering.

Corporate Governance

In General

'Corporate governance' refers to the system by which companies are directed and controlled (as opposed to 'management', which refers to the way in which companies are operated). The SFC, the SEHK and the Registrar of Companies take an active interest in promoting corporate governance in Hong Kong.

The SFC acts as an independent statutory body with licensing and supervisory powers over the securities, futures and financial investment industries, to ensure the integrity of the securities market and promote Hong Kong as an international financial centre. Where listed companies are concerned, the HKEx performs a self-regulatory function by regulating listed companies, with all its rules being subject to SFC approval. The Registrar of Companies also has an active and increasing (through the Companies Ordinance rewrite) role in the development of corporate governance practices in Hong Kong. The common regulatory objective is to ensure that directors conduct the company's business fairly, with due regard for the interests of public shareholders and other stakeholders.

However, 'fairness' is judgemental and difficult to regulate directly. Hence, in reality, regulators tend to focus on the processes of corporate governance by setting rules, such as board composition, voting procedures and adequacy of disclosures to monitor compliance with these processes, and try to reinforce them with education about ethical standards. This section will provide an overview of the rules in Hong Kong relating to corporate governance.

Code on Corporate Governance Practice

In General. The HKEx enacted the Corporate Governance Code (the Code) in 2012 (previously the Code on Corporate Governance Practices in 2005, which replaced the 1993 Code of Best Practice).[94] The regulatory framework is designed to give issuers flexibility in implementing its corporate governance systems whilst protecting investors and the market. The Code sets out the principles of good corporate governance and contains two levels of recommendations: (a) code provisions, which are rules that listed companies are expected to comply with but may choose to deviate from; and (b) recommended best practices, which are for guidance only. Companies also may devise their own corporate governance policy on such terms as they may consider appropriate. Listed companies must state whether they have complied with the code provisions as set out in the Code for the relevant accounting period in their interim reports (and summary interim reports, if any) and annual reports (and summary annual reports, if any).[95] Where a listed company deviates from the code provisions as set out in the Code, it must give considered reasons.[96] In the case of the recommended best practices, listed companies are encouraged, but are not required, to state whether they have complied with them or give considered reasons for any deviation.[97] The following summarises briefly the essential core provisions and recommended best practices under the Code:

	Code Provisions	Recommended Best Practices
Board Meetings	• The board should meet at least four times a year at approximately quarterly intervals	• Insurance coverage is required for directors and officers (section 165 of the Companies

94 This section provides a non-exhaustive outline on the Corporate Governance Code. Particular attention should be drawn to the amendments to the Listing Rules and the Code, which will take effect on 1 January 2012, 1 April 2012 and 31 December 2012.

99 The Listing Rules was amended (effective 1 April 2012) to require issuers to set up a remuneration committee with specific terms of reference and the committee's chairman and a majority of the members to be independent non-executive directors. Listing Rules 3.25-27

	• There must be annual review of internal control
Delegation by the Board	• Proper delegation to management and proper communication with and approval from the board before decision making must be provided • Sufficiently clear terms of reference for committees and feedback to the board must be prescribed	• Division of responsibility between board and management must be disclosed
Communication with Shareholders	• A 20-day notice for AGM is required • Proper resolutions at each general meeting must be prepared • Procedures for voting by poll in place must be provided[100]

Directors' Qualifications. Each director must satisfy the requirements of Chapter 3 of the Listing Rules, including satisfying the SEHK that he has the necessary character, experience and integrity to act as director of a listed company.

The board must include at least three independent non-executive directors and at least one of the independent non-executive directors must have appropriate professional qualifications or accounting or related financial management expertise.[101]

Competing Business of Controlling Shareholder. If the controlling shareholder (being a person, or group of persons, who exercise or control the exercise of control of 30 per cent or more of the company or who is in a position to control the composition of a majority of the board) or any director of the company has an interest in a business which competes or is likely to compete, either directly or indirectly, with the company's business, various disclosures must be made in the listing document.

Statutory Protection for Auditors. Auditors of all listed companies are accorded statutory protection which enables them to report any reasonable suspicion of fraud to the SFC or other appropriate authorities without having to risk an action being brought against them for any civil liability (including breach of confidentiality and for defamation).[102]

The New CO also provides for qualified privilege for any oral and written statements an auditor may make during the course of an audit and in respect of their resignation.[103]

Financial Reporting Council. The Financial Reporting Council is an independent statutory body set up under the Financial Reporting Council Ordinance. The Financial Reporting Council was established on 1 December 2006 and became fully operational on 16 July 2007. The Financial Reporting Council is responsible for:

- Conducting independent investigations into possible auditing and reporting irregularities in relation to listed companies;
- Enquiring into possible non-compliances with financial reporting requirements on the part of listed companies; and
- Requiring listed companies to remove any non-compliance identified.

The Financial Reporting Council may initiate investigations or enquiries upon receipt of complaints or on its own initiative. Any person who possesses information and/or evidence which suggest that there are or may be auditing and reporting irregularities or non-compliances with financial reporting requirements may lodge a complaint with the Financial Reporting Council.

Any auditing or reporting irregularities identified by the Financial Reporting Council will be referred to the Hong Kong Institute of Certified Public Accountants for follow-up action. Any non-compliance relevant to the Listing Rules will be referred to the SFC or the SEHK for follow-up action. The Financial Reporting Council is not empowered to discipline or prosecute. Since its establishment, over 50 complaints have been reviewed, of which seven have been investigated with three enquires made.

The Financial Reporting Council has established co-operation arrangements with Mainland regulators on investigations and enquiries. Enquiries into the conduct of PRC audit firms are also subject to PRC law. In practice, formal investigations of PRC audit firms will be carried out by the PRC Ministry of Finance and the Chinese Securities Regulatory Commission, either as agents on behalf of the Financial Reporting Council (to the extent permitted by PRC laws) or on a direct complaint. These regulators are responsible for taking appropriate disciplinary actions and sanctions against PRC audit firms.

New Companies Ordinance ("New CO"). In mid-2006, the Hong Kong Government launched a major and comprehensive exercise to rewrite the 102 Securities and Futures Ordinance, ss 380 and 381.

103 Company Bill, s 401.

Companies Ordinance. It has been proposed that the New CO will come into effect from March 2014. The New CO seeks to enhance corporate governance, improve company regulations and business facilitation and modernise Hong Kong's corporate law. Some of the notable measures in the New CO include:

- Removing the requirement for memorandum of association and the concept of authorised capital;
- Restricting the appointment of corporate directors by requiring at least one individual director;
- Reducing the threshold for shareholders to demand a poll from 10 per cent to five per cent of the total voting rights;
- Requiring public and large private companies and guarantee companies to prepare a more comprehensive directors' report which includes an analytical and forward looking 'business review' while allowing private companies to opt out by special resolution;
- Granting power to require a wider range of persons to provide information and explanation reasonably required for auditors' performance of duties; and
- Enabling the Registrar of Companies to obtain documents or information for ascertaining whether any conduct, that could constitute certain offences relating to giving false or misleading statement, has taken place.

Public Offerings

In General. A company seeking listing on the SEHK can offer its shares to the public by way of an offer for subscription or an offer for sale, or a combination of both.

Offer for Subscription. An offer for subscription also is referred to as a primary offering. The issuing company, or an intermediary on its behalf, offers new shares to the public, and the members of the public accepting the offer subscribe to the shares.[104] Offers for subscription can be made at a fixed price or by tender. In the latter case, the minimum price of the shares is fixed and offers are invited at a higher price, with the shares generally being issued to the highest bidder.

In the case of an offer for subscription by tender, the SEHK must be satisfied as to the fairness of the basis of the allotment so that investors who tender at the same price for the same number of shares receive equal treatment.[105] In any case, the issuing company and its underwriters must adopt a fair basis of allocating the shares on offer to the public (whether the offer is made at a fixed price or by tender).[106] Offers for subscription of new shares must be fully underwritten, and an offer for subscription must be supported by a listing document which complies with the requirements of chapter 11 of the Listing Rules.[107]

105 Listing Rules 7.04.
106 Listing Rules 8.23.
107 Listing Rules 7.05.

Offer for Sale. An offer for sale is a secondary offering, where the shares offered for sale had already been issued by the listing company. The existing shareholders, or an intermediary on their behalf, offer their shares to the public for sale and the members of the public accepting the offer purchase the shares from the existing shareholders.[108]

Similar to offers for subscription, offers for sale can be made at a fixed price or by tender. Again, the SEHK must be satisfied as to the fairness of the basis of allotment so that investors who apply at the same price for the same number of securities receive equal treatment. There is, however, no specific requirement for an offer for sale to be underwritten but, in practice, underwriting arrangements are often made to ensure that the requirement for the public float requirement is met.[109] In the case of an offer for sale, a listing document which complies with Chapter 11 of the Listing Rules also is required.[110]

Placements

A private placement involves an issuing company either directly or through an intermediary obtaining subscriptions for shares primarily from persons selected or approved by the issuing company or its intermediary.[111] The shares are taken up by a restricted number of investors (usually in very substantial blocks) pursuant to arrangements generally made on behalf of the issuing company by a placement agent or a firm of stockbrokers. The shares are not offered to the general public. A private placement often involves the shares in question being offered selectively by the issuing company's sponsor or the intermediary appointed to manage the placement.

Where a placement of securities of a class new to listing is proposed by or on behalf of a new applicant or a listed company, a listing document which complies with Chapter 11 of the Listing Rules is required. A placement of securities of a class already listed by or on behalf of a listed company does not need to be supported by a listing document. However, if a prospectus or other listing document is required (for other reasons) or is proposed to be issued, it must comply with Chapter 11 of the Listing Rules.[112]

The SEHK will not usually allow a new applicant to be listed by way of a private placement if there is likely to be significant public demand for the shares.[113] In the case of applicants with a very large market capitalisation, a combination of a public offer and private placement is often adopted. The SEHK may be prepared to allow preliminary arrangements and private placements to be made to distribute shares before the start of dealings when necessary to comply with the minimum public float requirement.[114] If a private placement is to be made, then further separate guidelines contained in Appendix 6 of the Listing Rules will apply. In the case of new applicants, the main guidelines include:

- The expected initial market capitalisation of the shares to be placed must not be less than HK $25 million (or such other amount as may be fixed from time to time by the SEHK);[115]
- Up to, but not more than, 75 per cent of the shares to be placed may be placed directly by a member of the SEHK (the lead broker) or through a syndicate of other members of the SEHK (distributors);[116]
- The shares to be placed must have an adequate spread of holders. The number of shareholders considered adequate depends on the size of the placement but, as a general guideline, there should not be fewer than three shareholders for each HK $1 million of the placement with a minimum of 100 shareholders;
- Without the prior consent of the SEHK, no allocations may be made to (a) 'connected clients'[117] of the lead broker or of any distributor; (b) directors or existing shareholders of the company or their associates, unless certain conditions[118] are fulfilled; or (c) nominee companies, unless the name of the ultimate beneficiary is disclosed;
- Not more than 25 per cent of the total placement may be allocated to 'discretionary managed portfolio';[119]
- Not more than 10 per cent of the total placement may be offered to employees or past employees of the company applying for listing;[120]
- Neither the lead broker nor the distributor, under normal circumstances, may retain for their own account any significant amount of the shares being placed;
- Dealing in the shares cannot commence until the SEHK has been supplied with, and has approved a list setting out, the required details of all the placees and the amount taken up by each placee (with the possibility that the SEHK may request

114 Listing Rules 7.11 and Listing Rules 8.08(a).

115 This will normally not apply to placements by foreign issuers having their primary listing on another exchange.

116 The balance must be made available by the lead broker directly to the 'general public', meaning investors other than clients of the lead broker. The lead broker is responsible for making adequate distribution facilities available.

117 'Connected client' means any client of such member who is a partner, employee, director or substantial shareholder of the lead broker or of any distributors, or the trustee, spouse, infant child or close relative (whose account is managed by such member pursuant to a discretionary managed portfolio agreement) of such person.

118 Listing Rules 10.03 and 10.04.

further information for the purpose of establishing their independence and beneficial ownership); and

- The lead broker and each distributor and member of the SEHK involved in the placement must keep a record of their placees for at least three years following the placement.

Thus, as a rule, not more than 10 per cent of the total placement may be offered to employees or past employees of the company or its subsidiaries or associated companies or their dependents on a preferential basis.

Directors and existing shareholders of the company or their associates may only subscribe for or purchase placement shares if the shares are not offered to them on a preferential basis, and no preferential treatment is given to them in the allocation of the shares, and the prescribed public float is maintained. There is no requirement to prepare and maintain an insider list in Hong Kong.

After a company is listed, it may place new shares by way of a rights issue to its existing shareholders. The existing shareholders will subscribe for the new shares, in proportion to their existing holding and usually at a price lower than the prevailing market price of the shares. In addition, a company may implement a dividend reinvestment scheme under which new shares are issued in lieu of cash dividends.

Secondary Dealings

Where the shares for which listing is sought are already listed on another stock exchange, listing by introduction is a method to bring them to the Hong Kong market for a secondary listing. There are generally no marketing arrangements required because the shares for which listing is sought are already of such an amount and so widely held that their adequate marketability when listed can be assumed.[121] The applicant must comply with all the qualifications for listing as set out in the Listing Rules. Listing by introduction will normally be appropriate in the following circumstances:[122]

- The shares for which listing is sought are already listed on another stock exchange;
- The shares for which listing is sought are distributed in specie, by a listed company to the shareholders of that listed company or to the shareholders of another listed company; or
- A holding company is formed and the shares for which listing is sought are issued in exchange for those of one or more listed companies.

Listing by introduction will not be permitted if:

- There has been a marketing of the shares in Hong Kong within six months prior to the proposed introduction where such marketing was made conditional upon listing being granted for those shares;

121 Listing Rules 7.13.
122 Listing Rules 7.14.

- There is a pre-existing intention to dispose of shares, a likelihood of significant public demand for the shares or an intended change of the company's circumstances that would render an introduction unacceptable to the SEHK; or
- A change in the nature of the business of the company is in contemplation.[123]

An application for listing by introduction must be supported by a listing document which is compiled in compliance with Chapter 11 of the Listing Rules.[124] The application must state the names and holdings of the 10 largest beneficial shareholders of the shares (if known) and the total number of shareholders. A copy of the share register may be required by the SEHK.[125]

Listing on the SEHK by way of introduction received some attention in November 2009 as a result of the suspension of trading in the shares of Asian Citrus Holdings Ltd, China's biggest orange plantation, just two hours after trading on the opening day following extreme price fluctuations, where the stock opened 7.7 times higher. Market watchers believed that that fluctuation was due to a 10-for-1 share split not being reflected in the data published by the SEHK system.

In June 2010, London-listed insurer Prudential PLC obtained secondary listing in Hong Kong without raising additional funds (as no new shares were issued in Hong Kong). In order for its shares to be transferred expeditiously between the London and Hong Kong stock exchanges, Prudential set up an express shunting process whereby the shares could be transferred from its London registrar to its Hong Kong registrar within three days (which would otherwise take 11 days). The sponsor and underwriters provided liquidity by transferring an undisclosed amount of shares to Hong Kong for trading.

Migration from GEM to Main Board

A streamlined process was introduced in July 2008 which enables GEM Board-listed companies meeting the Main Board listing criteria to migrate to the Main Board without the need to appoint a sponsor or to prepare a prospectus.

The company must have been listed on the GEM for the period at least until the publication of its results for one full financial year following its GEM listing and must not have been subject to any disciplinary investigations by the Exchange in respect of any serious rule breaches in the last 12 months.

Registration

Sponsor Requirement. A new applicant must appoint a sponsor to assist it with its initial application for listing.[126] Only intermediaries holding a valid regulated activity type 6 (advising on Corporate Finance) licence and having met the on-going eligibility criteria of the SFC Sponsor Guidelines are eligible to be a sponsor. A sponsor also must have at least two Responsible Officers at all times in order to remain eligible to act as a sponsor. The SFC Corporate Finance Adviser Code of Conduct sets out the requirements and guidelines for corporate finance advisers, including IPO sponsors.

The sponsor is responsible for preparing the company for listing, lodging the formal application for listing and submitting all supporting documentation to, and dealing with, the SEHK on all matters arising in connection with the application.[127] The sponsor must conduct reasonable due diligence and provide a sponsor's declaration (with various assurances) to the SEHK.[128] The general provisions in respect of the due diligence procedures to be carried out by sponsors are set out in Practice Note 21 of the Listing Rules.

The sponsor also is required to give an undertaking to the SEHK confirming that he will comply with the Listing Rules applicable to sponsors, use all reasonable endeavours to ensure that all information provided to the SEHK is true in all material aspects and does not omit any material information, and cooperate in any investigation conducted by the SEHK. The sponsor will also need to make a statement to the SEHK to declare its independence (and, in the case of joint sponsors, to declare that at least one of them is independent).

The sponsor, or an affiliate of the sponsor, typically participates in the underwriting syndicate and provides advice on the pricing of the shares based on prevailing market conditions before the process begins. The market practice is that underwriting will not be fully committed until approval for listing is granted and days before the start of trading.

Prospectus Liability. In an effort to improve the quality of listings in Hong Kong, the SFC published the "Consultation Conclusions on the regulation of IPO Sponsors" on 12 December 2012. The new sponsor regulation will come into effect on 1 October 2013. The HKEx has made appropriate changes to the Listing Rules and streamlined the listing vetting process to complement the new sponsor regulation.[129] The key features of the new sponsor regulations include:

- Publication of an Application Proof which should be substantially complete on the HKExnews website when a listing application is submitted;
- An eight-week moratorium on listing applications returned on the grounds that the Application Proofs are considered not substantially complete. When applications are returned, the names of sponsors and applicants together with the return date will be published on the HKExnews website;

127 Listing Rules 3A.11.

128 Listing Rules 3A.13.

129 This is because some take the view that sponsors might come under the definition of 'promotors', who are subject to civil liability; or that a sponsor is a person 'who has authorized the issue of the prospectus', subject to civil and criminal liability.

- An accelerated review process for listing applications returned on the grounds that the Application Proofs are considered not substantially complete;
- A streamlined regulatory commenting process focusing on major issues such as eligibility, suitability, sustainability, Listing Rules, CO and SFO compliance and any material disclosure deficiencies; and
- Revised sponsors' rules, undertakings and declarations to complement the Provisions.

Compliance Adviser. The Listing Rules also require a compliance adviser to be appointed post-listing and the sponsor will usually take up this role. The compliance adviser is appointed until the publication of the listed company's accounts for its first full financial year after the date of listing.

The company must seek advice from the compliance adviser if it wishes to undertake certain specific matters such as issuing a regulatory announcement or entering into a notifiable or connected transaction during this period.

Approval for Listing. A new applicant should apply to the SEHK in the prescribed form with the initial listing fee for an advance booking no less than 25 clear days prior to the date on which it is expected that the Listing Committee will meet to consider the application.[130] Under the 'dual filing' system, which establishes the SFC as the statutory regulator of corporate disclosure, the listing applicant also should authorise the SEHK to file the submitted materials with the SFC on its behalf.

The SFC has the right to comment on the listing documents and it has a reserve power to object to a listing application if the information published in the documents is insufficient or misleading. The SFC in practice will not always provide comments on the prospectus but, when it does, it will pass its comments to the sponsor via the SEHK.

Neither the listing document nor any publicity material may be issued until the SEHK has confirmed to the company that it has no further comments. From the submission of the formal application until the time when listing is granted, there must be no dealing in the shares for which the listing is sought by any 'connected person' of the company.[131]

The Listing Rules impose extensive requirements as to the documents which must be submitted to the SEHK for review and approval. In particular, the listing document must not be issued until the SEHK has confirmed to the company that it has no further comments and, once a final proof has been agreed, no material amendment to that proof will be allowed without the consent of SEHK.

False and Misleading Information. Under section 298 of the SFO, it is an offence to disclose or circulate information that is likely to induce the sale or purchase of shares; to maintain or increase the price of the shares if the information is false or misleading as to a material fact; or omit a material fact and the person knows or is reckless as to whether the information is false or misleading. In April 2010, the SFC alleged that Hontex International Holdings Company Limited had:

- Disclosed materially false or misleading information in its IPO prospectus dated 14 December 2009 which was likely to have induced investors to subscribe for and purchase Hontex shares contrary to section 277 and section 298 of the SFO;
- Materially overstated its financial position, as disclosed in its IPO prospectus;
- Provided false or misleading information to the SEHK contrary to section 384 of the SFO; and
- Employed a fraudulent or deceptive scheme in relation to its listing in Hong Kong contrary to section 300 of the SFO.

An interim injunction was obtained to freeze Hontex's assets amounting to HK $997.4 million. The SFC has been seeking orders, under section 213 of the SFO, to restore the funds raised by Hontex in the IPO to those who had subscribed for the shares and those who had purchased shares since the IPO and in either case continue to hold those shares. The High Court (Court of First Instance) in Hong Kong granted an order to require Hontex to make a repurchase offer to investors as a result of its violation of the SFO. The SFC has also revoked the licence of the responsible sponsor and fined it HK$ 42 million for failing to discharge its sponsor's duties in relation to the IPO application of Hontex.

Registration for Listing. Once the listing application and the prospectus have been approved by the SEHK and SFC, the prospectus must then be registered with the Registrar of Companies before being released to the public.

Registration of the prospectus with the Registrar of Companies is a two-stage process involving firstly an application to the SEHK for authorisation for registration followed by an application to the Registrar of Companies for registration. The SEHK must be given at least 14 days' advance notice of the intended date of registration of the prospectus.[132]

Periodic Disclosure

Restrictions on Trading

In General. Restrictions on the trading of shares subsequent to their listing are imposed on the listed company, its directors and (in certain circumstances) its substantial shareholders.[133] Many of these restrictions, together with other

132 Listing Rules 11A.09.
133 Listing Rules 9.15 and Companies Ordinance.

continuing obligations outlined below, are binding on the listed company.[134] Briefly, a listed company is required to:

- Adopt rules governing dealings in listed securities by its directors in terms no less exacting than those contained in the Model Code for Securities Transactions by Directors of Listed Issuers set out in Appendix 10 to the Listing Rules (discussed below);
- Make application for listing of any securities of the same class as those already listed, prior to the issue of such additional securities; and
- Comply with the Listing Rules and Code on Mergers and Takeovers and the Share Repurchase Code as each is in force from time to time.

In addition, a listed company is required to notify the SEHK:

- Of any change in its authorised representatives;[135]
- Of any allotment of securities for subscription, sale or open offer and the results of any rights issue;
- Of any bonus shares financed out of distributable profits;
- As to certain changes in its issued share capital the day after the event (subject to a de minimis threshold and other specified factors);[136]
- Monthly with an update on information relating to its issued share capital and other movements in its securities;[137]
- Of any share interest of directors, the chief executive officer and shareholders exceeding five per cent;
- If its public float falls below 25 per cent (or any lower approved percentage);[138] and
- Of all share repurchase details[139] through the e-submission system.[140]

The Listing Rules also impose an obligation on the listed company to publish an announcement and, in some cases, issue a circular to its shareholders, in a wide range of situations. Announcements are published electronically on the SEHK's website through its e-submission system and on the listed company's own website. Where a circular is required to be issued to shareholders, a copy or summary of such circular must be issued to the holders of any other of the listed company's securities. All circulars must be in English with a Chinese translation.

134 Listing Rules 13.01. Prior to 2004, issuers of equity securities were required to sign such a listing agreement with the SEHK as a pre-condition to listing.
135 Listing Rules 3.05 and 3.06.
136 Listing Rules 13.25A.
137 Listing Rules 13.25B.
138 Listing Rules 13.32.
139 Listing Rules 13.31.
140 Listing Rules 10.32.

A summary of the key events or transactions giving rise to an obligation to publish an announcement or issue a circular is set out in the section headed 'Regulated Market and Compliance with the Listing Rules', below.

In practice, many shareholders hold their shares through a nominee (usually a broker) and very often circulars do not reach the shareholders for their attention. The listed company may notify the nominee to ensure he promptly delivers these circulars to the relevant beneficial shareholders.

Lock-Ins. It is common practice for the controlling shareholders to be subjected to certain lock-in periods upon the shares' first listing. Generally, the controlling shareholders are not allowed:

- Within six months of commencement of dealing, to dispose of, or agree to dispose of, or create any encumbrances in respect of the shares they beneficially own; and
- Within six months after the initial period, to make such disposal or create such encumbrance which would cause them to cease to be the controlling shareholders.

Any offer for sale or secondary offering by the controlling shareholders at the time of the IPO may not be subject to such restriction.[141]

Share Repurchases. A listed company is permitted to buy back or repurchase its own shares on the SEHK or any other stock exchange on which its shares are traded, provided certain conditions are met.

Statutory Provisions for Directors' Dealing. Directors when trading in shares must have regard to Parts XIII (market misconduct), XIV (insider dealing) and XV (disclosure of interests) of the SFO. These requirements are discussed in the section 'Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings', below.

Model Code for Directors' Dealing. The listed company must adopt rules governing dealings in securities by its directors, such rules to be no less exacting than the rules set out in the Model Code for Securities Transactions by Directors of Listed Issuers in Appendix 10 of the Listing Rules. The listed company can, if it wishes to, simply adopt the Model Code as its own rules. The Model Code sets out the standards against which directors must measure their conduct when trading in the shares of the listed company. The Model Code aims to supplement the statutory provisions of the SFO relating to insider dealing by preventing directors and employees who are likely to be in possession of material information from dealing in shares.

Under the Model Code, directors are required to refrain from dealing in any securities of the listed company whenever they are in possession of unpublished price-sensitive information in relation to those securities. Directors who are aware of or are privy to any negotiations or agreements related to intended acquisitions or disposals which are notifiable transactions under Chapters 14 and 14A of the Listing Rules or which are or may be price-sensitive should refrain from dealing in the listed company's securities as soon as they become aware of them or privy to them up to the formal announcement of the information. Those directors who are not so privy should be cautioned that there may be price-sensitive information and that they should not deal in the listed company's securities for a similar period.

If a director wishes to trade his shares where such sale is prohibited but exceptional circumstances exist (such as a pressing financial commitment), the director must satisfy the chairman (or other nominated director) of the listed company that the circumstances are exceptional and that the proposed sale is the only reasonable course of action available to the director.

The Exchange must be notified of the sale and the listed company must publish an announcement immediately after the sale stating that the chairman (or other nominated director) was satisfied that there were exceptional circumstances for such sale.

Suspension and Resumption of Trading. A listed company may request a suspension of trading of its shares, or the SEHK may enforce a suspension of trading in a listed company's shares in certain circumstances. The listed company must support its request for trading suspension with sound reasons.[142] This request will not necessarily be granted, particularly if the publication of an announcement would suffice. The circumstances in which a request for suspension will normally be granted are set out in Practice Note 11 of the Listing Rules.

The SEHK may direct a trading halt or suspend trading or cancel a listing where necessary for the protection of investors or in order to maintain an orderly market. The SEHK may intervene as it thinks fit, including where: (i) the listed company materially breaches the Listing Rules; (ii) the listed company has insufficient public float; (iii) the listed company has insufficient operations or assets; or (iv) if it is no longer suitable for listing.[143] The procedure for lifting a suspension will depend on the circumstances. Generally, the halted or suspended company will need to make a written request to resume trading.[144]

Regulated Market and Compliance with the Listing Rules

In General. Listed companies in Hong Kong are subject to detailed compliance requirements set out in Chapters 14 and 14A of the Listing Rules[145] in relation to

142 Listing Rules 6.02.
143 Listing Rules 6.01.
144 Listing Rules 6.04.
145 The HKEx recently streamlined the circular and listing document requirements as a result of a consultation process. The new Listing Rules in respect of these requirements came into effect on 3 June 2010. The rules mainly deal with financial certain acquisitions, disposal or realisations and in relation to transactions between the listed company and any connected person.[146] It is important to highlight the responsibility of directors in disclosing these transactions. The extent of a director's duty in preparing relevant disclosures is highlighted in the responsibility statement that must be included in all notifiable and connected transaction circulars and the listing document (as well as in all announcements in respect of GEM Board-listed companies):

> 'This document, for which the directors of the issuer collectively and individually accept full responsibility, includes particulars given in compliance with the Rules Governing the Listing of Securities on The Stock Exchange of Hong Kong Limited for the purpose of giving information with regard to the issuer. The directors, having made all reasonable enquiries, confirm that to the best of their knowledge and belief the information contained in this document is accurate and complete in all material respect and not misleading or deceptive,[147] and there are no other matters the omission of which would make any statement herein or this document misleading.' (emphasis included)

The following paragraphs outline the key features relating to compliance with the Listing Rules by listed companies in Hong Kong. The SEHK undertakes a continuous review of the Listing Rules.

Statutory Backing of the Obligation to Disclose Price Sensitive Information. The SFO was amended to implement statutory obligation to disclose inside information in 2012[148] to ensure an orderly, informed and fair market.[149] As a result of this implementation, the Listing Rules were amended to remove the existing continuing disclosure obligations which have formed part of the statutory regime. The Inside Information Provisions (Part XIVA of the SFO) impose statutory obligations on the listed issuer and their directors to disclose inside information as soon as reasonably practicable after the information has come to the listed issuer's knowledge, and gives the SFC the responsibility to enforce these obligations. A concept of 'trading halt' has also been introduced, which is an interruption of trading in the issuer's securities requested or directed pending disclosure of information under the Listing Rules and extending for no more than two trading days.

Classification of Transactions. Chapter 14 of the Listing Rules classifies transactions into six threshold levels set out below. Listed companies must and non-financial disclosures in and the despatch of these documents. This chapter incorporates these amendments effective 3 June 2010.

146 'Connected Person' is defined under chapters 1.01 and 14A.11 of the Listing Rules.

147 This is introduced in the revised Listing Rules effective 3 June 2010 imposing a responsibility for directors to ensure all disclosures are not misleading or deceptive. Prior to these amendments, the directors are only required to state that they have made all reasonable enquiries and to the best of their knowledge and belief.

consider all the percentage ratios in classifying a transaction (commonly referred as the 'Five Tests'):[150]

- Assets ratio — the total assets which are the subject of the transaction divided by the total assets of the listed company;
- Profits ratio — the profits attributable to the assets which are the subject of the transaction divided by the profits of the listed company;
- Revenue ratio — the revenue attributable to the assets which are the subject of the transaction divided by the revenue of the listed company;
- Consideration ratio — the consideration divided by the total market capitalisation of the listed company. The total market capitalisation is the average closing price of the listed company's shares as stated in the SEHK's daily quotations sheets for the five business days immediately preceding the date of the transaction; and
- Equity capital ratio — the nominal value of the listed company's issued share capital issued as consideration divided by the nominal value of the listed company's issued share capital immediately before the transaction.

The following table summarises the different transactional threshold levels based on the Five Tests and the corresponding compliance requirement by the listed company and its directors regarding notification, publication and shareholder approval for each level:[151]

	Threshold Level of each of the Five Tests Ratio	Notification to Exchange/ Publication of Announcement in accordance w/Rule 2.07C	Circular to Shareholders within 21 days of Announce-ment	Independent Shareholder Approval[152]	Accountant Report
Share transaction	Less than five per cent	Yes	No	No (unless shares are not issued under a general mandate)	No
Disclosable transaction	Five per cent or more, but less than 25 per cent	Yes	No	No	No
Major transaction	25 per cent or more, but less than 75 per cent for disposals or less than 100 per cent for acquisitions	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes

Reverse takeover[153]	A very substantial acquisition which involves either a change of control or the acquisition of assets from a person who has gained control of the listed company within the last 24 months	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes

Connected Transactions. A connected transaction generally refers to a transaction between a listed company or its subsidiaries and a connected person.[154]

The basic principle is that a connected transaction is subject to both disclosure and shareholder approval requirements unless it is governed by a specific exemption or relaxation, or the SEHK is prepared to grant a waiver.

The following are examples of connected transactions that are exempted from reporting, announcement and independent shareholders' approval:

- A transaction between a listed company and a non-wholly owned subsidiary or between its non-wholly owned subsidiaries where no connected persons of the listed company (other than at the level of its subsidiaries) are (individually or together) entitled to exercise, or control the exercise of, 10 per cent or more of the voting power at any general meeting of any of the subsidiaries concerned and none of the subsidiaries concerned is itself a connected person;[155]
- A transaction between a listed company's non-wholly owned subsidiary and any of its subsidiaries which are connected persons only by virtue of being the subsidiaries of the non-wholly owned subsidiary; or a transaction between any of these subsidiaries;[156]
- Connected transactions under the de minimis exemption[157] from disclosure, reporting and independent shareholders' approval;

- Issue of shares by the listed company or its subsidiaries to a connected person where such issue is simply pro rata, or is made under an approved share option scheme, or the connected person is acting as an underwriter (provided certain provisions under the Listing Rules have been complied with), or is made within 14 days after such connected person has executed an agreement to reduce its holding in the class of securities by placing securities to a third person who is not its associate at a price not less than the placing price;[158]
- A dealing in securities listed on the SEHK or a recognised stock exchange by the listed company in the ordinary and usual course of business (subject to certain qualifications);[159]
- An open-market purchase by a listed company of its own securities from a connected person on the SEHK or a recognised stock exchange or under a general offer made in accordance with the Share Repurchase Code. Where the purchase is made on the SEHK or a recognised stock exchange, this exemption will not apply if the connected person knowingly sells its securities to the listed company;[160]
- The entering into of a service contract with a director of the listed company or its subsidiaries (although pursuant to Listing Rules 13.68 there are circumstances where this would require independent shareholders' approval);[161]
- The acquisition as consumer or realisation in the ordinary and usual course of business of consumer goods or consumer services by a listed company or its subsidiaries from or to a connected person on normal commercial terms (subject to certain qualifications);[162]
- The sharing of administrative services between a listed company or its subsidiaries and a connected person on a cost basis. The cost of the services (examples include company secretarial services, legal services and staff training services) must be identifiable and allocated to the parties involved on a fair and equitable basis;[163]
- Transactions between the listed company or its subsidiaries and a connected person only so connected by virtue of his relationship with an 'insignificant subsidiary';[164] and

- The involvement of an associate of a substantial shareholder of the listed company, where the substantial shareholder is a passive investor in the listed company and meets certain other specified criteria.[165]

Where the connected transaction is subject to independent shareholders' approval, an independent financial adviser must be appointed to advise the independent board whether the transaction is fair and reasonable and in the interests of the listed company and its shareholders as a whole.[166]

Continuing Connected Transactions. These are connected transactions involving the provision of goods or services, or financial assistance, that are repeated and are not one-off in nature. Certain continuing connected transactions are exempted from reporting, annual review, announcement and independent shareholders' voting requirements, including the provision of consumer goods or consumer services, the sharing of administrative services and continuing connected transactions under the de minimis exemption.

Continuing connected transactions must meet the exemption conditions at the time of each transaction in order for the listed corporate group to be exempted from the connected transaction requirements. If a connected transaction no longer qualifies for the exemption for any reason, the listed company must comply with all applicable connected transaction requirements for subsequent continuing transactions.

Timing of Disclosure. A listed company is obliged to make disclosure as soon as reasonably practicable of information which:

- Is necessary to enable the SEHK, members of the listed company, other holders of the listed company's securities and the public to appraise the position of the group; or
- Is necessary to avoid the establishment of a false market in its securities; or
- Might reasonably be expected to materially affect market activity in and the price of its securities.[167]

If an announcement requires pre-vetting by the Listing Division, the listed company must not submit that announcement for publication until clearance, by way of the usual indication that the SEHK has 'no further comments', has been obtained.

based on the accounts for each of the latest three financial years (or, if less, the period since the establishment of the subsidiary); or (ii) the values of its total assets, profits and revenue represent less than five per cent of the issuer's total assets, profits and revenue based on the accounts for the latest financial year. The issuer can change from the one-year test to the three-year test (or vice versa) from time to time (Listing Rules 14A.31(9)(b)).

Suspended Companies. Trading in the securities of a listed company may be halted or suspended by the SEHK for failure to make an announcement on the HKEx website on a subject matter that is material and price-sensitive.[168]

This is consistent with the principle set out in Chapter 6 of the Listing Rules, that suspension is imposed where the SEHK considers it necessary for the protection of investors or the maintenance of an orderly market. Listed companies whose shares had been halted or suspended from trading for three months or more are summarised in the Prolonged Suspension Status Report on the HKEx website.

Public Disclosures

In General. Free trade is dependent to a large extent on the accessibility and free flow of information within the market itself, and the prevention of improper market practices. This section discusses how exchange of information is promoted within the marketplace and improper market practices are prevented.

There is a general obligation imposed on the listed company by the listing agreement to keep the SEHK, its shareholders, and holders of its debt securities listed on the SEHK informed.[169]

Disclosure of Price-Sensitive Information. Under the Listing Rules, any price-sensitive information must be disclosed by way of an announcement. 'Price-sensitive information' is not defined in the Listing Rules, but the SEHK has indicated that it generally refers to information that:

- Is necessary to enable shareholders and the public to appraise the position of the group;
- Is necessary to avoid the establishment of a false market in its securities; and
- Might be reasonably expected materially to affect market activity in and the price of its securities.[170]

The Amendment Ordinance creates a new Part XIVA of the SFO, under which a corporation listed on the SEHK is under a statutory obligation to disclose inside information to the public as soon as reasonably practicable. Any breach of that obligation would expose the listed corporation and/or its officer(s) to the risk of civil sanctions, as well as liability to compensate those who have suffered pecuniary losses as a result of the breach. The statutory disclosure regime will take effect on 1 January 2013.

168 Listing Rules 13.09.

169 Note that the requirement for listing agreements when listing of equity securities was repealed in 2004.

170 This definition was included in the listing agreement applicable to equity listing applicants pre-2004. It also is in the 'Guide on disclosure of price-sensitive information' published by the SEHK in January 2002.

Publication of Announcements, Circulars and Other Documents. The general principles set out in the Listing Rule [171] require listed companies to keep price-sensitive information (including financial results) confidential until a formal announcement is made, and discourage selective disclosure of price-sensitive information. There also is a specific requirement for the directors of listed companies relating to approved financial results and dividends approved at board meetings:

> ‘ . . . The directors are reminded that it is their direct responsibility to ensure that such information is kept strictly confidential until the announcement is made.’ [172]

Under the Listing Rules, the release of information can be made by way of a formal announcement on the HKEx website, which is regarded as the formal channel of communication with the investing public. Listed companies should release such a formal announcement before the dissemination of financial results at a press conference or analysts’ meeting. The following is a summary of the requirements for announcements and circulars set out in the Listing Rules.

Summary of Disclosures Requirements under Hong Kong Listing Rules

	Announcement on HKEx Website	Circulars to Shareholders
Price-sensitive information	• Any price-sensitive information • Material price-sensitive litigation claim against the listed company or its subsidiaries (or made by the listed company or its subsidiaries against a 3rd party).	• Not required
Share transactions and other transactions	• Any notifiable share or other transaction (Listing Rules Chapter 14).	• Not required
Connected share and other transactions	• Any connected share or other transaction (unless an exemption is available) (Listing Rules Chapter 14A). • Advances and financial assistance to third parties — when the financial assistance exceeds the eight per cent under the assets ratio defined under Listing Rules 14.07(1) (Listing Rules 13.13).	• Required, unless one of the exemptions applies (Listing Rules 14A.49).

171 Listing Rules, Ch 2 and Listing Rules 13.09.
172 Note 1 to Listing Rules 13.45.

	• Loan agreements — when the listed company enters into a loan agreement which imposes performance obligations on any controlling shareholder (Listing Rules 13.18) or when the listed company breaches any significant term of a loan agreement (Listing Rules 13.19).
Takeover offers	• As soon as the listed company makes or receives a takeover offer.	• Required
Accounts and auditors[173]	• Annual and interim accounts (Listing Rules 13.49). • Any change of auditors (Listing Rules 13.51). • Any change in the financial year end (Listing Rules 13.51).	• Not required except for the published annual and interim accounts.
Company name change	• Required	• Required (as shareholders' approval is required under Companies Ordinance s 22.)
Dividend	• Required	• Required, the annual report can serve as the circular (see Articles of Association)
Changes to Memorandum and Articles of Association	• Required	• Required (shareholders' approval required for Hong Kong-incorporated company (CO ss 8,13))
Other corporate matters	• Change to Registered Office	• Withdrawal of listing (Listing Rules 6.11/6.12).

173 Listing Rules 13.88 require shareholder approval for the removal of an auditor before the end of its term of office — the issuer will be required to send a circular to shareholders with any written representations from the auditor to the shareholders and the auditor must be permitted to make written and verbal representations at the general meeting.

Corporate governance	• If the listed company fails to set up an audit committee or does not meet the membership requirements (Listing Rules 3.23).	• Not required
Directors and Officers	• On the appointment or resignation of any director (Listing Rules 13.51). • Receipt of director nomination after a general meeting notice has been issued (Listing Rules 13.70). • If the listed company breaches the requirement for a minimum number of INEDs (Listing Rules 3.11). • At least seven clear business days before any board meeting to declare a dividend or approve the annual or interim accounts (Listing Rules 13.43) and must notify the Exchange of the results of such meeting (Listing Rules 13.45). • Once a board decision to change the company secretary has been made (Listing Rules 13.51). • Resignation, termination, or change of the compliance adviser (Listing Rules 3A.29/13.51). • Director undergoes bankruptcy or related proceedings or in certain circumstances suffers public sanction, conviction, investigation, or is made a defendant in criminal proceedings (Listing Rules 13.51B). • Loans to directors (if permitted) (Listing Rules 14A.47).	• Loans to directors – if classified as a connected transaction (Listing Rules 14A.49). • Receipt of director nomination after a general meeting notice has been issued (Listing Rules 13.70). • Service contracts (if shareholders' approval is required) (Listing Rules 13.68/Listing Rules 13.69).

	• If a director sells shares when otherwise prohibited from doing so under the Model Code, but exceptional circumstances exist and sale is approved by the chairman (Appendix 10, paragraph 14).
Shares	• 14 days before the register of members or transfer book is closed (Listing Rules 13.66). • If the listed company intends to make a bonus issue (Listing Rules 13.09). • Certain changes in the issued share capital (in the prescribed manner) on the day after the event (Listing Rules 13.25A). • Monthly update on information relating to its issued share capital and other movements in its securities (Listing Rules 13.25B). • If the listed company proposes to issue convertible securities, warrants and options (Chapters 14 and 14A of the Listing Rules, or Listing Rules 13.28, Listing Rules 13.09). • Share interests of any director, the chief executive and any shareholder exceeding five per cent of issued share capital (of the Securities and Futures Ordinance Part XV). • Issue of shares and changes to the issued share capital upon exercise of share options (Chapters 14 and 14A, Listing Rules 13.28, Listing Rules 13.09).	• Bonus/capitalisation issues (Listing Rules 7.29). • Issue of convertible securities, warrants and options and issue of shares if shareholders' approval is required or if made as part of a notifiable or connected transaction (Listing Rules 13.36, Listing Rules 14A.49). • Issue of shares by subsidiaries so as to materially dilute the percentage equity interest of the listed parent company in the subsidiary. • Adopting a new employee share option scheme that requires shareholders' approval and further grants of options to directors, the chief executive or substantial shareholders or their associates that require shareholders' approval (Listing Rules 17.04).

	• Issue of shares by subsidiaries so as to materially dilute the equity interest of the listed parent company (Listing Rules Chapter 14 or Listing Rules 13.09). • New employee share option scheme requiring shareholders' approval and the granting of options under the scheme (Listing Rules 17.02, 17.06A). • Placement of new shares for cash (Listing Rules 13.28). • Share repurchases (Listing Rules 13.31) (Listing Rules 10.06). • Any rights issues and open offers (Listing Rules 13.09).	• Share repurchases where the directors' general mandate must be approved by shareholders each year and where additional explanatory statement on any repurchase mandate must be included in the annual report or a separate circular (Listing Rules 10.06). • Rights issues and open offers.
Shareholder relations	• Pledging of shares by controlling shareholder (Listing Rules 13.17). • Shareholders' meetings and communications – the listed company must publish a copy of its AGM notice (Listing Rules 13.37) and notices of extraordinary or special meetings (Listing Rules 2.07C) in its announcements.	• Shareholders' meetings and communications – an AGM will have its accompanying annual report, repurchase mandate disclosures and any other explanatory statements needed for any special business agenda. For other general meetings some form of circular will always be required to accompany the notice of meeting.

Announcements and Distribution of Interim and Annual Reports. Every listed company must issue, as a minimum, full-year financial results and six-monthly interim financial results. The listed company also must publish its annual and interim financial results by way of an announcement.

The announcement must be published as soon as possible and in any event not later than 30 minutes before trading on the day after the financial results are approved by the board of the listed company.[174] The SEHK will normally require suspension of trading if the listed company fails to publish its financial results on time.[175]

The listed company must then send its annual report and accounts (or a summary financial report) to all its shareholders not less than 21 days before its AGM and in any event not more than four months after the end of its financial year. Every listed company also must send its six-monthly interim accounts (or a summary interim report) to all its shareholders not later than three months after the end of the interim period.

The annual report and interim report must comply with Appendix 16 and also must contain other disclosures required by the Listing Rules. Slightly modified rules apply to foreign and PRC-incorporated companies. One copy must be sent to the SEHK.[176] It is a recommended best practice under the Code on Corporate Governance Practice that the listed company also publishes quarterly financial results. Quarterly reporting is not required except for dual-listed PRC-incorporated companies where quarterly reporting is mandatory in the PRC as well as for companies listed on the GEM board.

Preparation of Annual Accounts and Auditors' Report. The accounting standards applicable are 'best practices' which are at least those required to be complied with in respect of specific matters in the accounts of a company incorporated under the Companies Ordinance and the Hong Kong Financial Reporting Standards (HKFRS) or the International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) (and, if applicable, the China Accounting Standards for Business Enterprises) and, in the case of banking companies, the Financial Disclosure by Locally Incorporated Authorised Institutions issued by the Hong Kong Monetary Authority.[177]

Auditors' Liability. Section 399 of the New CO provides an offence for an auditor to 'knowingly or recklessly' cause to be omitted from the auditor's report any of the information required including:

- The opinion that adequate accounting records have not been kept by the company;

174 Under Listing Rules 13.49, the listed company must publish its full year results the business day after they are approved by the board and in any event: (i) for annual accounting periods ending before 31 December 2010 — not later than four months after the end of the financial year; or (ii) for annual accounting periods ending on or after 31 December 2010 — not later than three months after the end of the financial year. In the case of interim results, the listed company also must publish its interim results the business day after they are approved by the board and in any event: (i) for half-year accounting periods ending before 30 June 2010 — not later than three months after the end of that period of six months or (ii) for half-year accounting periods ending on or after 30 June 2010 — not later than two months after the end of that period of six months.

- The opinion that financial statements are not in agreement with the accounting records, in any material respect; and
- The fact that all the information or explanations, to the best of the auditor's knowledge and belief, which are necessary and material for the purpose of the audit, have not been obtained.

Anti-Money Laundering. The Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorist Financing (Financial Institutions) Ordinance ('AMLO') came into effect on 1 April 2012, and affects financial institutions regulated by SFC, HKMA and the Hong Kong Insurance Authority. A financial institution (and any employee of such financial institution) that knowingly contravenes the AMLO may be liable to a fine of HK$1 million and imprisonment for two years.[178] The relevant authorities may also publish specific guidelines under the AMLO.[179] Under the AMLO, financial institutions are required to ensure that they have effective systems and controls to provide reasonable assurance to the regulators that they can avoid aiding and abetting money launderers, financial criminals and terrorist financers. Financial institutions will need to demonstrate that they have adequate customer due diligence (CDD) procedures, which include adopting a risk-based approach that requires enhanced CDD in respect of higher risk customers. In addition, financial institutions will need to undertake ongoing transaction monitoring to identify and report suspicious transactions.

Takeovers Code. The Code on Takeovers and Mergers (Takeovers Code) issued by the SFC applies to all takeover and merger activities affecting public companies in Hong Kong and companies with primary equity listings in Hong Kong.

The Listing Rules oblige all listed companies to comply with the Takeovers Code.[180] The Code prescribes the contents of the announcement of a firm intention to make a takeover offer. The listed company must submit to the SEHK draft copies of any documents issued in connection with a takeover offer[181] (see further discussion in section headed 'Public Takeover Bids', below).

Share Repurchases. A share repurchase is an offer made by or on behalf of a listed company to purchase, redeem, or otherwise acquire its own shares from any existing shareholders. Such acquisitions are subject to the restrictions and notification requirements of the Listing Rules,[182] the Code on Share Repurchases (Share Repurchase Code) and the Companies Ordinance, depending on the company in question.

Section 49B of the Companies Ordinance allows a Hong Kong incorporated company to purchase its own shares provided it complies with the provisions of this section. A listed company is permitted to purchase its own shares on the SEHK provided the purchase is authorised by the shareholders in a general meeting. This authority is generally granted by the shareholders at each AGM at the same time as the directors' general mandate is approved.

The Share Repurchase Code must be complied with by all public companies in Hong Kong as well as all companies with a primary listing on the SEHK and provides that a public or listed company may only engage in share repurchases either by way of:

- An on-market share repurchase made in accordance with the Listing Rules;
- An off-market share repurchase approved in accordance with the Share Repurchase Code by the SFC and after an approval vote by disinterested shareholders;
- An exempt share repurchase; or
- A share repurchase by general offer in accordance with the Share Repurchase Code and the Takeovers Code.

Issuers with Primary Listing in Hong Kong

Prior to 2004, all applicants were required to enter into a listing agreement with the SEHK as a pre-condition to listing debt and equity securities.

The listing agreement is designed to ensure that subsequently listed companies keep shareholders and the public fully informed of any matters which might affect their interests. Since 2004, the requirement for listing agreements no longer applies to the listing of equity securities.[183]

Dual-Listed Companies

Simultaneous Release of Information. Where a foreign company is listed on more than one exchange, it is required to ensure that the same information which is required to be disclosed to the SEHK and the market in Hong Kong is released at the same time it is released to any other stock exchanges or markets. This requirement includes any information released by a subsidiary of the issuer to another stock exchange if that information is material to the issuer.[184] In reality, compliance with this requirement is hampered by time differences between Hong Kong and many major markets.

Where the foreign company's primary listing is on a stock exchange in a different time zone, the SEHK will allow an announcement to be made in Hong Kong on the date immediately after the release of information in the primary market, provided that the announcement is made before dealing commences in Hong Kong on that day. If the foreign company's primary listing is in Hong Kong, then the announcement should be made in Hong Kong first followed by an announcement in the overseas market before it opens for trading. The obligation to ensure simultaneous release of information in all markets in which a listed company's securities are traded can be onerous, and has caused compliance problems for multinational companies.

The duty to ensure simultaneous disclosure applies where information is required to be released by a listed subsidiary to another stock exchange and the information in question also is required to be disclosed by the listed parent company in Hong Kong.

Annual Accounts. Where a foreign company's primary listing is on the SEHK, its annual accounts must comply with the accounting standards applicable to Hong Kong companies. In addition, the accounts must be audited to a standard comparable to that required by the Hong Kong Institute of Certified Public Accountants or by the International Auditing and Assurance Standards Board of the International Federation of Accountants (or China Auditing Standards Board of the China Ministry of Finance, as applicable).[185]

The same auditor's qualification applies as those required for the initial public offering. The foreign company will be required to prepare its annual report, annual accounts and auditors' report in English, accompanied by a Chinese translation. Where the foreign company's primary listing is on another stock exchange, there is no requirement to produce a Chinese translation of its financial reports.[186]

Repurchase of Shares. A foreign company which has listings on more than one stock exchange will be required to state in its annual accounts particulars of any purchase, sale or redemption of its own listed securities made on the SEHK and on any other stock exchange.

Such statement must include the aggregate price paid or received by the foreign company for such purchase, sale or redemption and should distinguish between those securities purchased or sold on the SEHK and on any other stock exchange. An appropriate negative statement should be made where no such purchase, sale or redemption has been made.

Directors' Remuneration. A foreign company is required to provide the same information relating to directors' emoluments, pensions and any compensation in respect of loss of office that is required to be provided by a Hong Kong incorporated company pursuant to sections 161 and 161A of the Companies Ordinance.

Such information will include details relating to directors' fees, salaries, other benefits and the corresponding amounts for the preceding financial year. The foreign company also is required to disclose details relating to any discretionary or performance-related bonus, contributions made on behalf of directors to pension schemes and any (contractual or other) compensation paid to directors for the loss of office.

Compliance with Hong Kong Companies Ordinance. While the Companies Ordinance does not apply to companies which are incorporated outside Hong Kong, the Listing Rules require a foreign company to comply with certain provisions of the Companies Ordinance, including the tenth schedule and section 129D (preparation of accounts and contents of the directors' report), sections 128 and 129A (details of its subsidiaries and ultimate holding company), sections 161, 161B, 162 and 162A (details relating to directors' remuneration, loans to company officers, directors' interest in contracts and management contracts) and section 129A (details of investments).[187]

Hong Kong Depositary Receipts

The SEHK introduced a framework to enable foreign companies to list Hong Kong depository receipts (HDRs) on the Main Board. HDRs may be a convenient alternative listing method for foreign companies whose home jurisdiction discourages overseas listing of shares or otherwise restricts a company pursuing a traditional share listing.

The Main Board listing criteria generally apply equally to HDRs, with some additional requirements and modifications set out in Chapter 19B of the Listing Rules. A foreign company intending to issue HDRs in Hong Kong will still need to satisfy the SEHK that its jurisdiction of incorporation provides for shareholder protection equivalent to that in Hong Kong and the criteria set out in the joint policy statement regarding the suitability for listing of foreign companies. The HDRs must be freely tradable and the underlying shares must be free from restrictions on transfer by the depositary.

The foreign company will need to appoint a depositary acceptable to the SEHK. The depositary must be a suitably authorised and regulated financial institution which the SEHK considers has suitable experience in issuing and managing depositary receipts programmes in Hong Kong or overseas.[188] The depository will issue the depositary receipts as the agent for the foreign company.[189] The foreign company will need to enter into a deposit agreement with the depositary which complies with the SEHK requirements, including that the depositary hold the shares in the foreign company on trust for the sole benefit of the HDR holders.[190]

The depositary must maintain a register of HDR holders through an approved Hong Kong share registrar. The foreign company also must ensure the continued suitability of the depositary,[191] and that the depositary performs its obligation under the deposit agreement and the Listing Rules and that the rights of the HDR holders are fully recognised and equivalent to the rights of its overseas shareholders.

Trading Rules and Market Conduct

Securities Offering

Offer

In General. In Hong Kong, the SFC is the regulatory body which supervises public offers of securities. The SFC is responsible for considering the statements in prospectuses or other promotion documents. Public offerings of company shares or debentures have to satisfy disclosure requirements under the Companies Ordinance and of the SFO. Listed companies also must satisfy the requirements under the SEHK rules. The prospectus requirements have already been discussed above (See 'Securities Offering — Prospectus Requirements').

For a company incorporated in Hong Kong, no prospectus must be issued by or on behalf of such company unless the prospectus complies with the requirements of the Companies Ordinance and, on or before the date of its publication, its registration has been authorised under section 38D(1) of the Companies Ordinance.

For a company incorporated outside Hong Kong (whether or not the company has an established place of business in Hong Kong), no prospectus offering for subscription or purchase of shares in or debentures of such a company may be issued, circulated or distributed in Hong Kong unless the prospectus complies with the requirements of the Companies Ordinance, its registration has been authorised under section 342C of the Companies Ordinance, and a copy of the prospectus has been registered with the Hong Kong Registrar of Companies before it could be issued, circulated or distributed.[192]

The Securities and Futures and Companies Legislation (Structured Products Amendment) Ordinance 2011, which took effect on 13 May 2011, passed the regulation of the public offers of structured products in the form of shares or debentures from the prospectus regime of the Companies Ordinance to the regime for public offers of investments under the SFO. Under the new regime, advertisements and offer documents for all structured products that are publicly offered must be authorised by the SFC, unless otherwise exempted by the SFO.

Offer Exemptions. The Companies Ordinance was amended on 3 December 2004 to provide for 12 exempted types of offers (or safe-harbours) where any document issued relating to such an offer does not constitute a 'prospectus'. These exemptions[193]are listed in Schedule 17 to the Companies Ordinance, as follows:

191 Listing Rules 19B.17.
192 Companies Ordinance, s 342C(1).

- Professional investors' exemption (ie, offer made to 'professional investors');[194]
- Limited number of persons exemption (ie, offer made to not more than 50 persons);
- Small-scale offer exemption (ie, total consideration payable under offer does not exceed HK $5 million);
- Minimum consideration/denomination exemption (ie, offer under which the minimum denomination of shares is not less than HK $500,000);
- Invitation in good faith to enter into underwriting agreements;
- Codes-related documents (ie, documents relating to the Code on Takeovers and Mergers and Code on Share Repurchases);
- Bonus or scrip issue exemption (ie, offer of shares for no consideration or as an alternative to dividend);
- Employee option exemption (ie, offer of shares to employees); and
- Other types of exemptions (eg, offers by charitable institutions or educational establishments, offers to members of a club, offers in respect of an exchange of shares in the same company and offers in connection with collective investment schemes).

Certain of the exemptions require a warning statement specified in Part 3 of Schedule 18 to the Companies Ordinance, which should be included in the offer document. If such warning statement is not contained, the prospectus exemption cannot be relied upon.[195]

Public

In General. When an application form to apply for shares or debentures of a company is issued, it must be accompanied by a prospectus that complies with the requirements under the Companies Ordinance, unless such application form is not issued to the public.[196]

Hence, whether the shares or debentures are offered to the public is crucial as to whether a prospectus is required to be prepared (which is an expensive task). The word 'public' is given a very wide meaning under the Companies Ordinance. Under section 48A of the Companies Ordinance, 'public' includes a reference to:

193 These are modelled closely to the UK Financial Services and Markets Act 2000.

194 'Professional investors' is defined in section 1, Part 1, Schedule 1 to the Securities and Futures Ordinance, and section 3 of the Securities and Futures (Professional Investor) Rules.

195 These are modelled closely to the UK Financial Services and Markets Act 2000.

196 Companies Ordinance, s 38(3).

> '. . . any section of the public, whether selected as members or debenture holders of the company concerned or as clients of the person issuing the prospectus or in any other manner.'

The last part of the definition is generally taken to mean that the word 'public' also refers to persons selected as a class in any other manner. The meaning of 'public' is not restricted to persons within Hong Kong.

Under section 48A(2) of the Companies Ordinance, an offer or invitation to the public will not be treated as made to the public if it can properly be regarded, in all the circumstances, as not being calculated to result, directly or indirectly, in the shares or debentures becoming available for subscription or purchase by persons other than those receiving the offer or invitation; or if it can be properly regarded as otherwise of domestic concern to the persons making and receiving it.[197]

Under section 343(2) of the Companies Ordinance, an offer of shares or debentures for subscription to any person whose ordinary business is to buy or sell shares (whether as principal or agent) may not be deemed an offer to the public.[198]

The above exemptions (commonly known as 'domestic concern exemption' and 'professional's exemption') are independent of the 12 safe-harbour exemptions in Schedule 17 of the Companies Ordinance. Hence, to be an exempted offer, it may either be an offer not made to the public, or fall within the safe-harbours in Schedule 17 to the Companies Ordinance.

Although there is little direct Hong Kong judicial authority regarding section 48A of the Companies Ordinance, there is a wealth of relevant English and other case law.[199] While a detailed review of such case law will not be pursued here, it can be fairly said that there are no clear criteria for determining whether an offer or invitation addressed to a group of people constitutes an offer to a section of the public. However, practitioners generally suggest that the following factors will be taken into consideration:

- Number of offerees comprising the group, with between 20 and 50 offerees being usually recommended;

197 Companies Ordinance, s 48A(2). This is commonly known as the 'domestic concern exemption' and has been generally constructed as constituting an exemption for offers to employees.

198 This is commonly known as the 'professional's exemption'.

In HKSAR v Ma Wai-kwan and others (29 July 1997), the Hong Kong Court of Appeal held that the Common Law and rules of equity of England which applied in Hong Kong on 30 June 1997 continue to apply in Hong Kong, subject to their independent development.

- Subsisting relationship between the offeror and offerees;[200]
- Characteristics of the group of offerees;[201] and
- Connection between the nature of the offer and the characteristics of the offerees.[202]

Under the Listing Rules, rule 8.24 provides that the SEHK will not regard any connected person of a listed company as a member of the public. Rule 8.24 states that, in addition, the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong will not recognise the following persons as members of the public:

- Any person whose acquisition of securities has been financed directly or indirectly by a connected person; or
- Any person who is accustomed to take instructions from a connected person in relation to the acquisition, disposal, voting or other disposition of securities of the issuer registered in his name or otherwise held by him.

Securities and Futures Commission Exemptions. Under sections 38A and 342A of the Companies Ordinance, the SFC is empowered to grant exemptions on application or by its own motion (either on a case-by-case basis or generally through subsidiary legislation) from compliance with certain prospectus-related requirements if it considers that compliance with the requirements would either be irrelevant or unduly burdensome.

Place of Order

In Hong Kong, as in many other jurisdictions with developed securities law, hawking of securities is generally prohibited. Section 174(1) of the SFO imposes a generally prohibition against hawking of securities:

> 'An intermediary, or a representative of an intermediary, may not, as principal or agent, during or as a consequence of an unsolicited call[203] made, whether in Hong Kong or elsewhere, by it or him –

200 Whether a subsisting relationship between the offeror and offerees renders an offer private will depend on the nature of the relationship, in particular, whether the relationship in question is commercial in nature. Section 48A provides that an offer made to clients is not necessarily a private offer. As the objective of the Companies Ordinance is to protect the investing public, the authorities are unlikely to interpret the provisions of the Ordinance liberally.

201 If an offer is made on terms that only certain persons are eligible to accept, it is more likely to be a non-public offer. Corporate Affairs Commission (SA) v Australian Central Credit Union (1985) 157 CL Rules 201, at p 209; 1985 (61) AL Rules 236 and 241; 10 ACL Rules 59 and 63.

202 A rational connection between the common characteristic of the offerees and the nature of the offer will point towards the existence of a private offer. The connection should be such that the offerees' interests in the subject matter of the offer are so special that it is not necessary to protect them as public investors.

‘(a) make or offer to make with another person -

‘(i) an agreement for that other person to sell or purchase, or with a view to having that other person sell or purchase, any securities, futures contract or leveraged foreign exchange contract;

‘(ii) an agreement to provide, or with a view to providing, to that other person securities margin financing; or

‘(a) induce or attempt to induce another person to enter into an agreement referred to in paragraph (a), whether or not in making the unsolicited call it or he does any other act or thing.’

Section 174(2) of the SFO provides that:

‘An intermediary, or a representative of an intermediary, may not be regarded as contravening subsection (1) by reason only that it or he -

‘(a) makes a call on another person who is a solicitor or certified public accountant acting in his professional capacity, or is a licensed person, registered institution, money lender or professional investor, or its or his existing client; and

‘(b) whether as principal or agent, makes or offers to make with that other person an agreement referred to in subsection (1)(a), or induces or attempts to induce that other person to enter into such an agreement.’

Section 174(3) of the SFO grants certain exceptions to the section 174(1) prohibition and provides that section 174(1) does not apply to:

‘(a) agreements relating to securities, futures contracts or leveraged foreign exchange contracts or to securities margin financing which are of

'(c) calls made on a person who is of a class prescribed by rules made under section 397 for the purposes of this paragraph;

Section 174(5) of the SFO provides that any person who contravenes section 174(1) is guilty of an offence and liable, on conviction, to a fine at level 5.[204]

Listed Securities

Where publicly offered securities are to be quoted on the SEHK, in addition to the requirements imposed by the Companies Ordinance (discussed above), the prospectus also must comply with the listing requirements. The listing requirements aim to provide all relevant information to potential investors by way of prescribed disclosure.

Appendix 6 of the Listing Rules (Placing Guidelines for Equity Securities) sets out the SEHK's placing guidelines for private placements of equity securities. These requirements assume a distribution of the relevant securities through members of the Stock Exchange of Hong Kong. If this is not the case, the issuer is required to obtain further waivers from the SEHK in respect of the Appendix 6 requirements.

A private placement will not normally be permitted unless the market capitalisation of the securities to be placed is at least HK $25 million,[205] which would normally require the company's market capitalisation to exceed HK $100 million.

Unlisted Securities

An offer of unlisted securities will need to comply with the requirements of the Companies Ordinance, unless otherwise exempted under the provisions discussed above.

Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings

In General. Part XV of the SFO sets out certain disclosure requirements relating to substantial holdings of securities. It affects all companies listed on the SEHK, 204 This is a maximum of HK $50,000: section 113C and Schedule 8 of Criminal Procedure Ordinance (Cap 221).

205 Listing Rules, Appendix 6, para 1.

regardless of their place of incorporation. Generally, the companies are required to provide the investing public with information on details of shareholders and holdings of directors and chief executive officers.

It may be worth noting that the SFO only governs matters that take place after its commencement on 1 April 2003. Non-disclosure of interests which took place before 1 April 2003 are still governed by the repealed Securities (Disclosure of Interests) Ordinance. However, due to limited space, this chapter will not cover the Securities (Disclosure of Interests) Ordinance.

Applicability. The SFO, Part XV, applies to officers and substantial shareholders of all companies listed in Hong Kong. Breach of disclosure requirements under the SFO constitutes a criminal offence, and any person liable on conviction or indictment is subject to a fine and imprisonment for two years, or on summary conviction to a fine and imprisonment for six months.[206]

There has been some debate as to whether Hong Kong's laws should be expressed to have extra-territorial effect. In practical terms, however, Hong Kong criminal law can only be enforced within Hong Kong.

Shareholders' Duties. Part XV of the SFO imposes disclosure obligations when a person's shareholdings reach a particular threshold. A person is required to make a disclosure if:

- He had, at the commencement of the SFO,[207] or acquires after the commencement of the SFO, an interest of 5 per cent or more in the issued share capital of a listed company (a 'notifiable interest');[208] or
- He has a short position in the issued and unissued shares comprised in the share options of a listed company of one per cent or more.[209]

The time limit for disclosure is three business days after the day on which the shareholder becomes aware of the event giving rise to the duty of disclosure.[210] 'Relevant share capital' means issued share capital of a class of shares which carries voting rights in all circumstances at general meetings of the company, and unissued shares of a class of the listed company's share capital which, if issued, would carry voting rights in all circumstances at general meetings of the company.

206 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 328. See also Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 351 in relation to company officers.

207 Part XV of the Securities and Futures Ordinance came into effect on 1 April 2003. The provisions were derived from section 3 of the repealed Securities (Disclosure of Interests) Ordinance (Cap 396).

208 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 315(1)(a). This was reduced from 10 per cent under the repealed Securities (Disclosure of Interests) Ordinance (Cap 396), to bring Hong Kong in line with international standards.

209 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 315(2)(a).

210 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 325. 'Business day' generally includes Saturday. This was reduced from five working days under the repealed Securities (Disclosure of Interests) Ordinance (Cap 396).

'Interest in shares' comprised in relevant share capital includes interests in issued and unissued shares, as well as the underlying shares of equity derivatives that a person has, or ceases to have, by virtue of the holding, writing or issuing by him of equity derivatives, or the assignment by him or the lapse of rights under the equity derivatives.[211] 'Interest in shares' includes 'an interest of any kind whatsoever'.[212] Under the CCASS system, the HKSCC, which operates the CCASS system, is the legal owner of all securities in Hong Kong publicly listed companies that have entered the CCASS trading system. The securities are registered in the name of HKSCC or its nominees. Accordingly, a change of equitable interest (as opposed to the passing of legal title) also may trigger disclosable interests.

'Equity derivatives' means any right, options or interests in or in respect of the underlying shares, or contracts the purpose or pretended purpose of which is to secure or increase a profit or avoid or reduce a loss, wholly or partly by reference to the price or value, or a change in the price or value, of the underlying shares or any rights, options or interests referred to above.[213] 'Basket derivatives' are excluded, and refer to equity derivatives where no less than five listed companies' shares will be required to be delivered on the exercise of rights or fulfilment of obligations under the equity derivatives, and at the time of issue, no more than 30 per cent or such other prescribed percentage of value of all the shares which would have been the underlying shares of the equity derivatives is represented by the shares in any one of those listed companies, or where the prices or values of no less than five listed companies' shares play a part in the derivation or determination of the price or value of the equity derivatives and no more than 30 per cent or such other prescribed percentage of the price or value of the equity derivatives is derived from or determined by the prices or value of the equity derivatives or is derived from or determined by the prices or values of the shares in any one of those listed companies.

Hence, interests in non-voting shares remain not disclosable for the purposes of sections 310–313 of the SFO. However, interests in subscription warrants, put options, call options, convertibles and executive options will need to be disclosed. Under sections 308(1), 310 and 313 of the SFO, short positions may no longer be netted off with long positions and must therefore also be disclosed.

Small changes (of 0.5 per cent or less) in shareholdings do not need to be further disclosed by shareholders already holding five per cent or more of issued share capital of a listed company (commonly referred to as the 'de minimis' exception).[214] If the percentage level of interests in shares or short position in shares at a relevant time (after rounding down to the next whole figure) is the same as or less than the percentage level of last notification, and the difference between the two percentage figures (without round down) is less than 0.5 per cent, no disclosure duty arises.[215]

In practice, due to the complexity in applying the de minimis exception, many shareholders may disclose such small movements of shareholding even though this exception may be applied. In addition to the disclosure obligations of direct shareholding interests, sections 316 and 317 of the SFO require indirect interests to be disclosed. A person is deemed to be indirectly interested in the shares:

- In which his spouse or any child under the age of 18 years is interested;[216]
- Which are beneficially owned by a company (whether incorporated in or outside Hong Kong) in which that person exercises one-third or more of the voting power at general meetings;[217]
- Which that person has contracted to purchase;[218]
- In respect of which the person is not the registered holder but is entitled to exercise any right conferred by the holding of the shares or is entitled to control the exercise of any such right;[219]
- In respect of which that person has a right (whether conditional or absolute) to subscribe for shares or call for delivery of shares;[220]
- In respect of which that person has the right or is under an obligation (whether conditional or absolute) to take an interest;[221]
- In respect of which that person is a party to a 'section 317 agreement', ie, deemed to have an interest in the shares in which any other party to the section 317 agreement also has an interest (concert party interests);
- In respect of which that person is the holder, writer or issuer of equity derivatives, ie, deemed to have an interest in the underlying shares of the equity derivatives if he has a right to require another person to deliver those underlying shares to him, or he is under an obligation to take delivery of the underlying shares, or he has a right to receive from another person an amount if the price of the underlying shares increases, or he has a right to avoid or reduce a loss if the price of the underlying shares increases;[222] and

- In respect of which that person having a joint interest or short position is deemed to have an interest in the shares.[223]

Section 317 of the SFO deals with concert party interests, and applies to an agreement between two or more persons, which includes provisions (a) for the acquisition of interests in shares in the 'relevant share capital' of a listed company, and (b) which impose obligations or restrictions regarding the use, retention or disposal of the shares which are the subject of the agreement, or provides for the making of a loan or the providing of security for a loan, by a controlling person or a director of the target company to any person on the understanding or with the knowledge that such loan would be used for the acquisition of an interest in shares compromised in the relevant share capital of the target company, and an interest in shares in the relevant share capital of the target company is in fact acquired by any of the parties in pursuance of such agreement.

Certain interests in shares exceeding the regular disclosure threshold are excluded from disclosure. Section 323 of the SFO contains the main exclusions:

- Interest of a bare trustee, interest in reversion or remainder, and any discretionary interest in respect of shares held on trust;
- Interest for the life of a person, or of another, under an irrevocable settlement and the settlor has no interest in any income arising under, or property comprised in, the settlement;
- Exempt custodian interest;
- Interest which subsists by virtue of an authorised collective investment scheme or registered provident fund scheme; and
- 'Exempt security interest', ie, interests in shares held by a person who is an authorised financial institution or an insurer authorised pursuant to the Insurance Companies Ordinance or a person licensed or registered for securities dealing, or security margin financing under the SFO.

Such shares are held by way of security only for the purposes of a transaction entered into in the ordinary course of business as such a qualified lender. The exemption will no longer be available when the qualified lender becomes entitled to exercise voting rights in respect of the shares held as security as a result of or following a default by the person giving the security interest, and has evidenced an intention to exercise the voting rights or control their exercise, or taken any step to exercise the voting rights or control their exercise, or when the qualified lender offers for sale the security interest when the power of sale becomes exercisable.

In normal circumstances, a charge over the shares in a listed company held by a bank in the ordinary course of its business will be an 'exempt security interest'. The bank as the beneficial owner of the shares will, assuming that the number of shares exceeds the five per cent threshold, be obliged to disclose its beneficial interest. Directors and chief executives of a listed company have to disclose any trust interests in which they are the discretionary objects if the trust property consists of shares in the company in which they are directors or directors of its associated company.[224]

Directors' Duties. The duties of disclosure placed on directors, chief executives and shadow directors are more onerous than those placed on shareholders.[225] A duty to disclose may arise even though a shareholding is not 'substantial'. The main differences between the duties of company officers and substantial shareholders' obligations are described below:

- There is no percentage threshold applicable to disclosures by company officers. Any shareholding and short position, however small, must be disclosed;
- Officers' interests in the debentures of a listed company, as well as shares, and short position must be disclosed; and
- Disclosure of interests in shares, debentures and short position in shares of 'associated corporations' of the listed company also is required. An 'associated corporation' in relation to a listed company means a corporation (whether incorporated in Hong Kong or elsewhere) that is: (a) a holding company, subsidiary or fellow subsidiary of the listed company or (b) a company in which the listed company holds shares of a class exceeding in nominal value 20 per cent of the nominal value of the issued shares of that class.

Companies' Duties. Division 5 of Part XV of the SFO grants wide powers of investigation to listed companies to ascertain the persons who are or were, within the past three years, interested in its relevant share capital and the nature of such interests.

The wide powers of investigation may be invoked on the listed company's own volition.[226] At the same time, however, the listed company is obliged to carry out such an investigation if it receives a written requisition from shareholders holding at least 10 per cent of its paid-up voting capital for it to do so.[227]

The disclosure obligations imposed on any such interested person under section 329 of the SFO are far more extensive than the disclosure obligations of substantial shareholders in sections 310–323 of the SFO, in that:

- The exemptions contained in section 323 of the SFO (described above) are not applicable;
- There is no threshold below which disclosure need not be made; and 225 Securities and Futures Ordinance, Divisions 7–9.

226 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 329.
227 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 331.

- The disclosure requirement is extended to any person who has or previously had a right to subscribe for shares in a listed company which would on issue be comprised in the relevant share capital.

The exercise of these investigative powers gives rise to certain obligations on the part of the listed company. Any information received by the listed company pursuant to an investigation which it carries out under section 329 of the SFO must be entered into a separate part of its register of interests in shares and short positions and be directed to the SEHK, the SFC and (where appropriate) the Commissioner of Banking.[228]

Where a section 329 notice is issued on a requisition by shareholders, the company must prepare a final report (and, if the investigation is not concluded within three months, an interim report for each three-month period during the investigation) on the information received,[229] which must be made available at the company's registered office within 10 business days of the end of the period to which it relates. The company must notify the shareholders in question within three days that the report is available. The listed company also must publish the report at such time, in such manner and for such period as may be specified by the SFC by notice published in the Gazette. The report must be made available for inspection by any member of the company and the public.[230]

The company also is required to deliver a copy of the report to the SEHK, the SFC and, where appropriate, the HKMA before the end of the business day after the report is first made available at the company's registered office.[231]

Substantial Shareholders' Register. Every listed company must keep a register of substantial shareholders to record information received from a person in the performance of his disclosure obligation under Divisions 2-5 of the SFO, and to record cessation as to an interested party in an agreement to which section 317 of the SFO applies. The register of substantial shareholders must be updated within three business days after the day on which such information arises.[232]

Officers' Register. Every listed company also must keep an officers' register for the purpose of recording information given by an officer in the performance of a duty of disclosure under Division 7-9 of the SFO.[233] Thus, whenever a company receives information from any of its directors or its chief executive officer pursuant to section 352(5) of the SFO, it is under a duty to enter in the officers' register, against the officer's name, that information and the date of the entry within three business days after the day on which the relevant information was received.

Both the substantial shareholders' register and the officers' register must be kept at the registered office of the company in Hong Kong or in the place where the company's register of members is kept. In the case of a foreign company, the registers must be kept at the company's principal place of business in Hong Kong. The foreign company must inform the Registrar of Companies of the place where the registers are kept and of any change in that place, unless such registers are kept at the company's registered office in Hong Kong.[234] Both registers must be made available for inspection by any member of the company (without charge) and by the public (with a maximum charge of HK $10) for at least two hours a day during normal business hours.

Authorised Financial Institutions. If a listed company or any of its subsidiaries is an authorised financial institution, namely a bank or a deposit-taking company licensed or registered under the Banking Ordinance, any notification given by the company to the SEHK also must be given to the Commissioner of Banking.[235]

Hong Kong Financial Secretary. The SFO empowers the Hong Kong Financial Secretary to investigate and report on the ownership of shares under certain circumstances under section 356 of the SFO.

The Financial Secretary may make a 'freezing order' in respect of shares registered in a Hong Kong Register of members or on equity derivatives in respect of Hong Kong registered shares in relation to which an offence has been committed.[236]

Market Misconduct, Insider Trading and Fraud

Basis of Territorial Link. Besides criminal and civil liabilities, insider dealing activity poses serious reputation risk. Banks, securities and futures licensees and listed companies are required to establish and maintain appropriate internal control systems, including measures to ensure compliance with all relevant laws and rules. For example:

- The SFO requires every company to put in place reasonable measures to prevent its officers from engaging in insider dealing.[237] Failure by any officer to comply with these measures may give rise to civil sanctions under section 258 of the SFO (including disqualification as a director and prohibition from dealing in securities for a period not exceeding five years).
- The Listing Rules impose a general obligation on listed companies to disclose price-sensitive information to the market in a timely manner.[238] In addition, directors of listed companies are restricted from dealing in securities of their company.[239] The directors of listed companies are also required to ensure that employees of the companies who are likely to be in possession of unpublished price-sensitive information are subject to the same dealing restriction.[240]

- Staff members of HKMA-regulated institutions are prohibited from dealing in the securities of any listed company when the institution is in possession of privileged or price-sensitive information not generally known to the public.[241]
- Persons licensed by or registered with the SFC are required to implement and maintain measures appropriate to ensure compliance with SFC and the SEHK rules, regulations and codes.[242]

The SFO utilises dual civil (Part XIII) and criminal (Part XIV) regimes to regulate market conduct. The SFC can either bring a civil case before the Market Misconduct Tribunal (MMT)[243] or commence criminal proceedings against an alleged insider dealer. In deciding whether to prosecute, the SFC will have regard to the guidelines in the prosecution policy of the Department of Justice, which require two basic factors to be considered:

- The strength of the SFC's case — The burden of proof is greater in criminal proceedings and the SFC will only recommend criminal proceedings where there is admissible and reliable evidence that an offence has been committed and there is a reasonable prospect of a conviction. Where there is insufficient evidence to meet the criminal burden of proof, the SFC is likely to initiate civil proceedings.
- Public interest — Whether it is in the public interest to bring a prosecution before the courts, taking into account the circumstances of a particular case.

Under the civil regime, the SFC is empowered to impose a financial penalty not exceeding the greater of HK $10 million or three times the amount of profit gained or loss avoided by the insider dealer.[244] Under the criminal regime, an insider dealer could be subject to a maximum fine of HK $10 million and 10 years' imprisonment upon conviction.[245] The first conviction leading to jail sentences for insider dealing took place in 2009. Ten individuals were convicted of insider dealing in the indictable trials for this offence under the SFO, including a former managing director of a global bank who was jailed for seven years and fined $23 million, a record high imposed on an insider.

244 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 194(2).
245 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 303(1).

The first indictable prosecution for market manipulation under the SFO also happened during 2009. Separately, the SFC also maintained civil proceedings to secure the suspected proceeds of market misconduct. In one case the SFC secured interim orders freezing assets generated from a suspected fraud of up to HK $1.655 billion, the largest amount that the SFC had ever applied to the Court to freeze.

The Market Misconduct Tribunal (MMT), established in 2003, carries out civil proceedings and hears cases referred to it by the Financial Secretary following investigation by the SFC. In 2009, the MMT concluded three cases, and nine persons or companies were found to have engaged in market misconduct. The MMT's predecessor, the Insider Dealing Tribunal (IDT), finalised its last two cases, bringing the number of cases concluded by the IDT to 27 and finding 65 persons culpable of insider dealing.

The definition of insider dealing is the same under both civil and criminal regimes. It is defined in the SFO by reference to various situations in which insider dealing occurs.[246] It has been noted that the majority of successful convictions for insider dealing by the SFC fall under one of the following scenarios:[247]

- Where a person connected with a listed company deals in (or counsels or procures another to deal in) the securities of the listed company (or a related company) when the person is in possession of what he or she knows to be inside information (ie, price-sensitive information not available to the public-at-large);[248]
- Where a person receives inside information and then deals in (or counsels or procures another to deal in) the securities or derivatives to which the information relates; and
- Where a person connected with a listed company receives inside information and then discloses the information to another person knowing that the other person will make use of the information to deal in (or counsel or procure another to deal in) the securities or derivatives to which the information relates.

In February 2012, an independent non-executive director of the HK Aircraft Engineering Company Ltd (HAECO) was fined HK$ 50,000 and jailed for five months for purchasing HAECO shares after being informed by the CEO of HAECO that Cathay Pacific Airways Ltd, a substantial shareholder of HAECO, would sell all its HAECO shares to Swire Pacific Ltd (a deal which would trigger a general offer for all shares in HAECO).

company. All of them bought shares in the listed company prior to the proposed deal and made a profit. The vice-president and his girlfriend were given custodial sentences and the family members were ordered to do community service.

Fines were also imposed in the amounts equal to profits made by the defendants. This case, in March 2009, was the first indictable trial in the District Court for insider dealing under the SFO. To avoid dual civil and criminal provisions creating an excessive burden, Parts XIII and XIV of the SFO contain 'anti-double jeopardy' provisions.[250]

SFC Investigations and Secrecy Provisions. These are set out in section 378 of the SFO, creating the secrecy obligation, the exceptions to it and the consequences of breaching it.

There is the legal requirement that, except in the performance of a function under the SFO or for the purpose of carrying into effect or doing anything authorised under any of the provisions of the SFO, a 'specified person' must not disclose any matter coming to his knowledge (including the fact that he is being investigated by the SFC; or the fact that he is in the course of assisting a person who is being investigated). The secrecy provisions disallow any person to have access to any record of information however compiled or stored or to communicate any document in his possession as a result of such investigation.

SFC Winding Up Powers. The SFC has the power to wind up companies if it believes this to be in the public interest.[251] Until recently, this power had never been exercised by the SFC before. On 26 July 2013, on evidence and allegations of fraud, the SFC initiated the high profile provisional liquidation of China Metal Recycling (Holdings) Limited, a Hong Kong-listed company (SEHK: 773). In its statement, the SFC said that it decided to take action to 'protect the interests of the company's shareholders, and creditors, and the investing public'.[252]

Public Takeover Bids

Territorial Application. Takeovers and mergers affecting public companies in Hong Kong are regulated by the SFC in accordance with the Code on Takeovers and Mergers (Takeovers Code). The Takeovers Code is administered by the Takeovers Executive in charge of takeovers and mergers in the Corporate Finance Division of the SFC in consultation with the Takeover and Mergers Panel. The Takeover and Mergers Panel (which consists of prominent members drawn from the financial and investment communities, as well as several directors of the SFC) hears matters referred to it by the SFC Takeovers Executive, reviews rulings made by the Executive and conducts disciplinary proceedings (which may be open to the public).

Traditionally, the Takeovers Code is a non-statutory code largely based on the London Code on Takeovers and Mergers. However, in recent years, there is a growing divergence of these two codes.[253] The Takeovers Code is not concerned with the financial or commercial advantages or disadvantages of a takeover or merger. Rather, its main objective is to achieve fair treatment[254] by requiring equality of treatment of shareholders, mandating disclosure of timely and adequate information to enable shareholders to make an informed decision as to the merits of an offer and ensuring that there is a fair and informed market in the shares of the public company which is the subject of a takeover or merger. The general principles of the Takeovers Code include:

- All shareholders must be given an opportunity to exit if control of a company changes;
- Offerors should only announce their offer after careful and responsible consideration;
- Parties to an offer must make full and prompt disclosure of all relevant information and avoid the creation of a false market;
- Rights of control should be exercised in good faith and there should be no oppression of minority shareholders; and
- Parties to the offer must cooperate with the Takeovers Executive and the Takeover and Mergers Panel.

The Takeovers Code applies to all public companies including those listed on the SEHK, whether they are incorporated in Hong Kong or overseas. Certain publicly listed vehicles, including unit trusts and mutual funds, appear to be exempt from the application of the Takeovers Code. With effect from 25 June 2010, the Takeovers Code also applies to SFC-authorised Real Estate Investment Trusts (REITs).

The great majority of Hong Kong listed companies are effectively controlled by one shareholder or a small group of shareholders acting in concert. A change of control can usually only be achieved when the controlling shareholder agrees to sell his shares or allow his shareholding to be substantially diluted through new share or convertible bond issues. Thus, the market for corporate control is effectively a private one, and there is generally no contest for control because either control has already changed through private agreement or the controlling shareholder has consolidated his control by acquiring shares held by the public.

Hence, the application of the Takeovers Code in Hong Kong is distinct from many other developed markets, even from the United Kingdom, where corporate control

253 For example, the London Code includes convertible securities in the calculation of trigger percentage and does not have the ‘creeper’ provision for shareholders holding between 30 per cent and 50 per cent of a listing company.

254 Takeovers Code, r 1.2.

is often spread quite widely across the investing public and the board of directors effectively exercise full control. In these markets, change of control will require the predator to make an offer to public shareholders for some or all of their shares, frequently leading to hostile takeover bids. Regulators in these jurisdictions would have to ensure the proper and orderly conduct of the bid, and that competition between interests remains fair.

As a result of the private nature of the Hong Kong market, the Takeovers Executive has taken an active role (compared with regulators in other countries) in investigating breaches of the Takeovers Code and in supervising the quality of disclosures in offer documentation. This is partly due to the comparative weakness in Hong Kong of other forms of market checks and balances (unlike other jurisdictions which require compliance documentation), as well as the generally higher cost of civil remedies.[255]

Connecting Factors — International Private Law

A typical contravention of the Takeovers Code involves the warehousing of shares by 'concert parties' for the purpose of avoiding the requirements of the Takeovers Code to make a mandatory general offer. Such cases normally also involve the making of false statements in public documents which, if evidence meeting the usual criminal standard is available, would lead to prosecutions under section 21 of the Theft Ordinance. For example, the Hong Kong District Court in September 2008 convicted two bankers, three corporate finance lawyers and a listed company financial controller of conspiracy to defraud in connection with their work on the takeover of imGO (later renamed 'Shanghai Land').

The Court found that they had played a part in connection with false and incorrect representations about the deal in various company documents (and, in some cases, concealment and non-disclosure of important materials) and in correspondence with the SEHK and SFC, and imposed jail sentences ranging from 12 to 33 months. While the Court of Final Appeal subsequently quashed the convictions of all five defendants, this case highlights the real risk corporate advisers face for material disclosure.[256]

However, as with most cases of offence relating to securities transactions, proving that a 'concert party' exists is extremely difficult.[257] The Takeovers and Mergers Panel generally based its decision on the existence of probative evidence, which is the standard for inquisitorial tribunals laid down by the Privy Council in the United Kingdom.

255 For example, the financial media in Hong Kong is less influential in encouraging the maintenance of proper standards.

256 HKSAR v Habibullah and others (FACC6/2010).

257 For examples of panel decisions regarding 'acting in concert', see: Merdeka Resources (http://www.sfc.hk/sfc/doc/EN/cfd/mergers/panel/014g per cent20- per cent20Panel per cent20Decision-Merdeka per cent20(Final).pdf) and China Oriental (http://www.sfc.hk/sfc/doc/EN/cfd/mergers/panel/panel_decision_20071206.pdf).

Following the principles applied by the London Panel on Takeovers and Mergers in its Decision of 5 May 1989 in relation to the Guinness Plc offer for The Distillers Company Plc., which was that Guinness be directed to make compensatory payments to the shareholders of United Distillers who were disadvantaged by the failure of Guinness to make a takeover offer at a time when Guinness breached the trigger provisions of the London Code, the Hong Kong Takeover and Mergers Panel also decided that the appropriate compensation should be the difference between the price at which the general offer should have been made and the price which the beneficial owner of the shares eventually received when he sold the shares.[258]

Procedural Requirements

The following highlight the basic features of the Takeovers Code and give a brief overview of its main procedural requirements. The terms and conditions of an offer for the shares of a public company are, to some extent, at the discretion of the offeror. However, the offeror must comply with the rules of the Takeovers Code, which aims to ensure that a considered and satisfactory offer is made to the shareholders affected by the offer. In prescribing the terms and condition of the offer, the Takeovers Code draws a distinction between a mandatory offer and a voluntary offer, and allows the offeror more flexibility in the latter case.

A mandatory offer must be made when a person (or two or more persons acting in concert) acquires 30 per cent or more of the voting rights of a company. A mandatory offer also is required if a person (or two or more persons acting in concert) holds between 30 per cent to 50 per cent of the voting rights of the company, and such person(s) acquires more than two per cent of the voting rights of the company over the preceding 12-month period. In either case, an offer must usually be made to the shareholders for the rest of the shares of the company. Other than acceptance condition, a mandatory offer must not be subject to other conditions. Hence, in the case of a mandatory offer in which the offeror and its concert parties already hold more than 50 per cent of the offeree, the offer is unconditional. For voluntary offers, in addition to the acceptance offer, the offer can be subject to other 'objective' conditions.

The Code imposes a general rule that all target shareholders be treated equally and hence should be offered the same price per share, such that no shareholder should receive additional or collateral consideration and in certain circumstances a 'best price' rule may apply. In the case of a mandatory offer, the 'best price' rule requires that the offeror pay no less than the highest price paid by the offeror for shares in the target company during the offer period and in the six-month period prior to the commencement of the offer.[259]

258 Takeovers and Mergers Panel Decision on Shun Ho Resources Holdings Limited ('Shun Ho'), (formerly Standard-Lloyds Limited), October 1993.

259 Takeovers Code, r 23.

'Acting in concert' is generally defined as any formal or informal agreement that involves active cooperation to obtain or consolidate control of 30 per cent or more of voting rights of a company by any of the persons acting in concert. This concept of parties acting in concert should not be confused with the definition of 'connected persons' under the Listing Rules.

The Takeovers Code contains extensive guidance on who is deemed or presumed to be acting in concert for these purposes. There are a number of specific rulings by the Takeovers and Mergers Panel on what specific scenarios the SFC regards as parties acting in concert which are beyond the scope of this chapter, details of which are available on the SFC website.

The overriding principle which governs the offer documentation is that an offeree's shareholders should be given sufficient information to enable them to make a properly informed decision on the offer. Information included in the offer document should be prepared to the same standard, and be verified in the same manner, as a prospectus for a public offer of shares.

General Principle 6 of the Takeovers Code provides for 'full and prompt disclosure of all relevant information and every precaution to avoid the creation or continuance of a false market'. Directors of the offeror and the offeree are required to accept full responsibility for the accuracy of the information set out in the documentation. Schedules I and II to the Takeovers Code set out the minimum contents requirement of the offer document.

The timing of despatch of the offer document to the shareholders of the offeree company is determined by reference to the announcement date. Generally, the offer document must be despatched within 21 days of the announcement in the case of a cash offer and 35 days in the case of a shares or securities exchange offer. Within 14 days of the posting of the offer document, a response document from the directors of the offeree company or their advisors must be sent out to its shareholders.

Consideration cheques must be posted to accepting shareholders within 10 days of the later of the date on which the offer becomes, or is declared, unconditional and the date of receipt of a duly completed acceptance.[260] If an offer is withdrawn or lapses, the offeror must return the lodged share certificates and acceptance form by post to the offeree company shareholders who accepted the offer.[261] Although the SEHK allows posting of electronic documents and circulars to shareholders on the website, the Takeovers Code requires posting of printed offer documents and acceptance forms.

One important aspect in a takeover is confirmation of financial resources to the SFC and disclosure in the offer document that the offeror has sufficient finance resources to satisfy the full acceptance of the offer; in the case where the offer is in cash, or includes an element of cash, confirmation by a licensed financial adviser or by another appropriate independent party that resources are available to the offeror sufficient to satisfy full acceptance of the offer. The SFC Takeovers Executive often makes enquiries as to the details of such financial resources and often requests supporting evidence (commonly referred to as 'fund proof').[262]

The Takeovers Code contains rules on the conduct of the parties involved (for example, the target board is constrained in its ability to adopt defensive measures and frustrating actions),[263] all announcements made during the offer period, the revision or withdrawal of an offer, profit forecast, property valuation and dealing restrictions before and during the offer, and the requirements to establish an independent committee of the board and to retain a competent duly (licensed by the SFC to advise on Takeover Code issues) independent financial adviser to advise the independent committee in connection with the offer.[264]

It is important for the parties to consult the SFC Takeovers Executive on a proposed course of conduct to which the Takeovers Code may be applicable. In this way, the parties can clarify the basis on which they can properly proceed and thus minimise the risk of taking action which might potentially be a breach of the Takeovers Code or have adverse consequences to the offeror and its concert parties. Request for a ruling should be in the form of a written submission addressed to the Executive Director of the Corporate Finance Division of SFC, enclosing the applicable fees.

Exemptions

The Takeovers Code applies to all public companies in Hong Kong. To determine whether a company is a public company in Hong Kong, the following factors are likely to be relevant:

- The number of public shareholders in the company and the extent of trading in its shares in Hong Kong;
- The voluntary acceptance by the company of regulatory obligations, eg, through listing on the SEHK and adherence to listing obligations (which include compliance with the Takeovers Code);
- The location of the company's head office and place of central management;
- The location of the company's business and assets, including such factors as registration under companies legislation and tax status; and
- The existence or absence of protection available to Hong Kong shareholders as provided by any statute or code regulating takeovers, mergers and share repurchases outside Hong Kong.

262 Para 11 of Schedule I of the Takeovers Code.
263 Takeovers Code, r 4.
264 Takeovers Code, r 2.

Under certain circumstances, the SFC Takeovers Executive may consider waiving an obligation to make a general offer even when the company in question is a public company. These circumstances include where:

- A person incurs an obligation to make a general offer as a result of subscription of new shares in the public company and this person has not dealt in the existing shares in the past six months. This is commonly known as a 'whitewash waiver'.
- A shareholding in a company is pledged as security for a loan and, on foreclosure, the lender incurs an obligation to make a general offer.[265]
- A company is in such a serious financial position that the only way it can be saved is by the issue of new shares without a vote of approval by independent shareholders, or by the acquisition of existing shares by a rescue, which would normally require a general offer to be made. This is another form of 'whitewash waiver'.
- A person incurs an obligation to make a mandatory general offer as a result of an inadvertent mistake, provided that sufficient voting rights are disposed of to persons not connected with the potential offeror within a certain period of time.
- A person (or group of persons acting in concert) acquires 30 per cent or more of voting rights in that company but another shareholder, who must hold at least 50 per cent of the voting rights in that company, states that he will not accept the offer which the purchaser would otherwise be obliged to make.
- A shareholder places part of his existing holdings with independent persons and then subscribes for additional shares in the offeree company so as to reinstate his holding to the percentage held by him prior to the placement, at a price substantially equivalent to the placing price, after taking into account transactional expenses.

Recognition of Foreign Takeover Regulation

The Takeovers Code does not specifically recognise any foreign takeover or other regulations. An occasion in which the SFC had to consider whether it would recognise foreign takeover regulations resulted in the decision by Jardine Matheson Holdings, a multinational conglomerate which had strong historical links with Hong Kong, to withdraw its listing on the SEHK. The Jardine Matheson action followed a decision by the SFC not to agree to its proposal for an exemption or general waiver from the Takeovers Code.

Under one of the proposals put forward by Jardine Matheson, it was suggested that its companies should be exempted from the Takeovers Code because they were at 265 This exception will only be available if the shareholding was pledged to a bank or lending institution on an arm's length basis and in the ordinary course of business, and the lender did not foresee the foreclosure at the time of granting the loan. However, when a lender wishes to sell the shares after foreclosing, the mandatory offer provision will apply to the purchaser.

the time subjected to a regulatory takeover structure in Bermuda (where the group was legally domiciled). In 1993, the Bermuda authorities, at Jardine Matheson's request, enacted five statutory Takeovers Codes, one for each of the five companies in the Jardine Matheson group. This legislation was based on the non-statutory London Code, on which the Takeovers Code also is based. The five special Jardine Matheson Codes do not apply to other Bermuda-registered companies.

The SFC rejected Jardine Matheson's proposal because, in its opinion, the proposed regulatory structure requested by Jardine Matheson for itself in Bermuda did not provide adequate investor protection for Hong Kong shareholders. The administration of the five special Jardine Codes would involve regulation at a considerable distance which the SFC believed would not work to protect Hong Kong investors, especially when the relevant action was taking place in Hong Kong.

The SFC also thought that adequate regulation of takeover activity in Hong Kong required knowledge of the relationships between the parties in Hong Kong (to identify likely concert parties), knowledge of share trading patterns, share price movements and knowledge of other factors and circumstances unique to the Hong Kong business environment.

The Bermudan authorities understandably would not have the same knowledge of the market in Hong Kong as Hong Kong regulators. It would thus be very difficult for the Bermuda Monetary Authority to investigate alleged breaches of the five Jardine Codes taking place in Hong Kong. In addition, it was thought that it would be difficult and expensive for Hong Kong investors to protect their rights via the Bermuda authorities. It should be noted that, despite the withdrawal of its listing, Jardine Matheson remains a 'public' company in Hong Kong to which the Takeovers Code applies.

In effectively requiring Jardine Matheson to comply with two sets of takeover requirements, the SFC considered whether this would result in any serious obstacle to potential offerors wishing to take over any of the companies, and it concluded that, although potential offerors would have to abide by the stricter of the two sets of requirements, there did not appear to be any conflicting requirements. One further example in which the SFC Takeovers Executive recognises foreign regulation is their ability to relax the treatment of profit forecast under the Takeovers Code (which would otherwise require profit forecasts to be reported by both the offeree company's financial advisers and its accountants or auditors)[266] for a foreign offeree company, where such foreign offeree company can show that the requirement to disclose profit forecast or 'deemed' profit forecast would cause genuine practical difficulties.[267]

Jurisdiction Differences

Genuine and False Conflicts

Under Hong Kong conflict of law rules, the applicable law governing the contractual aspects of a commercial contract is the governing law of the agreement. Accordingly, a Hong Kong court would recognise the validity of a security interest as between the contracting parties, if the security interest was validly created under the governing law of the security agreement (assuming the governing law was a valid and proper choice of law). However, the applicable law governing the proprietary aspects of a security interest granted under a security agreement over a share or debt security is the law of the place of its location (lex situs).[268]

Accordingly, lex situs governs the formalities and other perfection requirements which have to be satisfied in order to protect the security interest against competing claims from third parties. A Hong Kong court would recognise the validity of a security interest as regards third parties when the security interest is perfected pursuant to the lex situs. There is intense debate internationally as to where the location of certain types of assets is for the purposes of identifying the relevant lex situs.[269] The position under Hong Kong law for securities has been summarised as follows:[270]

- Directly held bearer securities — A directly held bearer security is located at the place where the bearer certificate is located;[271]
- Directly held registered securities — A directly held registered security is located at the place where the register is located;[272]
- Directly held dematerialised securities — A directly held dematerialised security is located at the place which establishes the statutory regime under which such dematerialised security is issued; and
- Indirectly held securities — The conflict of law rules relating to lex situs of indirectly held securities is complex. The general view in Hong Kong is that an indirectly held security is located at the place of the account or register of such security by the most immediate financial intermediary (regardless of where the interests in other tiers in the chain may be located).[273]

Multilateral Approaches

Substantive Law Solutions

Harmonisation

With regard to the determination of lex situs of indirectly held securities, two international conventions try to address this situation, namely, the Hague Convention and UNIDROIT Convention. Neither has been ratified or adopted yet by Hong Kong.

The Hague Convention on the 'Law Applicable to Certain Rights in Respect of Securities Held by an Intermediary' was introduced on 5 July 2006. It aims to provide legal certainty and predictability as the law applicable to securities that are commonly held through clearing and settlement systems or intermediaries.

The Hague Convention seeks to establish a uniform method for the determination of lex situs of indirectly held securities and harmonise lex situs rules in different countries. It is worth noting that the Hague Convention rules are a modification to the 'place of relevant intermediary approach'. However, to date, Hong Kong has not ratified the Hague Convention and the Hague Convention does not have legal force in Hong Kong.

The UNIDROIT Convention on Substantive Rules regarding Intermediated Securities was adopted in Geneva, Switzerland on 9 October 2009. Unlike the Hague Convention, the UNIDROIT Convention aims to harmonise global rules regarding indirectly held securities by effecting a change in the substantive laws of signatory states (rather than through their conflict of law rules). Contracting states are permitted to opt out of certain rules in the UNIDROIT Convention. It remains to be seen whether, and to what extent, the UNIDROIT Convention is adopted by the PRC for Hong Kong.

Recognition

As capital flow becomes more global, strengthening co-operation amongst international regulators will enhance the supervision of cross-border securities trading activities. Instead of a proliferation of legislation to resolve jurisdictional differences, the policy of authorities in Hong Kong has been to enhance international co-operation with international and foreign securities organisations and regulators.

The SFC is a member of the International Organisation of Securities Commissions (IOSCO), which has worldwide regulatory authority members representing more than 85 per cent of the world's capital markets. Members of the IOSCO resolve to:

- Co-operate in developing, implementing and promoting adherence to internationally recognised and consistent standards of regulation, oversight and enforcement in order to protect investors, maintain fair, efficient and transparent markets, and seek to address systemic risks;

Payment and Securities Settlement Systems 98/26/EC (see Ooi, Shares and Other Securities in the Conflict of Laws (2003), Oxford University Press, p. xxxi).

- Enhance investor protection and promote investor confidence in the integrity of securities markets, through strengthened information exchange and cooperation in enforcement against misconduct and in supervision of markets and market intermediaries; and
- Exchange information at both global and regional levels on their respective experiences in order to assist the development of markets, strengthen market infrastructure and implement appropriate regulation.[274]

The SFC has entered into 86 co-operative arrangements with Mainland and overseas regulators for the purpose of exchange of information and/or investigatory assistance.[275] The SFC also provides and obtains investigatory assistance to/from overseas regulatory authorities from time to time, including obtaining affidavits, witness statements, non-public records and documents.

On 19 June 1993, the SFC and the SEHK entered into a Memorandum of Regulatory Co-operation (MORC) with the China Securities Regulatory Commission, Shanghai Securities Exchange and Shenzhen Stock Exchange. The MORC allowed PRC-incorporated entities to list their securities in Hong Kong, as well as assist the signatory parties to protect markets, and ensure compliance with each other's laws and rules through mutual assistance and exchange of information.[276]

In May 2002, IOSCO adopted the Multilateral Memorandum of Understanding Concerning Consultation and Cooperation (MMoU). The SFC is a signatory to the MMoU. The objective of the MMoU is to enhance full investigatory co-operation among its signatories, and signatories are obliged to provide assistance to each other (including provision of information).[277]

Procedural Solutions

In HKSAR v Ma Wai-kwan and Others (29 July 1997), after considering the relevant provisions of the Basic Law and the Standing Committee's decision, the Hong Kong Court of Appeal held that the common law and rules of equity of England which applied in Hong Kong on 30 June 1997 continues to apply in the HKSAR, subject to their independent development.

Hence, as regards to all commercial matters (including conflict of laws), Hong Kong law will generally adopt the position in English law pre-30 June 1997.

274 See IOSCO website: www.iosco.org.

277 Kwok and Amour, Hong Kong Securities Law (Dec 2009), s I [206.1], LexisNexis.

English law authority after 1 July 1997 remains of persuasive value, although not binding. In all actions involving conflict of laws, questions of procedure (as opposed to substance) are always determined by the lex fori (ie, the law of the forum in which the case is being litigated). Procedural issues include questions as to the grant of remedies, questions as to who can sue and be sued as parties to the action, questions of evidence (save for presumptions) and the quantification of damages.

Unilateral Approaches

There is no territorial restriction on the scope of the SFO. Persons outside Hong Kong may be held to contravene the SFO. Hence, disclosure requirements under the SFO apply regardless of whether the holder of the interest or short position is resident, or has a presence, in Hong Kong. Similarly, any person (even if outside Hong Kong) who actively markets any services to the public in Hong Kong that would constitute a regulated activity would be subject to Hong Kong licensing requirements.[278]

A judgment of a foreign court would have no direct operation in Hong Kong. However, a foreign judgment may be enforceable in Hong Kong subject to certain conditions, either by action at Common Law or registration under statute. Compared to registration under statute, the Common Law process generally takes longer and costs more.

The normal method of enforcement by Common Law action does not apply for certain countries that have reciprocal arrangements with Hong Kong, whereby judgments in superior courts of Hong Kong will be recognised and enforceable in those jurisdictions and vice versa. Parties may not commence a Common Law action in respect of judgments from the courts of those countries. Judgments from the courts of those jurisdictions are enforceable by registering the judgment in accordance with any of the following statutes:

- Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Ordinance (Cap 319);[279]
- Judgments (Facilities for Enforcement) Ordinance (Cap 9);[280] or
- Mainland Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Ordinance (Cap 597).[281]

In each case, enforcement will be subject to the fulfilment of the requirements set out in the relevant Ordinance and the requirements of the Foreign Judgments (Restriction on Recognition and Enforcement) Ordinance (Cap 46).

278 Securities and Futures Ordinance, s 115.

279 This applies to judgments of commonwealth countries (ie, Bermuda, Brunei, India, Malaysia, New Zealand, Singapore, Sri Lanka and certain Australian courts), and other countries (ie, Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Israel, Italy, and Netherlands).

280 This applies to judgments from English courts.

281 This applies to judgments in civil and commercial matters from certain designated PRC courts.

A foreign judgment that is not covered by the more direct process of registration under statute (discussed above) would still be enforceable in Hong Kong, subject to certain conditions, by action at Common Law. At Common Law, a foreign judgment from a foreign court of competent jurisdiction is enforceable if the following conditions are satisfied:

- The judgment is in personam;[282]
- The judgment is in the nature of a monetary award; and
- The foreign judgment is final and conclusive in the court in which it was rendered.

A foreign judgment will not be registered if:

- The foreign judgment is contrary to Hong Kong public policy;
- The foreign judgment is based upon a foreign penal or revenue law;
- The foreign judgment is tainted by fraud;
- The foreign judgment is contrary to natural justice (due process);
- The Hong Kong court had already given its own judgment in respect of the same matter; and
- The courts of the foreign country did not have jurisdiction to give that judgment under Hong Kong law.

The procedure of enforcing a foreign judgment under Common Law requires an action by way of writ in Hong Kong courts. The burden of proof lies with the person seeking to enforce a foreign judgment. As an alternative to litigation, Hong Kong also is among the 120 signatory jurisdictions to the New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards. Arbitration awards made in Hong Kong are enforceable in more than 120 jurisdictions which are signatories to this Convention, and vice versa.

282 I.e., the judgment is given against a person, as opposed to a judgment that is merely declaratory or in rem. Emmanual v Symon [1908] 1 KB 302.

Introduction

Regulatory System

The existence of an efficient and smooth functioning capital markets plays an important role in the economic development of a country.[1] It is widely believed that one of the key elements of a robust corporate governance regime in any country is the existence of a well-administered securities market. The organized securities market in India is almost 150 years old.

In 1877, the native stock and share brokers association (the 'Bombay stock exchange') was founded to protect and further the interests of the brokers and safeguard public dealing in securities by suppressing malpractices. Prior to World War II, India had three stock exchanges (Bombay, Calcutta, and Ahmadabad) and approximately 11, 372 joint-stock companies.

However, the watershed moment in India's securities regulation came in 1991–1992 when the liberalization of the Indian economy resulted in major reforms in the capital markets.[2]

The immediate effect of the liberalization was the diminishing role of the government as a direct player in the financial market. This necessitated setting up of procedures and guidelines for the creation and preservation of fair and transparent financial markets. Since then, India has seen a steady evolution of capital market regulation.[3]

1 The views expressed in this chapter are the personal views of the authors. This chapter intends to provide an overview of the Indian securities regulations with special emphasis on the aspects that may be relevant to foreign participants. The authors have primarily relied on legislations, regulations, rules, judicial precedents, and committee reports on or before 10 August 2012 for the purposes of this chapter. At the time of writing, the Securities and Exchange Board of India, in its board meeting of 16 August 2012, resolved to make certain changes with respect to primary markets and regulation for investment advisors, and these have not been considered here as they have not been enacted into law.

While the initial threads of securities regulation were incorporated in the late 1980s through the listing agreement between the listed companies and the stock exchanges, a sophisticated legal framework was established only in 1992 under the Securities and Exchange Board of India Act, 1992 (the 'SEBI Act'). The SEBI Act accomplished two important goals.

It established a free and independent regulator, the Securities and Exchange Board of India (the SEBI) to monitor and govern the capital markets in India, and it provided the basic framework for investor protection and market regulation that was hitherto absent.

After 20 years of reforms in the financial sector, India has created a fairly sound regulatory framework for the important but vulnerable financial sector. There has been a convergence towards global best practices especially in securities regulation. While India has taken significant steps towards creating a robust capital market, the challenges, such as regulating new forms of financial products and financial inclusion as one would expect for a country of India's demography and diversity, remain persistent.[4]

Legal Sources

India has a written constitution wherein the power to enact laws vests solely with the central and state legislatures. However, as is the case with legislatures of most modern states, the Indian Parliament has delegated some of its law-making powers to independent regulators. In relation to the securities market, the Parliament has enacted five laws that provide the basic framework for capital markets regulation. These are:

- The Companies Act, 1956, which sets out detailed provisions relating to organization and functioning of various kinds of companies;
- The Securities Contract (Regulation) Act, 1956, which provides for regulation of stock exchanges and confers on stock exchanges the power to make rules and bye-laws governing transactions in securities;[5]
- The Securities Exchange Board of India Act, 1992, which establishes an independent board (the SEBI) to regulate and monitor the securities market, as well as protect the interest of the investors;

3 Report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee, Stock Market Scam and Matters Related Thereto, 13th Lok Sabha, December 2002.

4 Report of the Committee on Financial Sector Reforms, A Hundred Small Steps, (2009).

5 Most of the powers under the Securities Contract (Regulation) Act are exercised by the Department of Economic Affairs, government of India. Some of the powers exercisable under the Securities Contract (Regulation) Act are concurrently exercised by the Department of Economic Affairs and the Securities and Exchange Board of India.

- The Depositories Act, 1996, which provides for electronic maintenance and transfer of ownership of dematerialised securities;[6] and
- The Foreign Exchange Management Act, 1999, which regulates the inflow and outflow of foreign exchange to and from India, respectively, by providing a broad framework for permissible capital and current account transactions and any other dealings related to foreign exchange.

The SEBI also has laid down regulations in order to operationalize the mandate set out in the legislations. Some of the significant regulations that are relevant to capital market transactions are:

- The SEBI (Prohibition of Insider Trading) Regulations, 1992 (the 'Insider Trading Regulations'), are the principal regulations for monitoring and prohibiting insider trading in India;
- The SEBI (Issue of Capital and Disclosure Requirements) Regulations, 2009 (the 'ICDR Regulations'), are the principal regulations governing the primary market, applying to all public issues, private placements, and issue of Indian depository receipts; and
- The SEBI (Substantial Acquisition and Takeovers) Regulation, 2011 (the 'Takeover Code'), regulates substantial acquisition of shares, voting rights, or control, and lays down the open offer and disclosure requirements in respect of such acquisition.

In addition, the equity listing agreement (the 'Listing Agreement') between the company (that is listed or is to be listed) and the stock exchange incorporates the terms and conditions of listing of securities. With respect to foreign participation in the capital markets, the important regulations under the regulatory domain of the SEBI are:

- The SEBI (Foreign Institutional Investors) Regulations, 1995 (the 'Foreign Institutional Investment Regulations'), which prescribe registration requirements and investment conditions for foreign institutional investors; and
- The SEBI (Foreign Venture Capital Investors) Regulations, 2000 (the 'foreign venture capital investor Regulations'), which prescribe registration requirements and investment conditions for foreign venture capital funds.

Authorities

Securities and Exchange Board of India

In General. The SEBI is the apex regulator of the securities market in India. The SEBI has a statutory mandate to regulate the securities market, protect the interest of the investors, and promote and develop the securities market. The SEBI seeks to fulfil this mandate by:

6 The Securities and Exchange Board of India administers the rules and regulation under the Depositories Act.

- Regulating business in the stock exchange or any other securities market;
- Registering and regulating the working of intermediaries, such as stock brokers, sub brokers, share transfer agents, bankers to an issue, trustee of trust deeds, merchant bankers, underwriters, and such other intermediaries who may be associated with the securities market;
- Registering and regulating the working of the depositories, depository participant, custodian of securities, foreign institutional investors and credit rating agencies;
- Promoting and regulating groups or associations of intermediaries;
- Promoting investor education and training of intermediaries; and
- Regulating substantial acquisition of shares and takeovers of listed companies.[7]

In order to achieve this statutory mandate, the SEBI is armed with a variety of quasi-legislative, quasi-executive, and quasi-judicial powers.

Delegated Legislation. The SEBI has the power to make regulations and rules and issue circulars. Typically, the regulations lay down the broad framework and circulars are only issued to clarify the existing regulatory framework.[8]

Inspection and Inquiry. The SEBI's power in relation to inspection and inquiry are akin to that of the civil court. The SEBI can order the discovery and production of books of accounts, summon the attendance of any person, and inspect the books and registers of any person.

These powers are triggered when the SEBI has reasonable grounds to believe that the transactions in securities are being dealt in a manner detrimental to the investors and the securities market or any intermediaries or persons associated with the securities market have violated any securities law, rules, or regulations.[9]

Power of Search and Seizure. The SEBI is empowered to apply to a competent court for an order for the search and seizure of books, registers, and places where such books may be kept, when it has reasonable apprehension that the records could be destroyed, altered, or mutilated.[10]

Interim and Post Inquiry Powers. During the pendency of the investigations or inquiry or after the completion of the investigations, the SEBI has the power to suspend the trading of any security in any recognized stock exchange, prohibit or restrain any person from dealing in securities, suspend any office bearer of a stock exchange, impound and retain the proceeds of securities in respect of any transaction which is under investigation, and attach one or more bank accounts for a maximum period of one month with the approval of the competent court.[11]

Adjudication and Penalty. The SEBI is empowered to appoint adjudicating officers to adjudicate any matter and impose civil penalties. While exercising its adjudicatory powers, the SEBI can summon and enforce the attendance of any person.

Reserve Bank of India

The Reserve Bank of India does not play a direct regulatory role in the Indian capital markets. However, by virtue of being the apex banking authority and the primary regulator of transactions involving foreign exchange, the Reserve Bank of India plays a lead role in transactions involving foreign participation in the Indian capital markets.

Under the Foreign Exchange Management Act, the Reserve Bank of India is empowered to regulate and implement all foreign investments in India. The Reserve Bank of India is vested with powers of delegated legislation in respect of current account transactions, capital account transactions (including external or foreign debt), and the limits up to which foreign exchange will be admissible for such transactions. Additionally, the Reserve Bank of India may formulate regulations specifying the manner of, and limits to, retention or repatriation of foreign exchange.[12]

The Reserve Bank of India, together with the SEBI, the Insurance Regulatory and Development Authority and the Ministry of Finance, constitute the High-Level Group on Capital Markets. The primary role of the High-Level Group on Capital Markets is to coordinate domestic regulators in order to avoid regulatory overlap. The High-Level Group on Capital Markets has set up two standing committees, one for regulatory coordination and the other for coordination relating to the development of the debt market.[13]

Procedures

In exercising its powers, the SEBI is required to strictly adhere to the principles to the fairness and natural justice in any quasi-judicial proceeding. Typically, in any quasi-judicial proceeding, the SEBI appoints an adjudicating officer who issues a show cause notice to the concerned party. After the SEBI has reviewed the oral or written submissions of the concerned party, the SEBI passes a final order in respect of the proceeding.[14]

14 Securities and Exchange Board of India Act, 1992, s 12 and ch VIA.

An appeal against any order of the SEBI lies before the Securities Appellate Tribunal. The Securities Appellate Tribunal is not bound by the procedure generally followed in courts, but is guided by the principles of natural justice and fair play. The Securities Appellate Tribunal is empowered with all the powers which a court would normally have with respect to the summoning and enforcing the attendance of witness, adducing evidence, and reviewing its decisions.[15] To ensure the independence of the Securities Appellate Tribunal, the SEBI Act provides that the presiding officer of the Securities Appellate Tribunal can only be removed from office on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity after an inquiry made by a judge of the Supreme Court of India.[16]

The decisions of the Securities Appellate Tribunal can be further appealed before the Supreme Court of India. The Supreme Court of India is a constitutional court and is the apex court of India. The Supreme Court of India has the power to declare any legislative or executive action unconstitutional. It also has the power to reverse or set aside an order of a judicial or quasi-judicial body.[17]

The SEBI, from time to time, issues an interpretive letter ('Informal Guidance') to resolve ambiguities in any Act, rules, or regulations relating to the securities market. Unlike circulars and guidelines which are issued by the SEBI suo moto to clarify a general legal issue, an informal guidance is issued when any market participant, such as an intermediary, a listed or any prospective acquirer under the Takeover Code, makes an application before the SEBI seeking a clarification in relation to a particular transaction.[18]

A market participant against whom any proceeding is likely to be instituted or is instituted may approach the SEBI for a settlement. Typically, a market participant is required to propose a settlement, which is then examined by a high-powered committee and, after considering the recommendations of the committee, the SEBI passes an appropriate consent order with respect to a settlement.

A consent order can be passed in respect of all types of enforcement or civil remedial actions, such as suspension or cancellation of registration, imposition of monetary penalty, pursuing suits, and appeals in courts and before the Securities Appellate Tribunal.[19]

Securities Market: Legal and Regulatory Order

Market Infrastructure Institutions

Stock Exchanges

The stock exchanges were established as associations of stockbrokers and this structure continued even post liberalization. However, in 2005, there was a paradigm shift in the regulatory framework and stock exchanges that were informal associations of stock brokers had to be corporatized. This was done by segregating the ownership and management of the stock exchanges from the trading rights of the members.[20]

With this intent in mind, the ownership requirements for the stock exchanges were notified by the government of the application of the SCR (Manner of Increasing and Maintaining Public Shareholding in Recognized Stock Exchanges) Regulations, 2006 (the 'MIMPS').

Presently, the individual limit for an individual (resident or non-resident) and financial institutions is capped at five per cent and 15 per cent, respectively. Furthermore, the members of stock exchanges who are involved in trading activities are allowed to cumulatively hold 49 per cent.[21]

Clearing Corporation

Clearing corporations perform a pivotal role in orderly settlement of trades in securities or other products that are dealt with or traded on a recognised stock exchange. A clearing corporation is only eligible to conduct business if at least 51 per cent of its shareholding is held by recognized stock exchanges.

The rationale for such a minimum limit was elaborated upon by a SEBI-appointed committee which believed that, since clearing corporations were at the core of the clearing and settlement function of the exchange, it would only favour the marketplace if the stock exchanges act as anchor investors to the clearing corporations.[22]

Depository/Depository Participant

Unlike some central securities depositories elsewhere that undertake both settlement and electronic record keeping of securities, in India, depositories only perform a record keeping activity. They are not directly connected with stock exchanges. The SEBI often uses records of depositories for its surveillance functions, independent of the data collected from stock exchanges.[23]

Foreign Investment in Market Infrastructure Institutions

The combined holding of all persons resident outside India in the equity share capital of a market infrastructure institution is capped at 49 per cent, subject to the following:

- The maximum permissible limit under foreign direct investment is capped at 26 per cent. Furthermore, the investment does not fall under the automatic route;[24]
- The maximum permissible limit for foreign institutional investors is capped at 23 per cent;[25] and
- Like resident individuals, individuals resident outside India also cannot invest more than five per cent of the equity share capital of a market infrastructure institution.

Public Issue

In General. Indian companies are allowed to raise capital through public issues in accordance with the ICDR Regulations. Public issues in India can be classified into two categories: an initial public offering or a follow-on public offering.

An initial public offering may either be an issue of fresh securities by an Indian company, or transfer of existing securities by existing shareholders of the company to the public, or a combination of both by an unlisted company to the public for the first time.

A follow-on public offering is a subsequent issuance of securities to the public or an offer for sale of existing securities to the public, by a listed company.

Eligibility Requirements. An unlisted company is permitted to make an initial public offering of its equity shares or any convertible securities[26] only if it satisfies certain requirements set out in the ICDR Regulations, such as:

24 An approval from the Foreign Investment Promotion Board would be required prior to making the investment.

25 In the case of exchanges that are not listed, foreign institutional investors can only purchase the shares of the exchange through off market transactions and not through initial allotment, such as an initial public offering or a follow-on public offer. In the case of listed exchanges, foreign institutional investors are permitted to acquire shares only through transactions on the stock exchange and are not allowed to have their representatives on the board of a market infrastructure institution. MIMPS, reg 8(2)(d); Report of the Committee on Review of Ownership and governance of Market Infrastructure Institutions, November 2010 (the 'Bimal Jalaw Report').

- It has net tangible assets of at least INR 30 million in each of the three preceding years, of which not more than 50 per cent is held in monetary assets;
- It has distributable profits for at least three out of the immediately preceding five years;
- It has a net worth of at least INR 10 million in each of the three preceding years; and
- The proposed issue size and all previous issues in the same financial year does not exceed five times its pre-issue net worth as per the audited balance sheet of the last financial year.[27]

Issuer companies that do not meet the above mentioned (and other) basic eligibility norms still might be eligible to conduct an initial public offering or follow-on public offering under certain conditions.[28]

The proposed issue is made through the book building process, and the issuer company undertakes to allot at least 50 per cent of the net offer to the public[29] to institutional buyers such as mutual funds, venture capital funds, foreign institutional investors, scheduled commercial banks, or other qualified institutional buyers,[30] failing which the subscription monies must be refunded in full to the qualified institutional buyers, or at least 15 per cent of the project cost is contributed by financial institutions/scheduled commercial banks, of which not less than 10 per cent is contributed by appraisers.

The minimum post-issue face value capital of the issuer company is INR 100 million or the issuer company undertakes to provide market-making for at least two years from the date of listing of securities subject to fulfillment of certain conditions as specified in the ICDR Regulations.

Promoter Contribution. The promoters of the company proposing to list its securities are required to hold not less than 20 per cent of the post-initial public offering share capital of an issuer company.

In the case of a follow-on public offering, the promoters are required to hold either to the extent of 20 per cent of the proposed issue size or to the extent of 20

26 Regulation 2 of the ICDR Regulations defines a 'convertible security' as 'a security that is convertible into or exchangeable with equity shares of the issue at a later date, with or without the option of the holder of the security, and includes convertible debt instrument and convertible preference shares'.

27 ICDR Regulations, reg 26(1).

28 ICDR Regulations, reg 26(2).

29 ICDR Regulations, reg 2(u), defines 'net offer to public' as an offer of specified securities to the public but does not include reservations.

30 ICDR Regulations, reg 2(zd), provides that 'qualified institutional buyer' means a mutual fund, venture capital fund, foreign venture capital investor, foreign institutional investor or sub-account, a public financial institution, a scheduled commercial bank, bilateral development institution, a state industrial development corporation, provident fund, pension, fund, or insurance fund.

per cent of the post-issue capital. In computing the promoter's holding (or the minimum promoters' contribution as it is generally referred to), certain securities are not taken into consideration, such as securities acquired (in the preceding three years) for consideration other than cash or bonus shares arising out of revaluation of reserves.[31]

The minimum promoters' contribution would not apply to a follow-on public offering where the equity shares of the issuer are not infrequently traded on a recognized stock exchange for a period of at least three years and the issuer has a track record of dividend payment for at least the immediately preceding three years.

Lock-in Restrictions. 'Lock-in' means a freeze or restriction on the transferability of the securities and is analogous to a 'lock-up' as understood in the United States. The lock-in restrictions imposed on a company's share under the ICDR regulations are discussed below:

Lock-in Applicable to Securities Held by Promoters. The rationale for prescribing a lock-in restriction on the securities held by the promoters is to provide a safety net to investors by ensuring that the promoters retain some interest in the issuer company after the initial public offering.

Under the ICDR Regulations, the minimum promoters' contribution referred to above is locked in for three years from the date of commencement of commercial production or date of allotment of the securities in the initial public offering, whichever is later. The lock-in period for the shares held by the promoter(s) in excess of the minimum promoters' contribution is one year.[32]

Lock-in Applicable to Securities Held by Persons Other Than Promoters. In addition to the promoters' lock-in specified above, the entire pre-issue capital of the issuer company (other than the securities locked-in as minimum promoters' contribution) is locked-in for a period of one year from the date of allotment. However, the pre-issue lock-in requirement is not applicable to pre-issue shares held by a SEBI-registered venture capital funds or a SEBI-registered foreign venture capital investor.

This benefit is only available if shares have been held by the venture capital funds or registered foreign venture capital investor for at least one year as on the date of filing of the draft prospectus with the SEBI.[33] Equity shares held by employees under the employee stock option/purchase scheme of the issuer company before the initial public offering.[34] The exemption from the lock-in requirement is not available to employees who cease to be in the employment of the company as on the date of allotment of shares pursuant to the initial public offering.[35]

33 ICDR Regulations, reg 36(b).
34 ICDR Regulations, reg 37(a).

Pricing. The issuer company may freely price the securities in consultation with the lead merchant bankers. The company also can offer securities at different prices subject to certain limitations.[36] Most companies opt for the book-building process to determine the price of the securities in an initial public offering.

The book-building process is used to determine the demand for the proposed issue of the securities. The price of the proposed securities is assessed taking into account the bids received. Where the issuer company opts for the book-building price discovery mechanism, underwriting becomes mandatory to the extent of the net offer to the public.[37]

Offer Document and Disclosure. The issuer company is required to file a draft red herring prospectus with the SEBI and the stock exchanges (where the securities are proposed to be listed) prior to filing the prospectus with the Registrar of Companies.

The SEBI and the stock exchanges may specify changes/observations to the draft red herring prospectus. At this stage, in-principle approval from the concerned stock exchanges must also be obtained. Thereafter, the issuer company must carry out changes as per the observations of the SEBI/stock exchanges before filing the prospectus with the Registrar of Companies.[38]

Prospectus Requirements. The promoter group is required to disclose in the offer documents the risk factors (internal and external), capital structure of the issuer company, objects of the offering, terms of the issue, interest of the directors, financial information of the issuer company, charter documents of the company, business of the issuer company, regulatory approvals, outstanding litigations, the issue procedure, and material contracts.[39]

Rights Issue

A listed company also can raise capital by issuing equity shares or convertible securities to its existing shareholders. This route is best suited for companies that intend to raise capital without diluting the stake of their existing shareholders.

Private Placement

In General. A listed company can raise capital by issuing securities to any select group of persons on a private placement basis. Private placement can be either through preferential issue or qualified institutions placement.

Preferential Issue. A preferential issue by a listed company requires, inter alia, the shareholders of the company to pass a special resolution and the company to be in compliance with the Listing Agreement.[40] An issuer company is not permitted to make a preferential issue to any person who has sold any equity shares of the issuer during the six months preceding the date of issue.

If the shares of the company are listed for 26 weeks or more, the minimum price for a preferntial issue is the higher of the average of the weekly high and low of the closing prices of the related equity shares quoted on the stock exchange during the 26 weeks preceding the relevant date and the average of the weekly high and low of the closing prices of the related equity shares quoted on the stock exchange during the two weeks preceding the relevant date.[41]

The securities allotted on preferential basis to the promoter or promoter group are locked in for a period of three years from the date of allotment of the securities. This lock-in requirement is only applicable to 20 per cent of the total capital of the issuer. If the securities are allotted to any person other than a promoter or the promoter group on a preferential basis, the lock-in would be for a period of one year from the date of allotment.[42]

Qualified Institutions Placement. A listed company can further raise capital by issuing equity shares, non-convertible debt instruments with warrants and convertible securities other than warrants, mutual funds, venture capital funds, registered foreign venture capital investors, foreign institutional investors and sub accounts (other than a sub account which is a foreign corporate or foreign individual), scheduled commercial banks, pension funds, and other such qualified institutional buyers on a private placement basis.[43] Such an issuance is a qualified institutions placement.

Shareholders of a listed company must pass a special resolution approving the allotment of securities of the company through a qualified institutions placement. Equity shares of the same class that are proposed to be allotted through qualified institutions placement should be listed on a recognised stock

40 As per section 189 of the Companies Act, a special resolution requires the positive vote of at least 75 per cent of the shareholders present and voting at a meeting of the shareholders.

41 ICDR Regulations, reg 76; Under the ICDR Regulations, 'relevant date' is the date that is 30 days prior to the date on which the meeting of the shareholders is held to consider the preferential issue. In the case of convertible securities, the relevant date is either same as aforesaid or a date 30 days prior to the date on which the holders of the convertible securities become entitled to apply for the equity shares.

exchange for a period of at least one year prior to the date of issuance of notice to the shareholders for convening the meeting to pass the special resolution.

A placement document must be furnished to the stock exchange along with a certificate confirming compliance with the relevant provisions of the ICDR Regulations.[44] The qualified institutions placement route is subject to certain restrictions and limitations, as opposed to a preferential allotment.

Under this route there must be a minimum of two allottees and, in case the issue size is more than INR 2,500 million, the minimum number of allottees is required to be five. In addition, the promoter or promoter group cannot participate under this route even if they qualify as qualified institutional buyers. The qualified institutions placement route would typically dilute the promoter or promoter group stake. However, the qualified institutions placement route presents multiple advantages vis-à-vis a preferential allotment, such as:

- The pricing of the securities in a qualified institutions placement is based on a two-week price average, as opposed to the pricing requirements for a preferential allotment;
- The shareholders' resolution authorizing the qualified institutions placement is valid for one year, as opposed to a 15-day validity period for the corresponding resolution for a preferential allotment;
- Convertibles and warrants can have a maximum tenure of five years, as opposed to a maximum tenure of 18 months in a preferential allotment; and
- There is no lock-in on the securities purchased through a qualified institutions placement if they are transferred on the stock exchange, while there is a lock-in of one year in a preferential allotment.[45]

Indian Depository Receipts

In General. A foreign company or body corporate can directly participate in the Indian securities market under this route. A foreign corporation is permitted to raise capital in the Indian capital markets through the issuance of Indian depository receipts that are listed on the stock exchange. Indian depository receipts are issued by an Indian depository participant against the underlying equity shares of the foreign corporation. Recently, global banking giant Standard Charted Plc raised up to US $1 billion through Indian depository receipts.[46]

Eligibility Requirements. The eligibility criteria for Indian depository receipts are laid down under the ICDR Regulations, and the rules framed under the Companies Act by the central government. Some of the key eligibility criteria required to be satisfied by the issuing company are as follows:

44 ICDR Regulations, Schedule XVIII.

45 ICDR Regulations, reg 91.

46 Standard Charted PLC launches first ever Indian Depository Receipt 'IDR' offer, press release, 13 May 2010, available at http://www.standardchartered.co.in/media-centre/pdf/2010_13_may_standard_chartered_plc_sepository_receipt_idr.pdf.

- Minimum paid-up capital and free reserves — There must be pre-issue paid-up capital and free reserves of at least US $50 million and a minimum average market capitalization (during the last three years) in its parent country of at least US $100 million;
- Continuous trading record — There must be a continuous trading record or history on a stock exchange in its parent country for at least three preceding years;
- Track record of distributable profits — There must be a track record of distributable profits (declared dividend) for at least three out of the immediately preceding five years; and
- No regulatory prohibition — The issuer may not be prohibited from issuing securities by any regulatory body.[47]

Issue Conditions. Issue size should be a minimum of INR 500 million. The minimum application amount is required to be INR 20,000. The number of underlying equity shares offered in a financial year through IDR offerings should not exceed 25 per cent of the post issue number of equity shares of the company.

A minimum of 50 per cent of the issue size is required to be allotted to qualified institutional buyers. The issuer company has the discretion to apportion the balance of 50 per cent between non-institutional investors[48] and retail individual investors, including employees of the issuer company.[49] If the issuing company does not receive a minimum subscription of 90 per cent of the offer on the date of closure, the issuing company is required to refund the entire subscription received.

Fungibility. The present regulatory framework does not permit fungibility of IDR and only allows redemption of Indian depository receipts. Indian depository receipts can be redeemed if the following two conditions are satisfied:

- They have completed one year from the date of issuance; and
- They are infrequently traded on the stock exchange in India. Indian depository receipts are deemed to be infrequently traded if the annual trading turnover in Indian depository receipts during the six months immediately preceding the

Secondary Market and Takeovers

Trading

The secondary market operates through two mediums, the over-the-counter market and the exchange traded markets. The over-the-counter markets are markets where all trades are negotiated and are immediately paid for and delivered (ie, spot trades). In exchange traded markets the trade takes place with the help of the infrastructure provided by the stock exchange.

Stock exchanges in India follow a systematic settlement period. All trades taking place on a trading day (day = T) are settled together after two days (day = T+2 day). Each trade negotiated on the stock exchange is cleared by the clearing corporation that acts as a counterparty and guarantees settlement.

Stock exchanges in India offer an automated screen-based trading system wherein a participant member can register into the computer the quantities of a security and the price at which he would like to transact, and the transaction is executed as soon as a matching sale or buy order from a counter party is found.

The National Stock Exchange was the first exchange in the world to use satellite communication technology for trading, ie, the National Exchange for Automated Trading.[51]

Takeovers

In India, the capital markets regulation dealing with substantial acquisition of shares has evolved over a period of time. Pre-liberalization, the takeover regulation was incorporated in the listing agreement. A formal framework was only adopted in 1994 with the enactment of the SEBI (Substantial Acquisition of Shares and Takeovers) Regulations, 1994. The 1994 Regulations were repealed and replaced by the SEBI (Substantial Acquisition of Shares and Takeover) Regulations, 1997.

Post-1997, India saw enormous growth and increasing sophistication in mergers and acquisition activity. Recognising the need to revisit the 1997 regulations, the SEBI in 2009 constituted the Takeover Regulations Advisory Committee.[52] Based on the recommendation of the Takeover Regulations Advisory Committee, the SEBI formulated the present Takeover Code (in effect as from October 2011).

Mandatory Open Offer

Threshold Limit. If an acquirer (along with a person acting in concert) acquires 25 per cent or more of the voting rights in a listed company in India, the acquirer is required to make an open offer to acquire at least 26 per cent shares of the total shares of the target company.[53]

This threshold limit is slightly less than the limit prescribed in most jurisdictions such as United Kingdom, Hong Kong, Singapore, and France.[54]

Creeping Acquisition. An acquirer holding 25 per cent or more voting rights in a listed company can acquire additional shares or voting rights to the extent of five per cent of the total voting rights in any financial year subject to the maximum permissible non-public shareholding limit, ie, 75 per cent. Any acquisition beyond the five per cent limit in a financial year would trigger an open offer obligation to acquire at least 26 per cent of the total shares of the target company.[55]

Control. If an acquirer acquirers control[56] over a listed company, directly or indirectly (whether through acquisition of shares, voting rights, or otherwise), the acquirer is required to make an open offer to acquire at least 26 per cent of the total shares of that listed company.

The question as to what constitutes control is a mixed question of law and fact. Some of the instances wherein control is said to have been acquired includes acquisition of the right to appoint majority of the directors, control the management, and control the policy decisions of the company.[57]

Voluntary Offer. An acquirer holding 25 per cent or more voting rights in a listed company can make a voluntary offer for at least 10 per cent of the total shares of the listed company. The acquirer, in order to avail this route of acquisition, should not have acquired the shares of the target company in the preceding 52 weeks.

As in the case of a mandatory offer, in a voluntary offer the acquirer cannot cross the maximum non-public holding threshold, ie, 75 per cent.[58]

Exemptions. Some transactions are exempt from mandatory open-offer requirements, such as:

53 Takeover Code, reg 3(1).

54 Report of the Takeover Regulations Advisory Committee, 31 August 2010, states that in these jurisdictions the open offer threshold is 30 per cent.

55 Takeover Code, reg 3(2).

56 Regulation 2(e) of the Takeover Code defines control as 'control includes the right to appoint majority of the directors or to control the management or policy decisions exercisable by a person or persons acting individually or in concert, directly or indirectly, including by virtue of their shareholding or management rights or shareholders agreements or voting agreements or in any other manner'.

57 Takeover Code, regs 4 and 5, read with reg 2(e).

58 Takeover Code, reg 6.

- Acquisition of shares by the promoters of a company from a venture capital funds or a registered foreign venture capital investor registered with the SEBI pursuant to an agreement between such venture capital funds/registered foreign venture capital investor and the promoters;
- Increase in voting rights of any shareholder pursuant to a buyback of shares provided that such shareholder has not voted in favor of the resolution authorizing the buyback and such increase in voting rights does not result in any acquisition of control by such shareholder over the target company;
- Acquisition of shares by any shareholder, up to his entitlement pursuant to a rights issue; and
- Acquisition by way of a scheme of arrangement pursuant to an order of a court or competent authority under Indian or foreign law.

This last exemption, however, is only available if the target company is directly involved in the said scheme. If the target is not directly involved, an acquisition under such a scheme is exempt subject to two conditions, ie, cash and its equivalent consideration should be less than 25 per cent of the total consideration being paid pursuant to the scheme, and persons directly or indirectly holding at least 33 per cent of voting rights in the combined entity should be the same as those who held the entire voting rights before implementation of the scheme.[59]

Disclosures

In General

Every disclosure made by a regulated entity has a cost attached to it. India, like other best practice jurisdictions, is committed to principle-based regulation.[60] India has pursued an integrated disclosure model with an objective to make disclosures meaningful, less duplicative, and less burdensome.[61]

Company Disclosure

A listed company is required to make the following periodic and event-based disclosures:

Continued disclosure by promoter and person acting in concert of aggregate shareholding and voting rights[72]	Company and the stock exchange	Within seven days from the end of each financial year

Foreign Investor Disclosure

A foreign institutional investor is required to disclose all information concerning the parties to, and the terms of, any off shore derivative instruments (such as participatory notes and equity linked notes) entered into by the foreign institutional investor or its sub accounts relating to any listed securities and any securities proposed to be listed, in India.

The disclosure is required to be made as and when the SEBI requires such a disclosure.[73] A registered foreign venture capital investor is required to disclose its investment strategy and the life cycle of the fund before making any investment.[74]

Corporate Governance

Clause 49 of the Listing Agreement contains a complete corporate governance code for listed companies. Clause 49 mandates that at least 50 per cent of the board of directors of a listed company is to be comprised of non-executive directors.

If the chairman of the board also is the promoter or related to the promoter group, half the board of directors must comprise of independent directors. Independent directors are those that have no pecuniary interest with the company, its promoters, or its senior management and own less than two per cent of the block of voting shares. Clause 49 also requires the setting up of an audit committee.

Insider Trading and Price Manipulation

In General

Insider trading is a punishable offence in India and is regulated and monitored by the SEBI under the Insider Trading Regulations.

Extraterritorial Application

The Insider Trading Regulations apply to activities of any person who is dealing in securities of a company listed on a recognized stock exchange in India. As long as the securities in question are traded on any recognized stock exchange in India, the SEBI Insider Trading Regulations would apply, irrespective of the residence of the person in question.

Elements

In order to constitute insider trading, the following key ingredients are required to be satisfied:

- Insider — The person should be connected with the company or be deemed to be connected with the company or should have access to unpublished price-sensitive information. Typically, the directors of the company, or an officer of the company who holds a position involving a professional or business relationship between him and the company, or a group company, are considered to be insiders. The broad test is that a person is considered to be an insider if he is reasonably expected to have access to price-sensitive information.[75]
- Deal in securities — The person should have dealt in securities, i.e., the act of selling or buying securities or subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, buy, or sell securities.[76]
- Possession of unpublished price sensitive information — Such person should possess information that is not in the public domain or the market is not aware of, which has a material effect on the price of the shares and the value of the securities of the company.[77]

75 Insider Trading Regulations, reg 2(e), read with reg 2(c).
76 Insider Trading Regulations, reg 2(d).
77 Insider Trading Regulations, reg 2(ha), read with reg 2(k).

Penalty

The SEBI can impose a penalty of INR 250 million or three times the amount of profits made out of insider trading, whichever is higher.[78]

Foreign Participation in the Securities Market

In General

Post-liberalization, foreign investors have had considerable access to the Indian capital markets. As is the case in most jurisdictions, India too conceptually recognizes two classes of foreign investors, portfolio and direct. Direct investors are perceived to have a 'lasting interest' in the company whereas portfolio investors primarily trade in securities. In India, both these classes of foreign investors are permitted to participate in the securities market (primary and secondary).[79]

Foreign participation in the capital markets results in inflow and outflow of capital and is thus monitored by several government and independent agencies/regulators. The institutional bodies regulating capital flows are the Reserve Bank of India and the SEBI.

Within the government, the Foreign Investment Promotion Board and the Department of Industrial Policy and Promotion and the Department of Economic Affairs monitor and regulate foreign investment in India. Foreign participation is permitted through four routes, ie, foreign direct investment, foreign institution investment, registered foreign venture capital investor, and qualified foreign investors.

Foreign Direct Investment

In General

Under the foreign direct investment route, non-residents can invest in shares, mandatorily and fully convertible debentures, and mandatorily and fully convertible preference shares of an Indian company.[80] Depending on the amount of investment and the industry in which the Indian company is operating, the investment may be permitted either through the automatic route or the government route.

In case the investment falls under the automatic route, no approval from the Reserve Bank of India or the government of India is required. Investment falling under the government route would, however, require prior approval from the Foreign Investment Promotion Board.

For almost a decade, the government has applied the policy that permits foreign direct investment in all sectors (subject to certain sectoral caps and other conditions) except those that are expressly prohibited. Foreign direct investment is expressly prohibited in the business of chit funds, agricultural and plantation activities, atomic energy, multi-brand retailing, trading of transferable development rights, real estate business, and other sectors in which private participation in not permitted.[81]

Foreign Direct Investment and Primary Markets

Public Issue and Private Placement. A non-resident entity can subscribe to the fresh issue of shares of a listed Indian company subject to compliance with the pricing requirements under the ICDR Regulations. In other words, a foreign entity is permitted to participate in an initial public offering or a follow-on public offering process through the foreign direct investment route.

Depending on the sector in which the Indian company operates, the investment also may be subject to minimum capitalization norms, lock-in requirements, or other additional sectoral requirement. For instance, a non-resident is permitted to invest in an Indian company engaged in the business of construction development up to 100 per cent under the automatic route, subject to some restrictions, such as a minimum capitalization of US $10 million in the case of a wholly owned subsidiary and US $5 million for joint ventures with Indian partners and lock-in of the original investment for three years from the completion of minimum capitalization.

Rights Issue. A non-resident entity is eligible to participate in the rights issue of a listed Indian company subject to the sectoral caps and other requirements under the Foreign Exchange Management Act.

Foreign Direct Investment and Secondary Markets

A non-resident can purchase listed securities from an Indian resident entity directly subject to the pricing requirements prescribed under the Foreign Exchange Management Act. As mentioned above, pricing requirements are not applicable for transfer of securities between two non-residents. In case the purchase exceeds thresholds specified in the Takeover Code, the non-resident would be required to make an open offer. It should be noted that an investor cannot trade in securities under the foreign direct investment route.

81 Consolidated Foreign Direct Investment Policy, Circular Number 1 of 2012, Department of Industrial Policy and Promotion.

Foreign Direct Investment and American Depositary Receipts and Global Depositary Receipts

In General. Depository receipts are negotiable securities issued outside India by a depository bank, on behalf of an Indian company. The underlying securities of the depositary receipts are the rupee-denominated equity shares of the company. These equity shares are held by the custodian bank in India. Depositary receipts are traded on stock exchanges such as those in the United States, Singapore, Luxembourg, and London. Depositary receipts listed and traded in the United States markets are known as American depository receipts, and those listed and traded elsewhere are known as global depository receipts.

An Indian company can raise foreign currency resources abroad through the issuance of American depositary receipts and global depositary receipts in accordance with the Scheme for Issue of Foreign Currency Convertible Bonds and other Ordinary Shares (Through Depository Receipt Mechanism) Scheme, 1993, and guidelines issued by the government of India from time to time. An Indian-listed company can issue American and global depositary receipts if it is eligible to issue shares to person resident outside India under the foreign direct investment scheme and it is eligible to raise funds from the Indian capital market.

An Indian company also may sponsor an issue of American and global depositary receipts. Under this mechanism, the company offers its shareholders a choice to tender their shares, so that on the basis of such shares, American and global depositary receipts can be issued abroad. The proceeds of the American or global depositary receipts issue are remitted back to India and distributed among the shareholders who had offered their shares.[82]

As a general rule, the proceeds of American depositary receipts or global depositary receipts are required to be kept abroad till they are required in India. Until they are repatriated to India, the Indian company can invest the funds inter alia in treasury bills and monetary instruments with a maturity period of less than one year.

Mode of Payment. A foreign entity that purchases or subscribes to the securities of an Indian company can make payment through normal banking channels. The foreign entity can adjust the consideration for the issue of shares against any royalty or technical fee that may be due from the Indian company.

The foreign entity also may make payment for the issue of shares under a share-swap arrangement with the prior approval of the Foreign Investment Promotion Board.

To facilitate transactions under the foreign direct investment route, authorized banks have been permitted to open and maintain non-interest-bearing escrow accounts in Indian Rupees on behalf of non-residents and residents towards payment of share purchase consideration or for holding securities.

82 Consolidated Foreign Direct Investment Policy, Circular Number 1 of 2012, Department of Industrial Policy and Promotion, para 3.3.4.

Reporting Requirements. An Indian company must report any foreign direct investment to the Reserve Bank of India within 30 days from the date of receipt, and file certain forms and documents with dealers authorized by the Reserve Bank of India.

Similarly, transfer of securities from residents to non-residents or vice versa must be reported to the authorized dealer within 60 days from the date of receipt of the consideration for the transfer.[83] These requirements are in addition to the reporting requirement(s)/disclosures that an investor/acquirer is required to comply with and mentioned above.

Foreign Institutional Investors

In General. Foreign corporations, funds, or individuals who meet the criteria for registering as a foreign institutional investor or sub-account, and are registered under the Foreign Institutional Investment Regulations, are allowed to invest in the securities of an Indian company under the portfolio investment scheme subject to specified ceilings.

Permissible Investments. Foreign institutional investors are allowed to participate in primary and secondary markets, and invest in securities such as shares, debentures, and warrants of companies unlisted, listed, or to be listed on a recognized stock exchange in India under the portfolio investment scheme subject to specified investment ceilings.

In particular, an individual foreign investment institution is permitted to invest in the securities of an Indian company up to a maximum limit of 10 per cent of the total paid up equity capital of the company.

The overall limit for foreign institutional investment in a listed company is capped at 24 per cent of the total paid-up equity capital of the Indian company. The aggregate limit of 24 per cent can be increased to the sectoral cap (as applicable in case of foreign direct investment) through a special resolution of the shareholders of the Indian company.[84]

Additionally, the SEBI-registered foreign institutional investors are also eligible to invest in other instruments, such as listed or unlisted units of schemes floated by domestic mutual funds, government securities, derivatives traded on a recognized stock exchange, commercial paper, security receipts, and Indian depository receipts.[85]

85 Foreign Institutional Investment Regulations, reg 15.

Although foreign institutional investors are permitted to invest freely in debt and equity instruments, the total investments by foreign institutional investors in equity instruments cannot be less than 70 per cent of the aggregate of all the investments made by the foreign institutional investment in India. However, the SEBI may grant approval to any foreign investment institution for investment in debt instruments beyond the prescribed limit.[86]

Foreign Institutional Investors and Primary Market. The SEBI registered foreign institutional investors are permitted to participate in an initial public offering, follow-on public offering, or any other primary market process including qualified institutions placement. The price at which the shares are issued to the foreign institutional investors is required to be not less than the price at which the shares are issued to residents.

Foreign Institutional Investors and Secondary Market. Foreign institutional investors are permitted to freely purchase and sell listed securities in the secondary market. Foreign institutional investors can transact in the secondary market by taking delivery of securities purchased and giving delivery of securities sold. Furthermore, foreign institutional investors or sub accounts are also permitted to sell stocks not owned by them at the time of trade (in market parlance known as 'short selling').[87] Foreign institutional investors can transact in the secondary market only through the SEBI registered stockbrokers.

Foreign institutional investors are unlikely to trigger the Takeover Code as the individual ceiling limit for foreign institutional investors is capped at 10 per cent and the aggregate limit is capped at 24 per cent, both of which are less than the mandatory open offer trigger under the Takeover Code (25 per cent).

Foreign Institutional Investors and Overseas Derivative Instruments. Foreign institutional investors are permitted to issue foreign instruments against securities held by them that are listed or are proposed to be listed on any recognized stock exchange (as its underlying) in India, to persons who are regulated by foreign central banks or foreign futures or securities regulators.

Foreign institutional investors are required to comply with the SEBI prescribed 'know your client' norms in connection with such instruments. This route was made available for non-resident investors who, although wishing to access the Indian securities market, were precluded from doing so due to regulatory requirements.[88]

Registered Foreign Venture Capital Investors

Registered foreign venture capital investors are required to invest at least two-thirds of their funds in unlisted equity-linked securities of a company, and up to one-third of their funds in listed securities. In particular, registered foreign venture capital investors may invest by way of:

- Subscription to initial public offering of a domestic company whose shares are proposed to be listed;
- Debt or debt instrument of a company in which the registered foreign venture capital investor has already made an investment by way of equity; and
- Preferential allotment of equity shares of a listed company subject to a lock-in period of one year.[89]

Until recently, there was ambiguity on two counts for registered foreign venture capital investors: one, the ability of registered foreign venture capital investors to purchase existing shares from existing investors/shareholders under the registered foreign venture capital investor route, as against fresh issuance of new shares by a company which was clearly permitted; second, whether registered foreign venture capital investors can make investments in listed securities.

In March 2012, the Reserve Bank of India clarified that registered foreign venture capital investors can invest in securities of a foreign venture capital by way of purchase from a third party. The Reserve Bank of India also clarified that registered foreign venture capital investors would be allowed to invest in securities on a recognized stock exchange subject to the restrictions and conditions laid down in the SEBI Registered Foreign Venture Capital Investor Regulations.[90]

Qualified Foreign Investors

Qualified foreign investors are non-resident persons who are not registered with the SEBI as a foreign investment institution, sub account, or registered foreign venture capital investor, and who comply with the SEBI's 'know your customer' requirements. They are permitted to invest in equity and debt schemes of domestic mutual funds and listed and to-be-listed equity shares of Indian companies.

Qualified foreign investors are permitted to invest only in equity shares of listed Indian companies through recognized brokers on recognized stock exchanges in India, as well as in equity shares of Indian companies which are offered to the public in India in terms of the relevant and applicable SEBI guidelines/regulations. This includes rights and bonus shares.

Qualified foreign investors can sell their holding only through brokers on a recognized stock exchange, in an open offer under the Takeover Code, through buyback of shares by the company under the SEBI buyback regulations, or in an open offer under the SEBI delisting regulations.

89 Registered Foreign Venture Capital Investor Regulations, reg 11.
90 AP (DIR Series) Circular Number 93 of 19 March 2012.

An individual qualified foreign investor is only permitted to invest up to a maximum of five per cent of the total paid-up equity capital of the company. The aggregate shareholding of all qualified foreign investors in an Indian company is capped at 10 per cent of the total paid-up equity capital of the company, in respect of each class of shares. The limits are over and above the foreign investment institution and non-resident Indian investment ceilings prescribed under the portfolio investment scheme. However, where composite sectoral caps are prescribed under the foreign direct investment scheme, the limits for qualified foreign investor investments is required to be within such overall limits.

Qualified foreign investors like foreign institutional investors can transact in Indian equity shares only on the basis of taking and giving delivery of shares purchased or sold. Qualified foreign investors are not permitted to issue offshore derivative instruments or participatory notes.

Typically, the qualified foreign investor is required to place a purchase order with the depository participant, mentioning the name of the company, number of equity shares, and name of the stock broker, and transfer the foreign inward remittance from a designated overseas bank account to a single rupee bank account of the depository participant in any permitted currency. Thereafter, the depository participant forwards the purchase order and remits the money to the SEBI registered stockbroker. The purchase must be made within four working days, otherwise the depository participant is required to remit the money back to the overseas account of the qualified foreign investor. In case the purchase is made within five working days, the depository participant is required to credit the purchased equity shares in the qualified foreign investor's dematerialized account.

In order to facilitate transactions under the qualified foreign investor scheme, the depository participant is permitted to maintain a separate single rupee pool bank account. The sale proceeds of the equity shares received in the single rupee pool bank account of the depository participant can be repatriated to the overseas bank account of the qualified foreign investor.

Alternatively, the sale proceeds also can be utilized for fresh purchases of equity shares within five working days. Dividends declared on the equity shares held by the qualified foreign investor can be either remitted in the single rupee pool account or directly remitted to the qualified foreign investor's overseas bank account.

Jurisdictional Conflict

Conflict of Jurisdiction

Under the Indian Constitution, the Indian Parliament is vested with the power to enact extra territorial legislation so long as the legislation has some territorial nexus with India. Several regulators overseeing the Indian economy are armed with extra territorial powers, such as the Competition Commission of India. The SEBI has a statutory duty to protect the interest of investors in securities, and to promote the development of, and to regulate, the securities market.

In order to fulfil this mandate the SEBI has been given plenary powers to regulate, monitor, and penalize all persons 'associated with the securities market'. The term persons 'associated with securities market' has not been defined in the SEBI Act.

However, judicial precedents have held that persons 'associated with the securities market' not only includes stock exchanges, mutual funds, and other intermediaries but also includes a buyer and seller of securities listed or to be listed on the stock exchange. In other words, any person who has any association with the Indian securities market will come within the regulatory purview of the SEBI irrespective of the person's nationality or residence.[91]

In a recent instance, one of the entities, while being scrutinized by the SEBI, had contended that the entity was involved only in the listing of global depositary receipts (underlining shares were that of Indian companies) in a relevant exchange outside India and thus cannot be treated as a person 'associated with the securities market' in India as it was neither registered as an intermediary with the SEBI nor was involved in the buying and selling of Indian securities.

On a close examination, the SEBI held that it had the jurisdiction to regulate the entity on the reasoning that global depositary receipts are instruments which derive their existence from securities listed in the Indian stock markets and any structuring or manipulation related to global depositary receipts would have impact on the stocks of the companies trading in the Indian market. This case further demonstrates that the SEBI is vested with wide extra-territorial jurisdiction in all matters connected with the Indian securities market.[92]

Multilateral Approaches

Since independence, India has been an active participant in international policy initiatives, and this has been further accelerated in the last three decades with the liberalization of the Indian economy. India has actively participated in the consultative process on financial regulation conducted under the auspices of the Basel Committee on Banking Supervision. The Reserve Bank of India issues guidelines and circulars from time to time in order to comply with the Basel accord.

India has been a member of the Financial Action Task Force since 2010. The Financial Action Task Force is an inter-governmental body which was established in 1989 to set standards and promote effective implementation of legal, regulatory, and operational measures for combating money laundering, terrorist financing, and other related threats to the integrity of the international financial system.

In 2010, the Financial Action Task Force and the Asian/Pacific Group on Money Laundering jointly conducted an assessment of the implementation of anti-money laundering and counter terrorist financing standards in India and they found that:

'India has progressively expanded and strengthened its preventive measures for the financial sector, which now apply to all but one of the financial activities required to be covered under the Financial Action Task Force standards. However, several preventive provisions need to be brought more closely into line with the Financial Action Task Force standards, and overall, more time is needed before all requirements are substantially implemented. The supervisory regime for financial institutions is generally sound, but its effectiveness with regard to AML/CFT has not yet been sufficiently demonstrated. In addition, the sanctions that supervisors have applied for AML/CFT deficiencies cannot be considered to be effective, dissuasive or proportionate.'[93]

India is actively engaged in the preparation of harmonization principles in securities market under the auspices of the International Organization of Securities Commissions. India has complied with almost all the 30 principles laid down by the International Organization of Securities Commissions, which include principles regarding independence of regulator, self-regulation, cooperation, and stake holder participation in regulation making, and minimum entry standards for market intermediaries.

Dublin, Ireland

Introduction

In General

Ireland is a sovereign parliamentary democracy, with Dublin as its capital city. The 1937 Constitution established the state's modern legal system and thereby supplanted the Irish Free State Constitution of 1922. Prior to 1922, Ireland was part of the United Kingdom and thus was governed by the British Parliament in London from 1802 onwards.

The British and Irish governments enacted the Irish Free State Constitution in 1922 pursuant to the Anglo-Irish Treaty signed in 1921. A new constitution was drafted, put to the people by way of referendum for their approval, and enacted in 1937. The 1937 Constitution is the sole basis for the validity of the institutions of the state, including the court system, and is the ultimate source of legal authority, except for legislation deriving from the European Treaties.

Regulatory System

The legal system is based on the Common Law, similar to that of the United Kingdom, but with the addition of a written constitution. The Constitution enumerates the powers of government as of three distinct types, legislative, executive, and judicial.[1]

These powers are exercised by the principal organs of the state, ie, the President, the Government (the Executive), the Oireachtas (the Legislature), and the Judiciary.

The President is the formal head of state and undertakes the important role of protector of the Constitution, although this role is primarily of ceremonial function.

Whereas the President is under an obligation to act only on the advice of government regarding the appointment of the Taoiseach[2] and members of the judiciary, he may at his own discretion refer any Bill (other than a Money Bill, ie, a Bill published to implement the Budget) of the Oireachtas to the Supreme Court for determination as to its constitutionality.

1 Kelly, The Irish Constitution (1984).
2 The Prime Minister or Head of Government.

The Oireachtas is vested with the 'sole and exclusive power of making laws for the state'[3] and comprises two houses of parliament (a house of representatives, the Dáil, and a senate, the Seanad), together with the President. The Dáil is composed of elected members, known as 'TDs', who represent a defined constituency. The Seanad is composed of members, senators who are nominated by the Taoiseach, elected by vocational panels representing special interests and services in the state, or elected by university panels. In general, legislation originates in the Dáil and is then sent to the Seanad for consideration.

The government exercises all executive powers of the state, but is answerable to the Dáil. The members of government and Ministers are appointed by the President on the advice of the Taoiseach and may number not less than seven and not more than 15. The Taoiseach nominates a member of the government to be the Tánaiste (Deputy Prime Minister), who acts in the place of the Taoiseach when he is incapacitated or absent from office.

Although the government may contain up to a maximum of two members of the Seanad, the Taoiseach, Tánaiste, and the Minister for Finance must be members of the Dáil. Government functions by way of the cabinet system through individual and collective ministerial responsibility. In addition to government Ministers, Ministers of State are appointed to assist the Ministers in their departmental and parliamentary work. However, Ministers of State do not constitute members of government.

Article 35.2 of the Constitution reaffirms judicial independence, providing that 'all judges shall be independent in the exercise of their judicial functions and subject only to this Constitution and the law'. The appointment of members of the judiciary is within the realm of the executive, in so far as the government nominates a judge to the President who, in turn, gives effect to the appointment. A judge can only be removed from office for misconduct or incapacity or on reaching the age of retirement.

Court Authorities

The courts provide the framework for the functioning of the judiciary and can be differentiated on the basis of jurisdiction, ie, criminal and civil.

The District Court is the lowest court. The Circuit Court has original and appellate jurisdiction. The High Court has original and unlimited jurisdiction. This court may sit consisting of one judge or three, as decided by the President of the High Court.

The Supreme Court is the final court of appeal. It consists of the Chief Justice and six other judges, in addition to the President of the High Court who is a member ex officio. This court may sit as three judges or five judges. The Supreme Court has original jurisdiction regarding the constitutionality of a Bill referred to it by the President.

An appeal to the Circuit Court results in a complete rehearing of the case, and either party may introduce new evidence. Appeals from the District Court lie to the Circuit Court, except an appeal by way of case-stated to the High Court. Appeals from the Circuit Court lie to the High Court, except by way of case-stated to the Supreme Court.

3 Constitution 1937, art 15.2.1.

Sources of Law

The primary and fundamental source of law is the Constitution. Legislation passed by the Oireachtas and legislation passed by previous legislatures,[4] which is still in force, is the second source of law. The final source of law, in accordance with Ireland's membership in the European Union (EU) and through the Treaty of Rome, is European Union legislation.

Acts, such as the Stock Exchange Act 1995,[5] originate in the Oireachtas. However, 'delegated legislation', whereby government departments are empowered by an Act to draw up statutory instruments, eg, the European Communities (Stock Exchange) (Amendment) Regulations 1991,[6] is made by the relevant Minister under the powers conferred on him, eg, by the European Communities Act 1972.[7]

Ireland joined the European Economic Community in 1972 by amendment of the Constitution by way of referendum. Accordingly, a right of appeal exists from the Irish courts through to the European Court of Justice. This reflects the primacy of EU law over national legislation.

Ireland operates according to the Common Law legal system, which means that the doctrine of precedent and stare decisis apply. The doctrine of stare decisis is applied in relation to the operation of judicial precedent. Each court is bound by its own previous decisions and by the decisions of a superior court, in so far as the court is dealing with a principle of law applying to similar cases. As a result, decisions of the superior courts are an important secondary source of law.

Admission to the Irish Stock Exchange

Irish Stock Exchange

There has been a stock exchange based in Dublin since 1799. The Irish Stock Exchange was founded by an Act for the Better Regulation of Stockbrokers (Ireland) Act 1799. The present stock exchange results from the merger of the Dublin Stock Exchange and the Cork Stock Exchange in 1971. Between 1973 and 1995, this combined exchange comprised the Irish unit of the International Stock Exchange of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. Since 1995, the Irish Stock Exchange has been a separate entity, although the listing rules applied by it largely follow the Listing Rules of the Financial Services Authority, ie, 'The Purple Book'.

The main elements of the regulatory regime for the admission and securities dealing comprise:

- European Directives;
- Irish Companies Acts;
- Take-over Rules made by the Irish Panel on Take-overs and Mergers;
- Stock Exchange Act; and
- Investment Intermediaries Act.[8]

The Irish Financial Services Regulatory Authority is the regulatory supervisory authority for the Irish Stock Exchange under the terms of the Stock Exchange Act 1995. It also regulates the member firms of the Exchange. However, the Irish Stock Exchange is autonomous in its capacity as a listing authority. As a full member of the EU since 1972, European Council Directives[9] have application in Ireland, and they are typically introduced into domestic Irish law by way of statutory instrument.[10]

The Stock Exchange Act 1995 defines a stock exchange as an organized financial market whose members provide an investment service[11] in respect of investment instruments,[12] but excludes an exchange involved wholly or mainly in financial futures or options which would fall to be regulated under the Central Bank Act 1989.[13] The Irish Financial Services Regulatory Authority, in approving a stock exchange, must be satisfied, inter alia, as to:

- Due incorporation;
- Minimum level of capital;
- Suitability of controlling shareholders;
- Location of registered and head offices; and
- Members of the board, including independent members.

10 A statutory instrument is an order or regulation made by a government minister under a power granted by statute. In the case of the above Directives, the power derives from section 3 of European Communities Act 1972 (Act Number 27 of 1972).

11 'Investment services' include dealings with investment instruments on behalf of others or on own account.

12 'Investment instruments' include transferable securities, units of shares in UCITS, financial futures contracts, swaps, debentures, and governmental or public securities. Cheques, bankers drafts, bank notes, and acknowledgement of indebtedness in respect of payment for goods or services are not included.

13 Central Bank Act 1989, Act Number 16 of 1989.

The Irish Financial Services Regulatory Authority also regulates member firms, ie, persons who are members of the stock exchange and whose regular occupation or business is the provision of investment services on a professional basis on or off the floor of the Exchange. There are currently approximately 20 member firms of the Irish Stock Exchange. A member firm must be approved by the Irish Financial Services Regulatory Authority under the Stock Exchange Act 1995. The fundamental principles of proper practice for member firms[14] provide that member firms must:

- Act honestly and fairly in the best interests of clients and the integrity of the market;
- Act with due care, skill, and diligence in the best interests of clients and the integrity of the market;
- Have and apply effectively the resources and procedures that are necessary for the proper performance of their business activities;
- Seek from clients information regarding their financial situation, investment experience, and objectives as regards the services requested;
- Make adequate disclosure of relevant material and information in their dealings with clients;
- Make a reasonable effort to avoid conflicts of interest and, when they cannot be avoided, ensure that its clients are fairly treated; and
- Comply with all regulatory requirements applicable to the conduct of their business activities so as to promote the best interests of clients and the integrity of the market.

Domestic Markets

In General

There are currently two securities exchanges operating in Ireland, ie, the Irish Stock Exchange and FINEX (see text, below). The Irish Stock Exchange provides a market for securities ranging from government bonds, investment funds, corporate bonds, equities, and local authority's securities.

The market is order, rather than quote, driven. There are seven approved market makers in the government bonds market, who are authorised by the National Treasury Management Agency.[15] The Exchange has several hundred investment funds, many of which are restricted from offering units to Irish resident investors as they are managed by companies operating from the International Financial Services Center[16] in Dublin.

16 The International Financial Services Centre is a zone in the former Dublin Docklands promoted by the Irish state for the development of financial services activities. Companies carrying on qualifying activities for export can obtain a certificate entitling them to qualify for a low rate of corporation tax. Companies which set up under the original IFSC incentive scheme benefit from a reduced rate of 10 per cent until the end of 2005. Companies which obtained a certificate after July 1998 benefited from the reduced rate until December 2002; these companies are now taxed at the standard 12.5 per cent along with all companies which set up in the IFSC since December 2000. Typical activities include treasury and fund management and asset finance.

Markets Operated by the Irish Stock Exchange

Official List. The main equities list is the Official List, and it comprises shares of approximately 15 companies at present. The index of listed shares is known as the ISEQ Index, the Irish Stock Exchange Quotient. The listing requirements and continuing obligations, inter alia, of companies seeking a listing are set out in the Purple Book comprising the Listing Rules of the Financial Services Authority, as amended by supplemental pages published by the Irish Stock Exchange, known as the Green Pages.

Admission to the Official List market requires publication of listing particulars, governed by the Listing Particulars Directive.[17] The Irish Stock Exchange fulfills the role of 'competent authority' for the purposes of the Admissions Directive.

Exploration Securities Market. This market has separate admission rules, the Exploration Securities Market Rules. An 'exploration company' is a company that is principally active or plans to be active in the exploration for and/or the extraction of mineral resources, a material part of which activity is carried on in Ireland.

What is considered material is a question of negotiation with the Irish Stock Exchange in each individual case. The company need not be an Irish registered company, but it is required to be a public limited company according to its laws of incorporation. At least one year's trading accounts are required prior to application for admission together with a report demonstrating that the company is engaged or has engaged in some exploration activities. At least 10 per cent of the shares of each class seeking admission must be in public hands at the time of admission unless the Irish Stock Exchange agrees otherwise.

Developing Companies Market. The Developing Companies Market is for companies seeking a quotation and listing facility that are not in a position to match the requirements of the Official List.

This market is a second-tier market imposing less rigorous disclosure requirements than the Official List. Separate admission rules, the Developing Companies Market Rules, apply to this market. The essential qualification requirements are:

- One year's trading record is required, but this requirement may be waived in certain circumstances;
- A sponsor, who must be a member firm of the Irish Stock Exchange, must be retained to take responsibility for advising the company on compliance with the Developing Companies Market rules;
- At least 10 per cent of each class of share seeking to be admitted to the market must be in public hands; and 17 Ireland implemented the Admissions Directive by the European Communities (Stock Exchange) Regulations 1984 (SI Number 282 of 1984), which were amended by the European Communities (Stock Exchange) (Amendment) Regulations 1991 (SI Number 18 of 1991). The regulations entitle the Irish Stock Exchange to apply more onerous requirements on admission or as continuing obligations for issuers than are required under the terms of the Directive.

- The admission document must disclose a range of information about the company, including information regarding directors, senior management, nature and duration of activities, controlling shareholders, trading accounts, and other relevant information, as required by chapter 3 of the Developing Companies Rules of the Irish Stock Exchange.

The Irish Stock Exchange approves the admission document but does not accept responsibility for its contents.[18] Directors are required to attach a responsibility statement to the admission document.

It is important to note that the Exploration Securities Market and the Developing Companies Market do not comprise part of the Official List. Accordingly, it is the Prospectus Directive and Irish company law[19] in the case of companies incorporated outside Ireland that determine the form and content of prospectuses to be issued when shares are to be offered to the public by companies quoted on or applying to be quoted on either markets.

FINEX

FINEX was established in 1985 as the financial futures division of the New York Cotton Exchange[20] and expanded to Europe, to Dublin, in June 1994. The Dublin trading floor, when combined with the original New York floor, creates a currency futures and options market on two continents every day.

The market is regulated independently by the Central Bank under the Central Bank Act 1989 and by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, a United States Government Agency. FINEX trades a broad range of Euro-based contracts, United States dollar currency-paired contracts, cross-rate currencies, and the United States dollar index on an open outcry system.

Transformer Electronic Trading Systems and Other Markets

Irish residents have access to foreign securities markets primarily through Irish-based 'investment business firms'. Firms providing 'investment business services' operating within Ireland are regulated by the Irish Financial Services Regulatory Authority under the Stock Exchange Act 1995 (as amended by the Central Bank and Financial Services Authority of Ireland Act 2003)[21] in the case of member firms of the Irish Stock Exchange, and the Investment Intermediaries Act 1995[22] which, between them, implemented the Investment Services Directive.

18 The Developing Companies Market is often compared with the Alternative Investment Market of the London Stock Exchange. However, the Developing Companies Market Rules differ from the Alternative Investment Market Rules in a significant respect; the rigorous review process conducted by the Irish Stock Exchange is often cited by investors as an attraction of the Developing Companies Market.

Irish investors may access the international markets through Irish stockbroking firms that are members of both the Irish Stock Exchange and the London Stock Exchange or other exchanges, such as EASDAQ. Alternatively, Irish investors may deal with an investment business firm authorised to act as an intermediary for suitable classes of investment instruments, which may include securities dealt in or on other foreign markets. Irish investors also may deal with investment business firms authorised and regulated in their home jurisdiction within the EU and permitted to provide their services in Ireland under the Investment Services Directive.

The Irish Stock Exchange operates within an electronic settlement system, known as 'CREST', jointly with the London Stock Exchange. Irish investors may place orders through electronic trading systems, eg, using the Internet, although the investor must initiate this activity, as it is illegal to advertise 'investment business services' or to offer securities to the public other than through a regulated stockbroker or investment business firm, or by means of a prospectus or listing particulars prepared and published in accordance with the relevant legislation discussed above.

Off-Market Transactions

In general, off-market transactions are not regulated and parties are free to negotiate terms and deal freely. However, there are some exceptions to this:

- No offer of shares in a company may be made to the public without a prospectus or, in appropriate cases (ie, where the shares are dealt in on the Official List), listing particulars which have been published[23] and filed with the Companies Registration Office;[24]
- Off-market transactions in Irish Stock Exchange quoted securities must be reported to the relevant market;
- Companies whose securities are not freely tradable, ie, not public limited companies, may have internal procedural requirements or restrictions on tradability;
- Industry-specific regulation and general competition law, antitrust, and merger control restrictions may apply; and
- Irish stamp duty will be payable.

Taxes

Ireland imposes a transfer stamp duty at the rate of one per cent of the price paid or, if greater, in transactions not at arm's length, at market value, and on transfers of marketable securities, including shares in Irish registered companies. Irish companies are obliged by law to maintain their share register in Ireland so that this duty may be collected.

23 Companies Act 1963, s 51, on Irish incorporated companies; Companies Act 1963, s 361, on companies incorporated outside Ireland, and Regulation 21(3), European Communities (Transferable Securities) and Stock Exchange Regulations 1992, SI Number 202 of 1992.

24 The meaning of 'offer to the public' is not fully defined, and it is subject to specific consideration in any doubtful case.

Typically, Irish companies trading on North American securities markets have issued shares to a trustee, who holds in trust for a custodian who, in turn, issues a depositary receipt to the investor reflecting an underlying security. This system speeded up settlement of paper-based transactions. The knock-on effect was that the Irish register was not altered when a depositary receipt was traded, thus avoiding the charge to stamp duty.

Irish stamp duty can, in certain cases, be extraterritorial in effect, and care must be taken to ensure that no charge to tax arises in the ordinary course of dealings in securities on the Irish markets or that the tax is correctly administered.

Securities

National Treatment and Reciprocity

The primary pieces of legislation to be considered when making any public offer of securities in Ireland are the Companies Acts 1963–2003 and the European Communities (Transferable Securities) and Stock Exchange Regulations 1992,[25] which together set out the legal requirements relating to prospectuses to be published in conjunction with such public offers. The Regulations are to be construed as one with the Companies Act, as amended.

Part III of the Companies Act deals with prospectuses, regulates the issue of shares in or debentures of a company under Irish law, and sets out the matters to be stated and reports to be set out in a prospectus. Regulation 6 of the European Communities (Transferable Securities) and Stock Exchange Regulations 1992 provides that, subject to Regulation 21[26] thereof, it will not be lawful to issue any form of application for securities of a company unless the form is issued with a prospectus which complies with the Regulations and does not contravene section 46 of the Companies Act 1963. Regulation 6 does not apply to the types of offers and securities described in article 2 of the Prospectus Directive or to the securities referred to in article 5 of the Prospectus Directive.[27]

Under section 44(3) of the Companies Act 1963, it is not lawful, subject to certain exceptions,[28] to issue any form of application for shares in or debentures of a company, unless:

- The form of application is issued with a prospectus which complies with the requirements of Part III of the Companies Act; and 25 European Communities (Transferable Securities) and Stock Exchange Regulations 1992, SI Number 202 of 1992, which give effect to Council Directive 89/298/EEC (the Prospectus Directive) and Council Directive 90/211/EEC, which amends Directive 80/390/EEC in respect of the mutual recognition of public-offer prospectuses as stock-exchange listing particulars.

26 Regulation 21 deals with the non-application of certain sections of the Companies Act 1963.

27 European Communities Transferable Securities and Stock Exchange Regulations 1992, reg 7.

28 Companies Act 1963, s 44(4), dealing with underwriting agreements and offers not made to the public; s 44(7)(b), dealing with the issue of shares of or debentures in a company which are in all respects uniform with shares or debentures issued within the preceding two years and, for the time being, dealt in or quoted on a recognised stock exchange; and s 45(1), regarding unduly burdensome exceptions.

- Where a prospectus includes a statement purported to be made by an expert, the expert has not withdrawn his consent and a statement that the expert has given and has not withdrawn his consent appears in the prospectus.[29]

The section does not apply if the form of application was issued:

- In connection with a bona fide invitation to a person to enter into an underwriting agreement with respect to the shares; or
- In relation to shares or debentures which are not offered to the public.[30]

One of the first questions, therefore, to consider is whether any of the exceptions will apply to the proposed issue. More frequently than not, this will turn on whether the issue will involve an offer to the public.

An offering of shares to the public is construed as meaning an offer to any section of the public whether selected as members or debenture holders of the company concerned.[31] An offer will not be to the public if it can be regarded as not being calculated to result in the shares becoming available for subscription or purchase by persons other than those receiving the offer or invitation or otherwise being a domestic concern of the persons making and receiving it.[32]

The problems associated with what is encompassed in an offer to the public is emphasized in the Prospectus Directive, which states in its preamble 'whereas, so far, it has proved impossible to furnish a common definition of the term "public offer" and all its constituent parts'. In reality, whether or not a proposed issue will constitute an offer to the public and therefore require a prospectus is a matter which can only be decided on the facts and on a case-by-case basis. More often than not, what is proposed will constitute an offer to the public and will require the publication of a prospectus.

Mutual Recognition of Prospectuses

The Prospectus Directive also introduced the principle of mutual recognition of prospectuses between member states into Irish law. Where, for the same transferable securities, public offers are made simultaneously or within a short interval of one another in two or more member states and where a prospectus is drawn up in accordance with articles 7, 8, or 12 of the Prospectus Directive, the competent authority for approval of the prospectus will be that of the member state where the issuer has its registered office, if the public offering or application for admission to official listing is made in that member state.[33]

On 29 April 2004, the European Commission adopted a Regulation implementing a new Prospectus Directive (2003/71/EC), which has the aim of harmonizing further the disclosure requirements of member states of the European Union (EU). The Regulation seeks to create an effective 'single passport' for both EU and non-EU issuers; however, the Regulation sets out different minimum disclosure requirements for different types of offering. The Regulation is due to take effect from 1 July 2005.

If the member state concerned does not provide for prior scrutiny of prospectuses, a supervisory authority from those member states in which the public offer is to be made and which provides for the prior scrutiny of prospectuses must be chosen by the person making the public offer.[34]

Article 21 of the Prospectus Directive provides that, if a prospectus is approved under its provisions,[35] subject only to translation and the inclusion of information which may be specific to the market of the country where the public offer is made (in particular, the income tax system, the financial organizations retained to act as paying agents for the issuer in that country, and the way in which notices to investors are published), it must be recognized as complying or be deemed to comply with the laws of the member states in which the same transferable securities are offered to the public simultaneously or within a short interval of one another, without being subject to any form of approval there and without those member states being able to require that additional information be included in the prospectus.

The Third Schedule of the Regulations provides that, where a prospectus approved by a competent authority in another member state, pursuant to article 20 of the Prospectus Directive, is to be recognized in Ireland, there shall be added to the information contained in a prospectus approved in another member state:

- A summary of the tax treatment of Irish-resident holders of the securities;
- The names and addresses of the paying agents for the securities in Ireland (if any); and
- A statement of how notice of meetings and other notices from the issuer of the securities will be given to Irish resident holders of the securities.

If a foreign company requires to have its prospectus recognized in Ireland, the rules of the Irish Stock Exchange require that the approved prospectus be submitted to it for inspection at least 10 days prior to the intended publication date,[36] together with evidence that the competent authority approval has been granted by another member state.[37]

Provided that the Irish Stock Exchange is satisfied that the foregoing requirements have been met, it will issue written confirmation of such, following which the foreign company, subject to compliance with registration and publication requirements which will be dealt with below, can proceed to publish the prospectus in Ireland.

Part XII of the Companies Act 1963 deals with the prospectus requirements for foreign incorporated companies.[38] However, the requirements are similar to Part III of the Companies Act 1963 in many respects. Part XII provides that it is not lawful for any person to distribute a prospectus in Ireland offering for subscription shares in or debentures of a company incorporated outside Ireland unless it contains the information required by Part III of the Companies Act 1963.[39]

Section 361(4) of the Companies Act 1963 provides that it is not lawful for any person to issue to any person in Ireland a form of application for shares or debenture in a company incorporated outside Ireland, unless the form of application complies with Part XII and the Third Schedule of the Companies Act 1963.

It should be noted that an exception to the foregoing prohibitions is allowed in the case of a prospectus or a form of application, as the case may be, issued and complying with the law of a 'recognized country' for this purpose. By virtue of the Companies (Recognition of Countries) Order 1964,[40] only the United Kingdom has been designated a 'recognized country' for these purposes. However, having regard to regulation 21(3) of the Regulations, should a company incorporated outside Ireland issue a form of application accompanied by a prospectus approved under the Prospectus Directive, it need not have attached to it a form of application required by section 361(4).

Issuer Requirements

As outlined, a prospectus must contain certain information as stipulated by Irish law and according to the rules of the Yellow Book. Generally, an issuer must ensure that any prospectus contains such information which is necessary to enable investors and their advisers to make an informed assessment of the assets and liabilities, financial position, profits and losses and prospects of the issuer, and the rights attaching to the securities.[41]

In Ireland, this responsibility for the most part falls on the directors, who have overall responsibility for the contents of the prospectus. Directors, and any proposed director, must expressly accept responsibility for the prospectus contents by virtue of the responsibility statement required under the Yellow Book.

The information contained in a prospectus must be in accordance with the facts and may not omit anything likely to effect the import of such information. One must always be aware that an omission of material information could result in a breach of duty on the part of those responsible for the issue of the prospectus, and could give rise to an action for damages against the issuers.

Securities Requirements

No form of application for shares or debentures in a company can be issued to the public or any section of the public in Ireland unless the form is issued with a prospectus compliant with the Regulations. Private companies in Ireland are prohibited from offering shares to the public.[42] A company incorporated in Ireland can only allot shares if it is authorised to do so by an ordinary resolution or under the terms of the company's articles of association.

Irish company law provides for a statutory right of pre-emption.[43] Unless such pre-emption rights are disapplied or modified in their application, where a company offers shares for cash, it must first offer the new shares to existing members in proportion to their existing holdings. Pre-emption rights do not apply where shares are wholly or partly paid-up otherwise than in cash.[44]

Where a public limited company incorporated in Ireland proposes to allot shares fully or partly paid-up otherwise than for cash, an expert's report on the value of the non-cash consideration must be obtained prior to any allotment of such shares.[45]

If it is proposed to list the securities on the Irish Stock Exchange, the securities must conform with the law of the applicant's place of incorporation, be duly authorised according to the applicant's memorandum and articles of association, and have any necessary statutory or other consents.[46] The securities also must be freely transferable and, if the applicant is a company incorporated in Ireland, it may not be a private company or an 'old public company'.[47] The Irish Stock Exchange also may make the admission of securities to listing subject to any special condition which it considers appropriate in the interests of protecting investors.[48]

Except in the case of public limited companies, at least five per cent of the nominal value of a share must be paid on application;[49] an Irish public limited company cannot allot shares unless at least 25 per cent of the nominal value of the share and the whole of any premium on it is paid.[50]

No allotment of share capital of a company offered to the public for subscription may be made unless the amount stated in the prospectus as the minimum amount which in the directors' opinion must be raised to provide for the matters specified in paragraph 4 of the Third Schedule to the Companies Act has been subscribed.[51] The company has 40 days after the first issue of the prospectus within which to comply with this condition, following which all money received must be repaid to applicants without interest.

If the monies are not repaid within 48 days after the issue of the prospectus, the directors of the company will be jointly and severally liable to repay that money with interest at the rate of five per cent per annum.[52]

Where a prospectus is issued generally to the public, an allotment of any shares and proceedings may not be taken on applications made in pursuance of such a prospectus so issued until the beginning of the fourth day after that on which the prospectus is first issued as a newspaper advertisement or, if it is not so advertised, the day on which it is first issued in any manner.[53]

If a prospectus states that an application has been or will be made for permission for the shares offered thereby to be dealt in on any stock exchange, any allotment made pursuant to the prospectus will be void if the permission has not been applied for before the third day after the first issue of the prospectus or if the permission has not been granted within six weeks of the closing of the subscription lists.

Where permission has not been applied for, or has not been granted, all money received must be repaid to applicants without interest. If the money is not repaid within eight days after the company becomes liable to repay it, the directors of the company will be jointly and severally liable to repay the money with interest at the rate of five per cent per annum.[54]

When a company incorporated in Ireland allots shares, the company must deliver to the Registrar of Companies a return of the allotments within one month.[55] A company's capital duty[56] also is payable on the total amount paid to the company on allotment.

Prospectus Requirements

As mentioned above, it is unlawful to issue any form of application for securities of a company in Ireland, unless the form is issued with a prospectus which complies with the Regulations, which is to be construed as one with the Companies Act and which does not contravene section 46 of the Companies Act 1963.

If shares are being offered to the public by a company where the European Communities (Stock Exchange) Regulations 1984[57] do not apply, ie, a full stock market listing is not being sought by the company, then the company is required to issue a prospectus in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act itself rather than the Companies Act so amended by the Regulations.

This situation might arise where a company sought access to the Developing Companies Market or, depending on its activities, the Exploration Securities Market. If a company requires admission to the Exploration Securities Market, the Exploration Securities Market Rules would have to be considered. Rule 3.1 states that the making of public offers of securities in Ireland is subject to the Regulations which set out the legal requirements relating to prospectuses to be published in conjunction with such public offers. The obligations under the Regulations constitute separate and additional requirements to those contained in the Exploration Securities Market Rules (in particular, chapter 3).

A 'prospectus' is defined as any prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares or debentures in a company.[58] Where a prospectus is published in conjunction with an offer for subscription or purchase of securities in compliance with the Prospectus Directive's requirements, it will be deemed to be a prospectus within the meaning of the Companies Act.[59]

While it is true that the form and content of prospectuses required by the Prospectus Directive overshadow the Companies Act's requirements on prospectuses, the requirements of the Companies Act still must be considered. The Regulations provide that a prospectus must contain the information required under the Companies Act where any such information is not required by the Prospectus Directive itself.[60]

Regulation 8 of the Regulations sets out the contents required for a prospectus and states that the prospectus must contain the information necessary to allow an informed assessment to be made of the financial position and prospects of the company and the rights attaching to the securities. In addition, the prospectus should, at least, subject to certain exceptions,[61] contain details[62] as to:

- Those responsible for the prospectus;
- The offer to the public and the transferable securities being offered (including the nature of the securities; the amount and purpose of the issue; the number and rights attaching to them; any tax withheld at source; the period the offer is to be open, and the date on which entitlement to dividends or interest arises; the persons (if any) underwriting, guaranteeing the offer; restrictions on transferability; the markets in which the securities can be traded; the paying agents; if known, the price at which the securities are offered; methods of payment; and procedures for the exercise of rights of pre-emption);

Where, having regard to the proposal as to size and circumstance of the issue of the securities, compliance with the requirements of the Third Schedule would be unduly burdensome, the Irish Stock Exchange may allow some information to be omitted from the prospectus.
62 For a more detailed account of the information required and when it is required, see articles 11.2–11.6 of the Prospectus Directive.

- The issuer (including name, date of incorporation, legislation applicable, objects, and capital);
- The issuer's principal activities;
- The issuer's assets and liabilities, and details of the issuer's financial position; profits and losses (own accounts and, where appropriate, consolidated accounts), and interim accounts, if any, since the previous financial period end;
- The issuer's administration, management, and supervision; and
- Recent developments and prospects to the extent that these would have an impact on any assessment that might be made of the issuer.

Where a public offer relates to debt securities guaranteed by one or more legal persons, the information specified at items three to seven, above, also must be given in respect of the guarantor(s) and, in addition, in the case of convertible debt securities, exchangeable debt securities, or debt securities with warrants or to the warrants themselves, the information also must be given with regard to the nature of the shares or debt securities to which they confer entitlement and the procedure of any conditions for conversion, exchange, or subscription.

If the issuer of the shares or debt securities is not the issuer of the exchangeable debt securities or warrants, the information specified at items three to seven, above, also must be given in respect of the issuer of the shares or debt securities.

So far as not already required by the Regulations, the information required under the Third Schedule of the Companies Act also must be included. It also should be pointed out that, where an issuer applies for listing of the securities on the Irish Stock Exchange, listing particulars will have to be published pursuant to the Listing Particulars Directive and the Yellow Book.

Where listing particulars have been approved by the Irish Stock Exchange, the form of application need not have a prospectus in the form required by the Third Schedule to the Act attached to it.[63] This is, of course, also subject to the principle of mutual recognition.[64]

As a result of vague drafting and the resulting conflict between the application of the Listing Particulars Directive and the Prospectus Directive in cases where securities are being offered to the public for the first time, many Irish lawyers adopt a cautious approach by requiring the listing particulars to comply with the requirements of the Prospectus Directive, in addition to the requirements of the Listing Particulars Directive and the Purple Book. Practically, the task is simplified as the contents requirements under the Prospectus Directive and the Listing Particulars Directive are similar.

63 Stock Exchange Regulations, reg 12(2), SI Number 282 of 1984.

64 Listing Particulars Directive (as amended), art 24, provides that where application for admission to official listing is made in one member state and the securities the subject of the application have been the subject of a public offer prospectus approved under the Prospectus Directive within the preceding three months preceding the application for admission, the public offer prospectus will be recognised as the listing particulars in the member states where the application for listing is made.

Supplementary listing particulars must contain the details required by paragraph 5.16 of the Purple Book, and they are required in the following circumstances:

- If, at any time after the listing particulars have been approved by the Irish Stock Exchange and before dealings in the relevant securities commence, there has been a significant change affecting any matter contained in the particulars; and
- A matter has arisen which would have required mention in the listing particulars had it arisen at the time of their preparation.[65]

Corporate Governance

One of the primary responsibilities of the Irish Stock Exchange is regulation and supervision of the manner in which companies whose securities are authorised to trade on any of its markets fulfil obligations to make full disclosure of relevant information to the market. When the Irish Stock Exchange separated from the London Stock Exchange, the Irish Stock Exchange set about maintaining standards of corporate governance equivalent to those of the London Exchange.[66]

Section 1 of the Combined Code deals with corporate governance principles; Part A addresses provisions relating to the board of directors, the chairman and chief executive officer, board balance, supply of information, appointments to the board, and re-election, and Part B deals with directors' remuneration.

The Combined Code has been extensively revised to take account of the recommendations contained in the report produced by Sir Derek Higgs (the 'Higgs Report'). The Combined Code is applicable for reporting periods commencing on or after 1 November 2003. The recommendations in the Higgs Report extended to such areas as:

- The structure and balance of the board of directors;
- The role of the chairman;
- The role and liability of non-executive directors;
- The role, duties, and authority of the nominations committee;
- The attendance at and frequency of nominations committee meetings;
- The role of audit and remuneration committees;
- The appointment and re-election of directors; and
- The relations between shareholders.

The Purple Book requires a company incorporated in Ireland to include a statement in its annual report and accounts detailing how it has applied the principles set out in section 1 of the Combined Code. It also requires that an explanation be provided which enables its shareholders to evaluate how the principles have been applied and a statement as to whether or not it has complied with section 1 of the Combined Code throughout the accounting period. If a company has not complied with all the Combined Code

65 Purple Book, para 5.14.

66 The Combined Code, ie, the Principles of Good Governance and Code of Best Practice appended to but not forming part of the Purple Book.

provisions, it must specify which provisions it has not complied with, the period of non-compliance, and reasons for non-compliance.[67]

Rule 12.43A(c) of the Purple Book requires disclosure of the amount of each element of the remuneration package, including pension entitlements and the disclosure of individual directors' remuneration by name. Parts C and D of the Combined Code contain provisions relating to relations with shareholders and accountability and audit, respectively.

Clearly, the intention behind rule 12.43A is that companies listed on the Irish Stock Exchange should account for their governance and explain any departure from the principles set out in the Combined Code. However, as stated in the preamble to the Combined Code, it is for the shareholders themselves to evaluate the company's report on its application of the principles of the Combined Code. Interestingly, it also should be noted that Part 2 of the Combined Code includes governance principles for institutional shareholders relating to voting, dialogue with companies, and evaluation of governance disclosures.

Registration of Public Offerings and Placements

The Regulations provide that every prospectus issued under the Regulations shall be registered with the Registrar of Companies in Ireland in compliance with section 47 of the Companies Act.[68] Before registration with the Registrar of Companies, the prospectus must first have been submitted to the Irish Stock Exchange as the designated body for the purposes of the Prospectus Directive.[69]

Section 47 provides that no prospectus may be issued unless on or before the date of its publication there has been delivered to the Registrar of Companies a copy thereof signed by every person named in it as a director or a proposed director of the company, or by his agent authorised in writing, ie, signed by his lawful attorney.

Where admission to Official Stock Exchange listing is not being sought, the prospectus must be made available to the public by notice in one or more daily newspapers in Ireland and in the form of a brochure to be made available free of charge at the registered office of the issuer and at the offices of the financial organization retained to act as paying agent.[70]

Every prospectus must, on its face, state that a copy has been delivered for registration as required by section 47 of the Act.[71] Documents which must be delivered to the Registrar of Companies in addition to the prospectus are:

- Consent of any expert required by section 46 of the Act;
- Copies of any material contract; and

- If any adjustments have been made to the accounts by the auditors, a written statement setting out the adjustments and giving reasons therefore.[72]

Where admission to the Official Stock Exchange listing is sought, the prospectus must be prepared in accordance with Listing Particulars Directive[73] standards. By virtue of regulation 19 of the Regulations, the Irish Stock Exchange is designated as the competent authority for scrutinising the contents of a prospectus for these purposes. The rules of the Yellow Book relating to contents and timing also must be considered.

Periodic Disclosure

General Obligation under the Listing Rules

The Listing Rules set down a general obligation for overseas companies to notify the Company Announcements Office of the Irish Stock Exchange, without delay, of major new developments in their sphere of activity which are not public knowledge and which may, by virtue of the effect of those developments on their assets and liabilities or financial position or in the general course of their business, lead to substantial movement in the price of their listed securities or, where the companies have debt securities listed, significantly affect their ability to meet their commitments.[74]

In particular, a company is obliged to notify the Company Announcements Office without delay of all relevant information which is not public knowledge concerning a change and which, if made public, would be likely to cause substantial movements in the company's share price, including:

- The company's financial condition;
- The performance of its business; and
- The company's expectation as to its performance.[75]

All information notified to the Company Announcements Office must be in the English language. Obviously, a company must take all reasonable care to ensure that the information provided to the Company Announcements Office is accurate and not misleading and does not omit anything which would affect the import of the statement.

There is no obligation to notify information about impending developments or matters in the course of negotiation. Companies are, of practical necessity, allowed to furnish such information to their advisers, persons with whom the companies are negotiating, employee representatives, and any regulatory body or authority.[76]

75 Purple Book, paras 9.2 and 17.23.
76 Purple Book, paras 9.5, 17.25, and 17.26.

Where a company does divulge this information, it should satisfy itself that recipients of information are aware of their obligations regarding confidentiality and that they do not deal in securities before the information in question has been made available to the public.[77]

If, however, the company believes that a breach of confidence has occurred or is likely to occur, then it must without delay forward to the Company Announcements Office at least a warning announcement to the effect that the company expects shortly to release information which may lead to a price movement.

With the exception of the preceding cases, companies must ensure that relevant information is not given to anyone else before it has been notified to the Company Announcements Office, unless the Company Announcements Office is not open for business, in which case publication via the newspaper and electronics media is necessary.[78]

It also should be noted that, if any information which could lead to substantial movement in share price is to be announced at a meeting of shareholders, it must be notified to the Company Announcements Office so that the announcement at the meeting is made no earlier than publication to the market.[79] Notwithstanding the above, it is still possible for a company to safeguard against its legitimate interests being prejudiced by requesting the Exchange to grant a dispensation from the disclosure requirement in this regard. A company must forward to the Company Announcements Office six copies of:

- All circulars, notices, reports, announcements, or other documents at the same time as they are issued; and
- All resolutions passed by the company other than resolutions concerning ordinary business at an annual general meeting, without delay after the relevant general meeting.

Specific Notifications

Apart from the general obligations of disclosure set out above, there are specific notification requirements regarding changes in capital structure and major interests in shares.

Notifications as to Capital

A company must furnish the following to the Company Announcements Office without delay:

- Any proposed change in its capital structure;
- Any new issues of debt securities and, in particular, any guarantee or security in respect thereof;

77 Purple Book, paras 9.5 and 17.26.

78 Purple Book, paras 9.15 and 17.67. Where the Company Announcements Office is not open, information must be distributed to not less than two national newspapers in Ireland and to two newswire services operating in Ireland. The Company Announcements Office must be notified as soon as it re-opens.

- Any change in the rights attaching to any class of listed securities or to any securities into which any listed securities are convertible;
- Any drawing or redemption of listed securities (other than purchases to meet sinking fund requirements of the current year) both before and after any such drawing;
- The basis of allotment of listed securities offered generally to the public for cash and of open offers to shareholders;
- Any extension of time granted for currency of temporary documents of title;
- The effect (if any) of any issue of further securities on conversion rights; and
- The results of any new issue of listed securities.[80]

Notifications of Interests in Shares

Overseas Company with Primary Listing on Irish Stock Exchange

Sections 67–79 of the Companies Act 1990[81] require a person or, in some cases, a group of persons[82] to notify an Irish registered public limited company when he becomes interested in five per cent or more of the nominal value of the issued share capital of the company in question. In addition, where the interest of a major shareholder[83] is reduced or increased or ceases to exist, this also must be notified by the shareholder to the company and then by the company to the Company Announcements Office by the end of the next day following receipt of such notification.

Overseas companies must notify the Company Announcements Office without delay of any information equivalent to this required under the law of their country of incorporation or the member state[84] where they have their primary listing. The notification must include the date on which the information was disclosed to the company and the date on which the transaction in question was effected, if known.[85]

Notifications regarding major interests in shares are deemed to have been discharged if the interest is notified to the Company Announcements Office pursuant to the disclosure provisions of the City Code on Take-overs and Mergers or the Rules governing Substantial Acquisitions of Shares issued by the Panel on Take-overs and Mergers.[86]

Section 81 of the Companies Act 1990 allows a public limited company to request information from a registered shareholder regarding his past or present interest in shares in the company and the identity of persons interested in the shares in question. The information which an overseas company receives in response to a similar request also must be communicated to the Company Announcements Office within the time frame outlined above.

Overseas Company with Secondary Listing on Irish Stock Exchange

An overseas company with a secondary listing on the Irish Stock Exchange must notify the Company Announcements Office of the following:

- If incorporated in a member state, the company must notify details of the interests of which the company is aware in the shares of the company of directors and major shareholders as communicated to the company pursuant to the law of the company's country of incorporation and (if different) the requirements of the competent authority of the member state where the company has its primary listing;
- If incorporated in a non-member state, the company must notify the following details when it becomes aware that a person or entity has acquired or disposed of a number of shares such that that person's or entity's holding of the voting rights in the company reaches, exceeds, or falls below 10 per cent, 20 per cent, one-third, 50 per cent, or two-thirds of the total voting rights: (a) the proportion of voting rights held, (b) the identity of the person or entity, and (c) the date on which the company becomes so aware; and
- The notification must be made within nine calendar days of the date on which the company becomes aware of the acquisition or disposal.[87]

Communication with Shareholders

There is an overriding obligation on a listed company to ensure that holders of listed shares who are in the same position are treated equally. This is reflected in the procedural requirements for communication of information to shareholders. A company must ensure that, at least in each member state in which its securities are listed, all of the necessary facilities and information are available to enable its shareholders to exercise their rights.

It must inform shareholders when meetings which they are entitled to attend will be held. The company must enable shareholders to exercise the right to vote, where applicable, and must publish notices or distribute circulars giving information on the allocation and payment of dividends and interest, the issue of new securities, and the redemption or repayment of securities.[88] A proxy form must be sent with the notice convening a meeting of shareholders to each person who is entitled to vote at the meeting.[89] The proxy form itself must comply with the requirements of Listing Rules.[90]

Where a circular is issued to holders of a particular class of security, a copy or summary of that circular also must be issued to holders of other classes, unless the contents are actually irrelevant to them.[91] If it is necessary to communicate with holders of listed bearer securities, the company must place an advertisement in at least one national newspaper, giving an address from which copies of such communication can be obtained.

Where available, first class mail, or an equivalent service which is no slower, must be used when sending documents of title to holders of listed securities in Ireland and other member states. Where available, airmail, or an equivalent service which is no slower, must be used when sending documents to holders of listed securities residing in non-member states. If, however, the overseas company is not incorporated in a member state, it must use airmail, or an equivalent service which is no slower, when sending documents to holders outside its country of incorporation.[92]

Annual Report and Accounts

Overseas Company with Primary Listing on Irish Stock Exchange

Apart from any obligations under the law of a company's country of incorporation, a listed company is obliged to issue an annual report and accounts.[93] The annual report and accounts must:

- Have been prepared in accordance with the issuer's national law and, in all material respects, with Irish Generally Accepted Accounting Principles, United States Generally Accepted Accounting Principles, or International Accounting Standards;
- Have been independently audited and reported on in accordance with the auditing standards required in Ireland or the United States or by International Standards on Auditing;
- Be in consolidated form if the company has subsidiary undertakings unless the Irish Stock Exchange otherwise agrees, although the company's own accounts also must be published if they contain significant additional information;
- If they do not give a true and fair view of the state of affairs, profit or loss, and cash flows of the group, provide more detailed and additional information; and
- Be published as soon as possible after the accounts have been approved and in any event within six months of the end of the financial period to which they relate.[94]

The annual report and accounts must contain:

- A commentary on forecasts;
- A statement of the amount of interest capitalized;
- Details of any waiver of emoluments;

91 Purple Book, paras 9.27 and 17.42.
92 Yellow Book, para 17.43.
93 Yellow Book, para 12.41.
94 The Irish Stock Exchange will extend this time limit in exceptional circumstances.

- Details of any waiver of dividends;
- A statement of directors' share interests;
- Major interests in shares;
- Details of purchases by a company of its own shares;
- Allotments for cash;
- Details of the participation by a parent undertaking in any placing made during the period under review;
- Details of any contract of significance and of any such contracts in which a director of the company is or was materially interested;
- Details of any contract of significance between a company or one of its subsidiary undertakings and a controlling shareholder;
- Details of any contract for the provision of service to the company or any of its subsidiaries by a controlling shareholder;
- Details of all related party transactions; and
- Details of long-term incentive schemes.[95]

Overseas Company with Secondary Listing on Irish Stock Exchange

An annual report and accounts also must be issued by an overseas company with its secondary listing on the Irish Stock Exchange. The annual report and accounts must be:

- Drawn up and independently audited in accordance with the requirements of paragraphs 3.3(c), 3.3(d), 3.4, and 3.5 of the Purple Book;[96]
- In consolidated form if the company has subsidiary undertakings;[97]
- Published within six months of the end of the financial period to which they relate; and
- Provide more detailed and additional information if they do not give a true and fair view of the state of affairs in profit or loss of the group.[98]

The annual report and accounts must be prepared to a standard appropriate to protect the interests of investors and must include:

- Particulars of the interest in its equity share capital of each director and major shareholder as required by the company's country of incorporation; and

95 Purple Book, para 12.43.
96 If the Exchange is satisfied that an overseas company's accounts have been prepared to a standard appropriate to protect the interests of investors, different standards from those referred to in paragraph 3.3(c) may be accepted in an accountant's report, comparative table, and in the annual report and accounts. The accounts must then comply with paragraph 17.3.
97 The company accounts also must be published if they contain significant additional information.
98 Purple Book, para 17.45.

- The information necessary to enable holders of its listed securities resident in Ireland to obtain any relief from Irish taxation to which they are entitled in respect of their holding of such securities.

The report of the auditor must be annexed to all copies of the annual accounts and indicate whether in his opinion the accounts give a true and fair view, in the case of the company's accounts, of the state of its affairs at the end of the financial year and the profit and loss and changes in the financial position for the financial year and, where consolidated accounts are prepared, of the state of affairs at the end of the financial year and profit and loss and changes in the financial position of the company and its subsidiary undertakings for the financial year.[99]

However, such an auditor's report is not required if the report conforms to auditing practice in the United States. In addition, where a company is incorporated in a non-member state and is not required to draw up its accounts so as to give a true and fair view, it must consult the Irish Stock Exchange to establish whether the standard to which they are drawn up will be sufficient.[100]

An overseas company must circulate, to all holders of its listed securities whose addresses are in Ireland, a copy of the annual report and accounts together with a copy of the auditor's report. If any listed securities are in bearer/quasi-bearer form, the company must place an advertisement in two national newspapers published in Ireland stating the time and place in or near the center of the city of Dublin, or such other place as the Exchange may determine, from which copies of such report and accounts and auditor's report may be obtained without charge.

Half-Yearly Report

An overseas company must prepare a report, on a group basis where relevant, on its activities and profit and loss for the first six months of each financial year.[101] The accounting policies and presentation applied to these interim figures must be consistent with those applied in the latest published annual accounts, save where there are to be changes in the subsequent annual financial statements or where the Irish Stock Exchange agrees otherwise.[102]

The half-yearly report must be published as soon as possible and in any event within 90 days of the end of the period to which it relates in the case of an overseas company with a primary listing on the Irish Stock Exchange. In the case of an overseas company with a secondary listing on the Irish Stock Exchange, the report must be published within four months of the end of that period to which it relates. Again, this may be extended by the Irish Stock Exchange in exceptional circumstances.

101 Purple Book, paras 12.46 and 17.52.
102 Purple Book, para 12.47, applicable to an overseas company with a primary listing on the Irish Stock Exchange only. Where the company has a secondary listing of the Irish Stock Exchange and its half-yearly report is not prepared on a basis consistent with its annual accounts, the half-yearly report must include a statement that, in the directors' opinion, the half-yearly report enables investors to make an informed assessment of the results and activities of the group for the period.

The report must be published by notifying it to the Company Announcements Office without delay after board approval and simultaneously to the competent authorities of each other member state in which the company's shares are listed, not later than the time the report is first published in a member state. In addition, the company must either send the half-yearly report to the holders of its listed securities or insert it, as a paid advertisement, in at least one national newspaper.

In the case of a company with a secondary listing, it must make copies of the report available to the public at an address in Ireland and advertise this fact in at least one Irish national newspaper. The information required by paragraphs 12.52–12.59 of the Listing Rules, in the case of a company with primary listing, or paragraphs 17.58–17.63, in the case of a company with a secondary listing, must be included in the report in respect of the group's activities and profit or loss during the relevant period.[103]

In exceptional circumstances, if Ireland is the only member state in which the company is listed, the Irish Stock Exchange may allow the report to include estimated figures for profit and loss. In such a case, a statement to the effect that the figures are estimates must be included.[104] The half-yearly report must contain:

- An explanatory statement including any significant information enabling investors to make an informed assessment of the trend of the group's activities and profit or loss;
- An indication of any special factor which has influenced those activities and the profit or loss during the period in question;
- Enough information to enable a comparison to be made with the corresponding period of the preceding financial year; and
- A reference to the group's prospects in the current financial year, so far as possible.

Certain information may be adapted or omitted, at the discretion of the Irish Stock Exchange, to suit the company's particular requirements.[105]

Where a company is incorporated in a non-member state and publishes a half-yearly report in that country, the Irish Stock Exchange may authorize it to publish that report, translated into English if necessary, instead of the half-yearly report referred to above, provided that the information given is equivalent to that which would have been otherwise required.[106]

The figures required by paragraph 17.58 (a), (b), (d), and (e) and paragraph 17.61 in relation to a secondary listed company may be omitted if disclosure would be contrary to the public interest or seriously detrimental to the company, provided in the case of the latter that the public would not be misled regarding facts and circumstances required to assess the shares in question. A request for omission must be in writing.

106 Purple Book, para 17.7.

Directors

An overseas company must notify the Company Announcements Office of any change to the board without delay following the decision or receipt of notice about the change by the company, including:

- The appointment of a new director;
- The resignation, removal, or retirement of a director; and
- Changes to any important functions or executive responsibilities of a director.

Acquisitions and Disposals

An overseas company with a primary listing on the Irish Stock Exchange must comply with chapter 10 of the Yellow Book dealing with transactions and, where applicable, chapter 11 dealing with transactions with related parties. An overseas company with a secondary listing must notify the Company Announcements Office of details of acquisitions and disposals of assets as required by the stock exchange on which the company has its primary listing.[107]

However, where the transaction in question can be classified as a reverse take-over,[108] the Irish Stock Exchange must be consulted regarding the information to be provided to shareholders.[109]

Shares in Public Hands

An overseas company must inform the Irish Stock Exchange in writing without delay if it becomes aware that the proportion of any class of listed equity shares in public hands has fallen below 25 per cent of the total issued share capital of that class or such lower percentage as the Exchange may have agreed.[110]

Proxy Forms

A proxy form must be sent with the notice convening a meeting of holders of securities to each person who is entitled to vote at the meeting. The form must provide for two-way voting on all resolutions, except for procedural resolutions, and state that the shareholder is entitled to appoint a proxy of his own choice and provide a space for insertion of the name of such proxy.

This restricts the company from allowing shareholders only to appoint the chairman of the company as their proxy, for example. The form also must state that if it is returned without an indication as to how the proxy shall vote on a particular matter, the proxy will exercise his discretion as to whether, and if so how, he votes.[111]

Where the resolutions to be proposed relate to the re-election of more than five retiring directors, the form may give shareholders the opportunity to vote for or against the re-election of the retiring directors as a whole but also must allow votes to be cast for or against the re-election of each retiring director individually.[112]

Developing Companies Market

General Obligation of Disclosure

A company whose securities are admitted to trading on the Developing Companies Market must notify the Company Announcements Office without delay of any major new developments in its sphere of activity which are not public knowledge and which may lead to substantial movement in its share price as a result of the effect of those developments on its assets or liabilities, or financial position or general course of its business.

The Developing Companies Market Rules, however, specifically refer to the directors' knowledge of developments. Where the directors are aware that there is such a change in the company's financial position or performance, or in the company's expectation of its performance, and that knowledge is likely to lead to substantial movement in share price, the notification obligation arises.

Impending developments or matters currently under negotiation do not necessitate notification provided they are proceeding in a strictly confidential basis. If the company suspects a breach of this confidence has occurred, or is likely to occur, which would lead to substantial movement in share price, the company must, without delay, notify the Company Announcements Office with at least a warning announcement to the effect that the company expects to shortly release information which may lead to such movement. Information which has been provided by a company in confidence to government departments or other statutory or regulatory bodies need not be notified to the Company Announcements Office.

Information required by the Company Announcements Office may not be given to anyone else, other than the company's advisers on a strictly confidential basis, before it is notified to the Company Announcements Office except in the circumstances mentioned above.

Where disclosure to the public would prejudice the company's legitimate interests, the Irish Stock Exchange may grant a dispensation from the relevant requirements. A company whose securities are also quoted on another stock exchange must ensure that equivalent information is made available at the same time to the Company Announcements Office and the market of each such other exchange.

Where the company is obliged to notify information to the Company Announcements Office when the office is not open for business, it must ensure there is adequate coverage of the information by distributing it to not less than two national daily newspapers in Ireland. The company must lodge the announcement at the Company Announcements Office when it re-opens.

111 Purple Book, para 13.28.
112 Purple Book, para 13.29.

The company must forward six copies of all circulars, notices, reports, announcements, or other documents to the Company Announcements Office at the time of their issue and all resolutions passed by the company, other than resolutions concerning ordinary business at an annual general meeting, without delay after the meeting.

Specific Disclosures

Apart from this general obligation of disclosure, there are specific disclosure requirements in the Developing Companies Market Rules relating to capital as follows:

- Alterations to capital structure;
- New issues of securities;
- Changes of rights attaching to securities;
- Redemption or drawing of quoted securities;
- The basis of allotment of quoted securities offered generally to the public for cash and of open offers to shareholders;
- Temporary documents of title and any extension granted for the currency of such documents;
- Issues affecting conversion rights; and
- Results of new issues.[113]

Where an overseas company receives information equivalent to that received by an Irish company under sections 67–79 and 81 of the Companies Act 1990, relating to the disclosure of certain major interests in share capital, it must notify it to the Company Announcements Office without delay.[114]

A company also must inform the Irish Stock Exchange in writing without delay if it becomes aware that the level of shares in public accounts has fallen below 10 per cent of the total issued share capital of that class.[115] It also must notify the Company Announcements

113 Developing Companies Market Rules, para 4.9. The company also must notify the Company Announcements Office of interests of directors (their spouses and children) and connected persons. Overseas companies must notify information equivalent to that disclosed to Irish companies in this regard pursuant to the Companies Act 1990. The notification also must include the date on which the disclosure was made to the company, the date on which the transaction giving rise to the interest or cessation of interest was effected, the price and class of securities concerned, the nature of the transaction, and the nature and extent of the directors' interests in the transaction.

Office of decisions by the board of directors on dividends, profits, and other matters requiring announcement by 5:30 pm on the day on which the decision is made.[116]

Board Changes

In circumstances where a new director is appointed, resigns, or is removed, or any important change in the functions or executive responsibilities of a director occurs, the company must notify the Company Announcements Office without delay.

Miscellaneous

A company must notify the Company Announcements Office without delay of the resignation of its sponsoring broker and the appointment of a new sponsor. It also is obliged to appoint a registrar and, where appropriate, a paying agent in Ireland unless it provides financial services and performs these functions within Ireland.[117]

A decision to pay a dividend or other distribution on quoted securities or to withhold any dividend or interest payment also is an event worthy of notification, and the information specified in paragraph 4.36 must be provided to the Company Announcements Office.

Communications with Shareholders

As under the Purple Book, the Developing Companies Market Rules impose an overriding obligation to treat holders of securities who are in the same position equally. It must ensure that all necessary facilities and information are available to enable holders of its securities to be aware and to exercise their rights as shareholders.[118]

To facilitate exercise of rights, a proxy form must be sent with each notice convening a shareholders' meeting to each person entitled to vote at the meeting. Where a circular is issued to holders of a particular class of security, a copy or summary of it must be issued to holders of shares of other classes unless the contents are irrelevant to them.

Financial Information

The company must notify the Company Announcements Office without delay after board approval of a preliminary statement of its annual results. This must have been agreed with the company's auditors, give details of the nature of any qualification to the auditors' report, show the figures in a form consistent with the presentation to be adopted in the annual accounts for that year, and include any significant additional information necessary to assess the results being announced.

116 If the decision is made after 5:30 pm, the notification must be made before 8:30 a.m. on the next business day.

117 Developing Companies Market Rules, para 4.22.

118 Developing Companies Market Rules, para 4.21.

A company also must notify the Company Announcements Office without delay after board approval of its half-yearly results. This must include the figures listed in rule 4.35 presented in a table form. Adjustments may be made where the items specified are not appropriate to the company in question. The half-yearly report must be issued within four months of the end of the period to which this relates.

Annual Report and Accounts

The company must issue its annual report and accounts within six months of the end of the period to which it relates. These must be prepared in accordance in all material respects with Irish Accounting Standards or International Accounting Standards.

They must have been independently audited and reported on in accordance with the auditing standards required in Ireland, or with international standards on auditing. They must be in consolidated form if the company has subsidiaries, unless the Irish Stock Exchange otherwise agrees. If they do not give a true and fair view of the state of affairs, profit or loss cash flows of the group, they must provide more details and additional information; and they must be published as soon as possible after the accounts are proved.

Rule 4.39 specifies items that must be included in the report and accounts, unless the Irish Stock Exchange agrees otherwise. Where these items refer to specific sections of Irish legislation, overseas companies must include equivalent information as far as they are aware of it.

Exploration Securities Market

Disclosure obligations of companies listed on the Exploration Securities Market replicate those described above in relation to the Developing Companies Market except that, where a company whose securities are admitted to trading on the Exploration Securities Market fails to comply with its general obligation of disclosure, the Irish Stock Exchange may:

- Discontinue the admission of securities to trading;
- Suspend trading in the securities;
- Publish the fact that the company concerned has failed to comply with the obligations; and
- Itself make public any information which the company has failed to publish.

Technology Market of the Irish Stock Exchange — ITEQ(r)

There are two possible methods of entry to ITEQ, ie, the Official List and Direct Entry. A technology company which is officially listed may be automatically admitted to ITEQ without any additional documentation or regulatory obligations to those applying to the Official List. It will, of course, be required to continue to comply with the Official List requirements. Companies applying for Official Listing have the following options, depending on the circumstances of the company:

A company applying for admission to the Official List must meet all of the requirements of the Listing Rules of the Exchange. In certain circumstances, the Exchange accepts that if an Irish company has the majority of its shareholders and business in another country and is subject to appropriate regulation on a stock market in that country, an Irish listing could be considered to be a secondary listing. Where this is accepted, certain exemptions from the normal listing rules and continuing obligations will be applied at the time of listing in Dublin.

The ITEQ rules are compatible with the United States Securities Exchange Commission registration process and German Neuer Markt admission rules. A particular feature of the rules is that they allow a company which is applying for admission to a United States market to use the Securities Exchange Commission registration statement (with certain minor additional disclosures) as the admission document for ITEQ. Direct admission to ITEQ is available for a technology company irrespective of its revenue earning record.

To improve trading liquidity, particularly for NASDAQ-quoted companies, ITEQ allows for trading in depository receipts on the Irish market. Trading in American Depository Receipts is exempt from Irish Stamp Duty.

There is no material effect of choosing one method of entry over another as far as trading in shares and the ability to raise equity capital is concerned. However, Stock Exchange documentation and the admission document of an ITEQ company will identify the regulatory regime to which it will be subject.

Securities Offerings

In General

The primary list for equities listings on the Irish Stock Exchange is the Official List, and the index of listed shares is known as the ISEQ index. The admission and listing requirements for companies seeking a listing on the Irish Stock Exchange are set out in the Purple Book.

As to the secondary lists, the Developing Companies Market Exploration Securities Market and ITEQ each have separate admission rules. There are many methods of bringing securities to listing, and they are detailed in chapter 4 of the Purple Book.[119]

Offer for Sale or Offer for Subscription

An offer for sale is an invitation to the public by or on behalf of a third party to purchase securities of the issuer already in issue or allotted.[120] An offer for subscription is an invitation to the public by or on behalf of a third party to subscribe for securities of the issuer not yet issued or allotted.[121]

These offers may be in the form of an invitation to tender at or above a stated minimum price. In an offer for sale, the issuer company allots the shares to an intermediary, who in turn makes the offer to the public. In this type of offer, the intermediary acts as a principal and not as agent of the company. A company may decide to offer securities by way of a combined offer for sale and offer for subscription. Such an arrangement allows existing shareholders of the company to use the occasion of listing to sell their shares to the public when listing occurs.

Placing

A placing is defined as a marketing of securities in issue but not yet listed or not yet in issue to specified persons or clients of the sponsor or any securities house assisting in the placing, which does not involve an offer to the public or to existing holders of the issuer's securities generally.[122]

Another type of placing is a 'vendor consideration placing'.[123] Such a placing occurs where there is a marketing by, or on behalf of, vendors of securities that have been allotted as consideration for an acquisition. A placing where no stock market listing is involved is unlikely to require a prospectus, as it is unlikely to be categorized as an offer to the public. Where a placing forms part of a listing whereby shares will be available for offer or subscription, then a prospectus may be required.

Intermediaries Offer

An intermediaries offer is a marketing of securities already or not yet in issue by means of an offer by, or on behalf of, the issuer to intermediaries for them to allocate to their own clients.[124]

'Intermediaries' are defined as an intermediary who is independent of both the sponsor of the offer and who does not assist in any way with the marketing of the offer.

Introduction

An 'introduction' is a method of bringing securities to listing that are already in issue and are widely held by the public.[125] An introduction is often used by companies listed on the Irish Developing Companies Market. It also is favored by overseas companies whose securities are traded in other jurisdictions and who wish to obtain a secondary listing on the Irish Stock Exchange.

123 'Vendor consideration placing' should be distinguished from 'vendor consideration issue', as described in the Purple Book, para 4.29.

The Irish Stock Exchange will only admit securities to listing by way of an introduction where it is satisfied that the shares are so widely held that their marketability can be assumed.[126] No capital is raised by the applicant company as the purpose of an introduction is merely to list its securities rather than to make an offering to the public for purposes of raising finance.

Rights Issue

A rights issue is an offer to existing holders of securities to subscribe or purchase further securities in proportion to their holdings made by means of the issue of a renounceable letter of allotment, which may be traded for a period before payment for the securities is due.[127] To encourage existing shareholders to take up the offer, the offer is usually made at a discount.

The offer is accompanied by a circular detailing the offer, a provisional letter of allotment, and a renounceable letter which allows the shareholder to renounce their right to allotment in favor of another party should they so wish.[128] This type of offer must remain open for at least 21 days.[129] This facilitates trading of the entitlement to subscribe for securities.

In the case of equity securities, section 23(1) of the Company's (Amendment) Act 1983 provides for a statutory right of pre-emption. This means that, where a company proposes to offer new, unissued equity securities[130] in return for cash, it must first offer them to its existing members in proportion to their existing holdings. During the 21-day period following the making of the offer, an existing member may renounce his or her rights in favor of another party.[131]

Where the offer is for consideration otherwise than wholly in cash, the statutory right of pre-emption does not apply. It is worth noting that section 24 of the 1983 Act permits the disapplication of section 23 statutory pre-emption rights, ie, it permits that the directors of the company have the power to either disapply section 23(1) or modify its application where either an appropriate provision in the company's articles of association or, more usually, a members' special resolution[132] so permits.

130 'Equity securities' of the Companies (Amendment) Act 1983 as are defined in section 23(13), which will mean company shares or securities which may be converted into shares but does not include bonus shares; or shares shown in the memorandum to have been shares taken by a subscriber to the memorandum; or shares which in respect to dividends and capital carry restricted distribution participation rights; or shares which are held under an employee share scheme; or which, although not yet allotted, are to be allotted pursuant to such a scheme.

131 Companies (Amendment) Act 1983, s 23(3), such other party having the right to be admitted as a member of the company, subject to any restrictions in the company's memorandum and articles of association.

132 A special resolution requires a 75 per cent majority vote.

Open Offer

An open offer is an invitation to existing holders of securities to subscribe or purchase securities in proportion to their holdings.[133] This is not made by means of a renounceable letter of allotment and, thus, is unlike a rights issue in this regard. An open offer must be made using assignable or transferable application forms, with splitting facilities.[134]

The open offer also may be made in conjunction with other methods of issue. It is worth noting that a director may not, save in exceptional circumstances, apply for excess securities without those securities being offered to other existing shareholders on identical terms. An open offer may not be made where the securities are equity securities and are of a class already listed if the price is to be at a discount of more than 10 per cent of the middle market price of those securities at the time of announcing the terms of the open offer, unless the Stock Exchange is satisfied that the issuer is in severe financial difficulties or that there are other exceptional circumstances.[135]

Acquisition or Merger Issue

An acquisition or merger issue (or vendor consideration issue) is defined in the Purple Book as an issue of securities in consideration for an acquisition of assets, or an issue of securities on an acquisition of, or merger with, another company as consideration for the securities of that company.[136]

A company could use this method if it did not wish to finance an acquisition by means of borrowings or a rights issue.

Capitalization Issue

A capitalization issue is where a company opts to issue bonus shares to its existing members in proportion to their existing holdings rather than paying dividends, or for any other reason.[137] A capitalization issue does not involve the company raising any capital, as the funds to finance the issue come from company reserves.[138]

Issue for Cash

An issue for cash is an issue of securities for cash to persons who are specifically approved by the company's shareholders in general meeting, or an issue pursuant to a general

disapplication of section 23 of the Companies (Amendment) Act 1983 approved by shareholders in general meeting.[139]

Such an issue for cash is not regarded as a placing where the subscribers are small in number and are named at the members' general meeting.[140] Paragraph 4.34 of the Yellow Book provides that securities of a class already listed may be granted a listing if they arise from an issue for cash, an exchange for, or a conversion into, another class of securities, or an exercise of options or warrants to subscribe for securities.

Offer to the 'Public'

The Companies Acts 1963–2003 makes it clear that a prospectus will not be required where shares or debentures[141] are not offered to the public.

Although private companies are prohibited from offering shares to the public,[142] nevertheless a private company is capable of making such an offer, with the consequence that a prospectus will be required.

Therefore, irrespective of the type of company involved, the central issue that arises in any proposed issue of shares or debentures in a company is whether or not the offer is intended to be made to 'the public'. The Companies Acts 1963–2003 provide no clear definition as to 'the public'. The Prospectus Directive states in its preamble that 'so far, it has proved impossible to furnish a common definition of the term ''public offer'' and all its constituent parts' which could be used throughout the European Union.

Section 61 of the Companies Act 1963 states that an offer to the public shall include offers of shares or debentures 'to any section of the public, whether selected as members or debenture holders of the company concerned or as clients of the person issuing the prospectus or in any other manner'. The section intends that 'the public' may include a selected group of offerees, ie, a section of the public such as a group selected by virtue of being the most likely persons to be interested in an offer.[143]

139 Purple Book, para 4.33.
140 Purple Book, para 4.33.
141 Section 2(1) of the Companies Act 1963 defines shares as 'shares in the share capital of the company, and includes stock except where a distinction between stock and shares is expressed or implied' and 'debentures' as 'including debenture stock, bonds and any other securities of the company whether a charge on the assets of a company or not'.
142 Companies Act 1963, s 33(1)(c). Section 21 of the Companies (Amendment) Act 1983 makes it a criminal offence for the company and any of its officers to either offer any shares or debentures to the public, or to allot or agree to allot any shares or debentures with a view to any of them being offered for sale to the public. Section 21(3) states that section 21(1) does not, in any way, affect the validity of any allotment or sale or any agreement to allot or sell.
143 Article 2.1 of the Prospectus Directive does not require a prospectus if the offer is to a 'restricted circle of persons'. However, it does not elaborate any further on the point.

This subsection also provides that a group selected by virtue of their being members or debenture holders of the company concerned may be deemed to be a 'section of the public'. Therefore, a rights issue may be deemed to involve an offer to a 'section of the public'.[144]

A group 'selected in any other manner' can be deemed to be a 'section of the public'. Hence, in order for an offer to such groups to fall outside the prospectus requirement, clearly something more must be present before they will be deemed not to constitute 'the public'. Section 61(2) of the Companies Act 1963 provides that an offer will not be an offer to the public if either it is not calculated to result in persons acquiring the shares other than those receiving the offer or, alternatively, the offer can properly be regarded as a 'domestic concern of the persons making and receiving the offer'.

Unlisted Securities

A private company's articles of association prohibit it from offering shares or debentures to 'the public'. This raises the issue of whether such a company runs the risk that, when it issues securities to its members or debenture holders, it may be offering them to 'the public'.

Legislation provides that, although the company's articles may prohibit it from making offers to the public, it will not be taken to mean that it is prohibited from offering shares or debentures to its members or debenture holders.

Disclosure of Acquisition of Substantial Holdings

In General

As to the Irish Take-over Panel Act 1997 (Substantial Acquisition Rules) 1997, the Substantial Acquisitions Rules are made by the Irish Take-over Panel.[145]

The Substantial Acquisitions Rules are administered by the Panel in accordance with the Irish Take-over Panel Act 1997 (Take-over) Rules 1997. The Panel Executive is available for consultation on the application of the Substantial Acquisitions Rules, and rulings and directions relating to the Substantial Acquisitions Rules are given by the Panel on application by interested parties or on its own initiative.

The Substantial Acquisitions Rules reflect General Principle 12,[146] which provides that a substantial acquisition of securities, whether effected by single or multiple transactions, shall take place only at an acceptable speed and shall be subject to adequate and timely disclosure. These Rules are designed to restrict the speed with which a person may increase a holding of voting securities, and rights over such 144 Unless it remains within the parameters of section 61(2) of the Companies Act 1963.

145 The Substantial Acquisitions Rules are made pursuant to the provisions of section 8(2) of the Irish Take-over Panel Act 1997, Act Number 5 of 1997, and have been approved by the Minister for Enterprise and Employment as required by the Take-over Panel Act.

securities, of a relevant company[147] to an aggregate of between 15 per cent to 30 per cent of the voting rights of the relevant company.

The Rules also require the accelerated disclosure of acquisitions of rights related to such holdings. There are, however, a number of exceptions to this. The Panel has the role of elaborating rules to regulate substantial acquisitions by virtue of section 8(2) of the Act.

Prohibition

Rule 4 of the Substantial Acquisitions Rules prohibits a person from making 'a substantial acquisition' of securities except as permitted by the Substantial Acquisitions Rules.[148]

According to rule 3(a) of the Substantial Acquisitions Rules, an acquisition by a person of voting securities of a relevant company (or of rights over voting securities) shall be regarded as 'a substantial acquisition' if:

- Any voting securities or rights so acquired confer in the aggregate 10 per cent or more of the voting rights in the company; and
- Any voting securities (and rights over same) so acquired by that person confer 15 per cent or more, but less than 30 per cent, of the voting rights in the company when aggregated with any voting rights already held by that person.[149]

Should the person engage in a series of acquisitions of voting securities of a relevant company, then all such transactions will be aggregated within a seven-day period for the purpose of assessing whether the acquisitions constitute 'a substantial acquisition' in that period. If the acquisition represents less than 10 per cent of the total voting rights, then the proposed acquisition may be made.[150]

If the acquisitions represent more than 10 per cent of the total voting rights, then it is a question of whether that amount when aggregated with existing holdings would elevate the person's interest to between 15 per cent and 30 per cent. Should that be the case, then the acquisition may not proceed.[151] If the 30 per cent threshold is met or exceeded, then the Take-over Rules, in particular rules 5 and 9, may come into play and usually oblige the person to make a bid for the company.

147 Irish Take-over Panel Act 1997, s 2.

148 Special provision is made for 'dealers' whereby the prohibition in rule 4 shall not apply to dealers who acquire substantial acquisitions and dispose of sufficient of them as determined by rule 4 thresholds by 12 noon the next day to a person unconnected to the seller, or where the dealer inadvertently purchases a substantial acquisition.

149 Note that, if the person is acting in concert with other persons, then their holdings will be aggregated for the purposes of rule 3 of the Substantial Acquisitions Rules calculations.

150 Any acquisitions made by any person acting in concert with that person during that period also must be aggregated; Substantial Acquisitions Rules, rule 3(b)(i).

151 This is subject to one of the exceptions of Substantial Acquisitions Rules, rule 5, being applicable.

The acquisition of new voting securities,[152] or of new or existing voting securities,[153] under an established share option scheme, or the acquisition of existing voting securities by the exercise of an option are not treated as an acquisition of voting securities for the purposes of rule 3(a) of the Substantial Acquisitions Rules. However, the acquisition of any such rights will count for agreegability purposes should the person subsequently acquire further voting securities in the company at any time in the future.

Exceptions

If a 'substantial acquisition' comes within one of the exceptions permitted by rule 5 of the Substantial Acquisitions Rules, it may proceed.[154] These rule 5 exceptions are where 'a substantial acquisition' is made in relation to voting securities (or rights over same) in a relevant company by a person who:

- Acquires voting securities (or rights over same) from a single securities holder,[155] and it is the only acquisition the person has made in the last seven days;
- Is engaged in a tender offer;[156]
- Immediately after the acquisition, announces a firm intention to make an offer under the Take-over Rules for the company concerned in circumstances where either the acquisition is made with the agreement of the offeree company's board, or the offer will be publicly recommended for acceptance by the board, and the acquisition is conditional on the announcement of the offer; or
- Before the acquisition, the acquiring person announced a firm intention to make an offer for the company concerned and the posting of the offer was not subject to a precondition.

Where the acquiring person or those acting in concert with him hold 30 per cent or more of the voting rights of the company, such a person will be subject to the Take-over Rules, rather than the Substantial Acquisitions Rules.[157] In such event, the person may be obliged to make a 'mandatory offer' under rule 9 of the Take-over Rules.

Obligation of Prompt Disclosure

A person who acquires voting securities (or rights over same) is obliged by rule 6 of the Substantial Acquisitions Rules to disclose the acquisition, as well as that person's total 152 This also includes acquisition of securities convertible into new voting securities (other than the purchase of rights pursuant to a rights issue); Substantial Acquisitions Rules, rule 3(a).

153 This also includes acquisition of rights over such securities; Substantial Acquisitions Rules, rule 3(a).
154 Substantial Acquisitions Rules, rule 3.
155 Substantial Acquisitions Rules, rule 5(b), elaborates further on the issue of 'single securities holder' to provide that acquisitions from persons who are members of the person's immediate family or from related group companies will be regarded as being from a single holder.
156 Substantial Acquisitions Rules, rule 7.
157 Substantial Acquisitions Rules, rule 5; note rule 5.1.

holding of voting securities (or rights over same) not later than noon on the business day following the acquisition[158] in the following circumstances:

- Where the aggregate of all voting rights[159] held by the person before the acquisition was less than 15 per cent, and after the acquisition has increased to, or is greater than, 15 per cent;[160] or
- The aggregate of the voting rights held by the person before the acquisition was between 15 per cent and less than 30 per cent, and after the acquisition has increased by more than one whole percentage.[161]

The notification must be made to the company concerned, the Company Announcements Office of the Irish Stock Exchange, and the Irish Take-over Panel.

The acquisition of new voting securities, or of new or existing voting securities under an established share option scheme, or the acquisition of existing voting securities by the exercise of an option are not required to be disclosed by rule 6. However, the acquisition of any such rights counts for aggregability purposes should the person acquire a disclosable acquisition of voting securities at any time in the future.

Insider Trading and Fraud

Common Law

The statutory regime[162] only applies to insider dealings in securities in respect of which the Irish Stock Exchange provides dealing facilities.[163] The Common Law remains relevant in certain instances[164] and, therefore, has not been rendered obsolete by the statutory regime in so far as such securities are concerned.

Rights at Common Law are very limited and, indeed, case law provides that company directors normally owe no fiduciary duties to the shareholders where acts of non-disclosure are relevant to the value of the company's securities.[165] The only way directors who are insiders can be punished is where they are found to have breached the fiduciary duty that they owe to the company itself.[166] Clearly, this is of limited use to aggrieved shareholders.

Statutory Regime

Part V of the Companies Act 1990 provided a statutory regime for regulating insider dealings. The enactment of Part V was motivated by Ireland's obligation to implement the Insider Dealings Directive.[167] The Directive's preamble states that the Community wished to ensure that co-ordinated rules were adopted on insider dealings throughout the member states. Accordingly, the Directive laid down a set of requirements which all member states are obliged to ensure are reflected in their domestic law. Part V of the 1990 Act implemented the Directive in Ireland with effect from 27 December 1990.[168]

The legislation has improved the weak legal protection that the Common Law afforded the victims of insider dealings. However, this statutory regime only applies in respect of securities for which dealing facilities are provided by a 'Recognized Stock Exchange'.[169]

The legislation defines dealing as:

> Dealing in relation to securities means (whether as principal or agent) acquiring, disposing of, subscribing for or underwriting the securities, making or offering to make or inducing or attempting to induce a person to make or to offer to make, an agreement:
> (a) for or relating to acquiring, disposing of, subscribing for or underwriting the securities; or
> (b) the purpose or purported purpose of which is to secure a profit or gain to a person who acquires, disposes of, subscribes for or underwrites securities or to any of the parties to the agreement in relation to the securities.[170]

In other words, in order for the legislation to apply, there must be 'dealings' in the defined 'securities'.

'Securities', as defined in section 107 of the Companies Act 1990, includes any of the following interests in respect of which dealing facilities are or are to be provided by a recognized stock exchange:

- Share, debentures, or other debt securities, issued or proposed to be issued, whether in the state or otherwise;
- Any right, option, or obligation in respect of any of the securities in the first item, above;
- Any right, option, or obligation in respect of any index relating to the securities in the first item, above; and 170 Companies Act 1990, s 107.

- Any interest as may be subscribed by the Minster with responsibility for legislation.

A recognized stock exchange is any exchange as designated by the Minister with responsibility, which provides facilities for the buying and selling of rights and obligations to acquire stock. At this time, the only such exchange so designated is the Irish Stock Exchange. Note that the definition of 'dealing' and 'securities' does not exclude 'off-market' dealings in securities in relation to which dealing facilities are provided by a recognized exchange.

The Act prohibits a party in possession of inside information from engaging in insider dealing.[171] The legislation defines inside information as 'information that is not generally available and which if it were so available would be likely materially to effect the price of the securities'.[172]

One notable difference between the Irish legislation and the Directive is that, under the Directive, inside information must be of a 'precise nature'.[173] The purpose of such was so that mere rumors and speculation at the stock exchange could not be taken as insider dealing. The Irish legislation has no such 'precise' requirement.

The legislation defines two types of 'primary insiders'.[174] First, a person may not deal in securities of the company if he is, or was at any time, in the preceding six months connected to the company[175] where he is in possession of inside information by reason of his so being connected to the company.[176] Second, a person may not deal in securities of another company if he is, or was in the previous six months, connected to a company which was proposing to enter into a transaction with the other company and the connected person has inside information relating to that transaction.

A secondary insider, or 'tipee',[177] is a person who is prohibited from dealing in securities of a company when in possession of information which is not generally available but if it were would be likely to materially affect the price of securities where this information was received, directly or indirectly, from another person, and where the tipee is aware or ought reasonably to be aware of facts or circumstances by virtue of which that other person is precluded from dealing under the legislation.[178]

The legislation also provides for categories of transactions which are exempt from the application of the provisions on insider dealing. These are very limited in nature.[179]

Yellow Book Model Code

Chapter 16 of the Yellow Book Model Code imposes restrictions on directors' dealings[180] in securities[181] of their own companies.

The purpose of the Code is to ensure that directors or connected persons[182] neither abuse price sensitive information[183] nor place themselves in a position where they might come under such suspicion.

The Code provides[184] that a director may not deal in any securities of the company at any time when he is in possession of unpublished price-sensitive information in relation to the company's securities.

Where a director proposes to deal in the company's securities, the Code provides that he may not deal unless he has first advised the chairman or a designated director of the company of his intention to deal. A written record must be kept by the company of any clearance requests made by directors, together with any clearances given in response thereto.[185] The Model Code goes on to ensure that directors are not granted clearance to deal during certain 'prohibited periods'.[186]

Insider Trading and Fraud — Extraterritorial Application

Potentially, the greatest deficiency with the scope of 'dealing' arose from the adoption of the Companies Act 1990 (Insider Dealing)[187] Regulations 1992, which confined the application of section 108 dealings taking place within Ireland.[188]

These Regulations provided that the statutory prohibition on insider dealing did not apply to dealing in securities outside of Ireland. The reason why Ireland adopted the 1992

180 The Model Code defines 'dealing' as any acquisition or disposal of, or agreement to acquire or dispose of, any securities of the company and the grant, acceptance, acquisition, disposal, exercise or discharge of any option (whether for the call, or put, or both) or other right or obligation, present or future, conditional or unconditional, to acquire or dispose of securities, or any interest in securities, of the company whereby 'deal' shall be construed accordingly.

181 The Model Code defines 'securities' as meaning any listed securities and, where relevant, securities which have been listed or admitted to dealing on, or have their prices quoted on or under the Rules of NASDAQ or any investment exchange in a member state which provides facilities for the buying and selling of securities.

182 Yellow Book, para 16.13, defines 'connected persons' as persons defined in section 64 of the Companies Act 1990 whose interests in the company are treated as those of the director and such interests are, along with the director's interests in the company, notifiable pursuant to section 53 of the Companies Act 1990.

183 The Model Code defines 'unpublished price sensitive information' as per section 108(1), Companies Act 1990, but with the additional element that it must be 'specific or precise'.

184 Model Code, para 4.

185 Model Code, para 8.

186 For a description of these 'prohibited periods', see the three such periods specified under paragraph 7 of the Model Code.

187 Companies Act 1990 (Insider Dealing) Regulations 1992, SI Number 131 of 1992, repealed by section 6 of the Companies (Amendment) Act 1999 (Number 8 of 1999).

188 Cahill, Corporate Finance Law (2000).

Regulations was to ensure that stabilization efforts put into effect outside of Ireland (and which would presumably be adequately regulated by insider dealing rules in the other jurisdiction) were not inadvertently jeopardized by the application of the legislation.

The difficulty that arose was that a party accused of illegal dealing outside Ireland could invoke the 1992 Regulations as a defense when challenged. By confining the application of the legislative prohibitions to 'dealing' in securities within Ireland, the government had satisfied the minimum requirements required or the Insider Dealing Directive,[189] but allowed the insider dealer dealing outside Ireland to proceed unhindered.

The Companies (Amendment) Act 1999[190] has recently been enacted to deal with this situation. This Act revoked the 1992 Regulations. Thus, a person who deals outside Ireland in securities listed in Ireland can no longer avail of the lacuna in the 1992 Regulations.

Liabilities for Insider Trading and Fraud

The legislation provides for both civil and criminal liability. Civil liability extends to compensate a party to a transaction not in possession of the relevant information for any loss sustained by reason of the difference in price at which the securities were traded and the price at which they would have been likely to have been dealt in if the information had been generally available, and to account to the company who issued the securities for any profit accruing. Any action under this provision must be made within two years of the date of completion of the transaction giving rise to the claim.

Section 111 imposes criminal liability on a person who deals in securities in a manner declared unlawful by Section 108. The criminal liability for inside dealing includes penalties on conviction on indictment of fines of up to €253,947.62 and prison terms of up to a maximum of 10 years. A summary conviction results in fines of up to €12,697.38 or up to 12 months' imprisonment or both.[191] The Act, however, is silent as to the requisite intention required of the dealer.

A recent Circuit Court decision addressed that issue and held that the prosecution must prove that the defendant intended to profit by using the price-sensitive information.[192] This means that criminal convictions for insider dealing will be difficult to achieve and that the regulatory authorities will be more cautious when deciding whether to prosecute. The Office of the Director of Corporate Enforcement (ODCE) is now charged with investigating alleged instances of insider dealing following the enactment of the Company Law Enforcement Act 2001, which amended section 115 of the Companies Act 1990. There is a statutory duty on the Irish Stock Exchange to provide the Director of Corporate Enforcement with a report of its findings if it appears that, following its investigation, an offence has been committed under Part V of the Companies Act 1990.[193] The Director of Corporate Enforcement will then report all relevant offences to the Director of Public Prosecutions who is responsible for prosecuting offences under the Act.

Acquisition may be subject to sections 4 and 5 of the Competition Act 2002, save where those mergers or acquisitions have been put into effect with Part III of the Competition Act 2002. The Competition Authority has now been established as the main regulator of mergers by virtue of the Act,[194] although it should be noted that media mergers (regardless of their size) must be notified to the Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Employment.[195]

Public Take-Over Bids

In General

Regulation in regard to public take-overs involves two pieces of legislation. Where a take-over involves a company whose securities are listed, the regime introduced by the Irish Take-Over Panel Act, 1997 and the Panel's Take-Over Rules may be applicable.

In addition, the provisions of Part III of the Competition Act 2002[196] will apply where the merger or acquisition meets or exceeds certain asset or turnover thresholds set out in the 2002 Act. Where those thresholds are met, the merger or acquisition will require notification to the Competition Authority seeking clearance under the 1978 Act. Additionally, a merger or acquisition may be subject to Sections 4 and 5 of the Competition Act 2002, save where those mergers or acquisitions have been put into effect with Part III of the Competition Act 2002. The Competition Authority has now been established as the main regulator of mergers by virtue of the Act,[197] although it should be noted that media mergers (regardless of their size) must be notified to the Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Employment.[198]

Procedural Requirements

Under the Competition Act 2002, where there has been a 'merger' or 'acquisition', such 'merger' or 'acquisition' is notifiable to the Competition Authority where:

- In the most recent financial year, the world-wide turnover of each of two or more of the undertakings involved is not less than €40 million;
- Each of these undertakings carries on business in any part of the island of Ireland; and
- One of the undertakings has a turnover in the State which is not less than €40 million.[199]

197 Competition Act 2002, s 30.
198 Competition Act 2002, s 23.
199 Competition Act 2002, s 18(1)(a).

Notwithstanding these thresholds, the Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Employment may order that certain types of mergers and acquisitions are notifiable where the exigencies of the common good so warrant.[200] A failure to notify a notifiable merger or acquisition — or to supply information required in relation to a notified merger or acquisition — can result in significant fines (€3,000 on summary conviction or €250,000 on conviction on indictment).[201] A notifiable merger or acquisition will, where it is not notified, also be void.[202]

The Authority has stated that, for the purpose of calculating turnover and assessing whether business is carried on in Ireland, the term 'undertakings involved' means the entire group of companies to which a merging company belongs. The Authority further stated that the term 'carries on business in any part of the island of Ireland' will include undertakings which have sales into the State without having a physical presence within the State. It also considers that 'turnover in the State' will include turnover generated from sales within the State, sales out of the State and sales into the State.

All media mergers require to be notified regardless of the turnover of the undertakings involved.[203] Mergers which do not reach the turnover thresholds can be voluntarily notified to allow the notifying parties to seek immunity from attack under sections 4 and 5 of the Act.[204]

Section 18(1) of the Competition Act requires that each of the enterprises involved in the proposed merger or acquisition (which meet the aforementioned thresholds) shall notify the Authority in writing of the proposal of such 'merger' or 'acquisition' and provide full details within one month after the conclusion of the agreement or the making of the public bid. Notifications are to be made by each of the undertakings involved using the prescribed Form M1 or Form M2. The form can be filled in on a joint basis, or separate notifications may be made by each party. A fee of €8,000 is prescribed for each notification.[205]

Where foreign companies are involved, details of any other merger clearances that are required in any other jurisdiction are requested to be supplied to the Competition Authority, together with details of whether such enterprises have been the subject of competition law proceedings in any jurisdiction.

The authority has one month in which to decide that:

- The merger or acquisition will not substantially lessen competition in the state and, therefore, should be put into effect; or
- It intends to open a four-month investigation (a 'full investigation') into the proposed 'merger' or 'acquisition'.[206]

The initial one-month period will be extended to 45 days in the event that the Authority is required to consider proposals from the parties as to how any competition concerns expressed about the merger in the Authority notifying undertakings' discussion might be modified for the better.

Where the Authority opens a section 22, four-month investigation, it must make one of three decisions, namely, to:

- Permit the merger;
- Prohibit the merger; or
- Permit the merger subject to conditions that it will specify.[207]

The Irish Take-over Panel Act 1997 provides for the creation of the Irish Take-Over Panel, a domestic body charged with the orderly regulation of take-overs of listed companies in accordance with the rules of fair conduct and good commercial standards. The Irish Panel's Rules have been drawn up in accordance with a set of 12 general principles scheduled in the Irish Take-over Panel Act 1997. These rules are as follows:

- All shareholders as the same class of the offeree will be treated similarly by an offeror;
- Where information is tendered by the offeror or offeree or their respective advisers to shareholders of the offeree in the course of any offer, it must be made available equally to all of the shareholders who may accept the offer;
- No offer may be made and no announcement of a proposed offer may be made save after careful and responsible consideration of the matter by the offeror and any advisers of the offeror and only if the offeror and any advisers of the offeror are satisfied that the offeror will be able to implement the offer if it is accepted;
- Shareholders to whom an offer is made shall be entitled to receive such information and advice as will enable them to make an informed decision on the offer;
- It is the duty of all parties to a take-over or other relevant transaction to prevent the creation of a false market in any of the securities of the offeror or offeree and to refrain from any statement or conduct which could mislead shareholders or the market;
- It is the duty of the directors of an offeree when an offer is made or when they have reason to believe that the making of an offer is imminent to refrain from doing anything as respects the conduct of the affairs of the offeree which might frustrate that offer or deprive shareholders of the opportunity of considering the merits of the offer, except on the authority of those shareholders given in general meeting;
- Directors of the offeree shall give careful consideration before they enter into any commitment with an offeror (or any other person) which would restrict their freedom to advise shareholders of the offeree in the future;
- Directors of the offeree and (if it is a company) of the offeror owe a duty to the offeree and the offeror, respectively, and to the respective shareholders of those companies to act in disregard to personal interest when giving advice and furnishing information in relation to the offer; in discharging that duty, the directors will be bound to consider the interests of the shareholders as a whole;

- Rights of control must be exercised in good faith, and the oppression of a minority is not acceptable in any circumstances;
- Where an acquisition of securities is contemplated as a result of which a person may incur an obligation to make an offer, he must, before making the acquisition, ensure that he can and will continue to be able to implement such an offer;
- An offeree ought not to be disrupted in the conduct of its affairs beyond a reasonable time by an offer for its securities; and
- A substantial acquisition of securities (whether such acquisition is to be effected by one transaction or a series of transactions) may take place only at an acceptable speed and will be subject to adequate and timely disclosure.

Exceptions

Rule 5.2 of the Take-over Rules provides for a number of exceptions where the restriction on acquisitions of voting securities or of rights over such securities may be permitted.

Common to several of these situations is that each involves the making of a 'firm intention announcement', either immediately before or after the substantial acquisition, and there is a friendly reception on the part of the offeree's board towards the offer. Acquisition is permitted by a person:

- Who acquires voting securities (or rights over same) from a single[208] securities holder and it is the only such acquisition the person has made in the last seven days;[209]
- Immediately before the announcement of the person's firm intention to make an offer under the Take-over Rules for the company in circumstances where either the acquisition is made with the agreement of the offeree board or the offer will be publicly recommended for acceptance by the board, and the acquisition is conditional on the announcement of the offer;
- Immediately after the person announces a firm intention to make an offer in respect of the company, provided that such acquisition satisfies a precondition of the posting of the offer and that the offer has been publicly recommended for acceptance by the offeree board, or the acquisition is made with its agreement;
- After the person has announced a firm intention to make an offer in respect of the company, provided that the posting of the offer is not, at the time of acquisition, either made with the agreement of the offeree board, or the offer or any competing offer has been publicly recommended for acceptance by the offeree board; or 208 Take-over Rules, rule 5.2(b), elaborates further on the issue of 'single securities holder' to provide that acquisitions from persons who are members of the person's immediate family or from related group companies will be regarded as being from a single holder.

209 Take-over Rules, rule 5.2(a)(i), elaborates by providing that this exception shall not apply if such person has announced a firm intention to make an offer in respect of the company and the posting of the offer is not subject to any preconditions.

- If the acquisition is by way of acceptance of an offer made in accordance with the Rules.

Jurisdictional Conflicts

In General

A broad reading of the phrase 'jurisdictional conflicts' yields a number of possible contexts in which such a conflict could arise in relation to securities regulation, inter alia:

- Conflicts between the substantive requirements of the listing rules of various stock exchanges both inside and outside Europe; and
- Conflicts arising in the context of private international law as to the applicable law in an international contract, as to the correct jurisdiction in which to initiate court proceedings in the event of a dispute, as to the procedural rules applicable in the event of such a dispute, and regarding the enforceability of judgments obtained in the crossborder context.

Multilateral Approach

Substantive Requirements of the Yellow Book

The European Communities (Transferable Securities and Stock Exchange) Regulations 1992, the Purple Book, and the Companies Act 1963, as amended (in so far as they relate to foreign companies seeking listing on the Irish Stock Exchange), have been discussed above.

Chapter 17 of the Purple Book sets out the requirements and exemptions in respect of foreign companies;[210] however, the Irish Listing Rules and the Companies Act 1963 should be read as one. Therefore, filing requirements in respect of foreign companies under the Companies Act 1963, although not necessarily referred to in the Listing Rules, must nevertheless be complied with.[211]

It is recommended that, where there is an apparent conflict in the application or listing requirements of the various European and international stock exchanges, a company seeking listing on more than one exchange determines which of the exchanges has the most stringent requirements and tailors its listing application, prospectus, and forms of compliance accordingly.

The practice of the Irish Stock Exchange in the event of a conflict of disclosure requirements is to accept disclosures made under a more stringent stock exchange regime to require more exacting compliance where this is necessary under the Irish Stock Exchange

210 'Foreign companies', for the purposes of the Irish Stock Exchange, are companies registered outside the Republic of Ireland.

211 For example, Parts XI and XII of the Companies Act 1963 deal with companies incorporated outside the state establishing a place of business within the state, and restrictions on the sale of shares and offers of shares for sale, respectively. The Combined Companies Acts, which are well indexed are the best reference point for those seeking to ensure compliance in this regard.

rules. The Rules offer guidance on such discretionary areas in paragraph 17.11. Directors should be aware of ongoing obligations, eg, disclosure requirements.

Where multiple listing is sought and the various stock exchange requirements as to accounting principles and methods of financial reporting differ in respect of listing particulars, if accounts prepared over three years are consolidated accounts in respect of the applicant and all its subsidiary undertakings and have been prepared in accordance with the applicant's national law (which must comply with either Irish or American Accounting Standards, such as Generally Acceptable Accounting Standards) in all material respects and are independently audited, they will most likely be acceptable to the Irish Stock Exchange, subject to paragraph 17.3 in respect of overseas companies.

It is suggested that, where necessary, a supplement be added to the documents submitted as the listing particulars in the form of a statement of adjustment outlining the differences in accounting methods required in one jurisdiction from those employed in another. Chapters 12 and 17 of the Purple Book should be consulted in detail as, although there is a growing trend towards globalization of capital markets, the levels of transparency of accounting methods do still differ.

Private International Law

As outlined, jurisdictional conflicts can arise in the contexts of a substantive law, territoriality, procedurally, or in the context of enforcement of judgments.

Genuine and False Conflicts

In General

What might at first seem to pose a jurisdictional or conflict of laws problem can be resolved by reference to international conventions which have been designed to harmonize the rules relating to conflicts of laws and by deciding under which jurisdictional penumbra the particular conflict falls.

The Listing Rules of the Irish Stock Exchange, the Purple Book, and the Exchange itself respectively, constitute the national regulatory infrastructure and regulatory body giving effect to the European Community Directives which protect investors and regulate listings on the markets.[212]

Therefore, in the event that a conflict of rules, procedures, or jurisdictional and sovereignty matters is not addressed by the Purple Book, international conventions are the next reference point in resolving any cross-jurisdictional issues, always bearing in mind that Irish company law requirements must be complied with.

212 Council Directive 79/279/EEC (the Admission Directive), Council Directive 82/121/EEC (the Interim Reports Directive), Council Directive 80/390/EEC (the Listing Particulars Directive), Council Directive 88/627/EEC (the Major Shareholding Directive), Council Directive 89/298/EEC (the Public Offers Directive), and their subsequent amending Directives.

For business efficacy reasons, companies outside Ireland clearly have an interest in being able to enforce their international contracts and protect themselves from suits in myriad countries based on countless rules of law. The Brussels Convention[213] and the Rome Convention,[214] as implemented by Irish legislation,[215] contain the rules governing the matters of territorial jurisdiction and choice of law, respectively, but they give parties the right in articles 3 and 17, respectively, to contractually agree on these matters for themselves.

Choice of Law

Where a contract is concluded between two or more parties in different jurisdictions concerning a matter in another jurisdiction, confusion can arise as to the legal rules to be applied in the case of a dispute.

The purpose of the Rome Convention is to provide a domestic law code for resolving choice of law problems in contract and to prevent 'forum shopping' which had arisen following the signing of the 1968 Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters.

Article 1 provides that its rules 'apply to contractual obligations in any situation involving a choice of laws of different countries'. Article 2 requires that any law specified under the Convention be applied whether or not it is the law of the contracting state. Therefore, it replaces all the previous Irish private international law applicable to international contracts whether or not they have a European dimension. As stated, parties are free to choose the legal rules by which a contract is to be governed.[216]

In the event that no applicable law is chosen, the contract 'shall be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected',[217] which in turn is determined by reference to:

> . . . where the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has, at the time of the conclusion of the contract, his habitual residence, or in the case of a body corporate or unincorporate, its central administration.[218]

However:

> . . . if the contract is entered into in the course of that party's trade or profession, that country shall be the country in which the principal place of business is situated or,

213 Brussels Convention 1968 on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters (subsequently amended by the San Sebastian Convention).

214 Rome Convention 1980 on the Law Applicable to Contractual Obligations.

215 The Brussels Convention was implemented into Irish law by the Jurisdiction of Courts and Enforcement of Judgments (European Communities) Act 1988 (Number 3 of 1988) and the San Sebastian Convention by the Jurisdiction of Courts and Enforcement of Judgments Act 1993 (Number 8 of 1993). The jurisdiction of the 1988 and 1993 Acts has been consolidated by the Jurisdiction of Courts and Enforcement of Judgments Act 1998, Act Number 52 of 1998. The Rome Convention was implemented by the Contractual Obligations (Applicable Law) Act 1991 (Number 8 of 1990).

217 Rome Convention, art 4(1).

> where under the terms of the contract is to be effected through a place of business other than the principal place of business, the country in which that other place of business is situated.[219]

The law governing certain contractual matters, ie, interpretation, performance, consequences of breach, prescription and limitation of actions, and contractual nullity,[220] under the terms of the Convention (if it were valid), is the governing law. The governing law is the law of the place where the company has its central administration, subject to the proviso in article 4(5).[221]

Contracts concluded between persons who are in the same country are:

> . . . formally valid if [they] satisfy the formal requirements of the law which governs [them] under this Convention or of the law of the country where [they are] concluded . . .[222]

whereas:

> . . . a contract concluded between persons who are in different countries is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law of one of those countries.[223]

Company law issues relating to internal structure and workings or the personal liability of members are one of the major exceptions to the scope of the Convention, ie, the governing law is that of the country in which the company is incorporated.[224]

Territorial Jurisdiction

Territorial jurisdiction is concerned with the court in which an action can be brought; if a court cannot establish jurisdiction under the Convention, then it must refuse to hear the case. The Brussels Convention states that, in civil and commercial matters, 'persons domiciled in a member state are to be sued in that state'.[225] Part III of the Schedule to the Jurisdiction of Courts and Enforcement of Judgments Act 1988 provides that a company is domiciled in the place of incorporation or where its central management and control is exercised.

An exception to this rule is that, in 'matters relating to contract', defendants may be sued in their state of domicile or in the state which is the place of performance of the obligation in question. In determining the 'obligation in question', various courts have looked at the main purpose of the contract and the Irish courts in particular have simplified the analysis by saying that the 'obligation in question' means that which is the subject matter of the particular proceedings.[226] The Brussels Convention only applies to a legal dispute between states that are member states of the European Union.

Procedural Law

Evidence and procedure fall outside the scope of the Conventions, but they are governed by the rules of the state in whose courts the dispute is being heard, subject to the modification in article 14 of the Rome Convention, which states that:

> . . . the law governing the contract under this Convention applies to the extent that it contains, in the law of contract, rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.[227]

The effect of article 14(2) is that a forum's rules as to modes of proof are not to have the effect of invalidating a contract formally valid under the terms of article 9.

Enforceability of Judgments

As between the member states of the EU, the Brussels Convention, articles 31–35, provides for an application to be made to the relevant judicial authority for recognition and enforcement of a foreign, ie, another EU member state judgment. The relevant application in Ireland is made to the Master of the High Court, pursuant to Order 42A of the Rules of the Superior Courts.

The courts are bound, under the Convention, to grant an order for enforcement, assuming the application procedures have been correctly followed, unless grounds of public policy or a judgment in default of appearance obtained in the absence of fair notice can be established as grounds to block the order.[228]

The European Court of Justice has held that the Convention does not apply to proceedings for the enforcement of judgments given in civil and commercial matters in non-contracting states.[229]

The Common Law position in Ireland with respect to recognition and enforcement of foreign (ie, 'non-EU') judgments (which is appropriate in disputes outside the ambit of the Brussels Convention) is that the foreign court must have had 'jurisdiction' under Irish conflicts of law rules.

Introduction

In General

The securities laws in Israel are governed, for the most part, by the Securities Law[1] and related regulations.[2] The entity which supervises and is responsible for the application of the securities laws is the Israeli Securities Authority (the "Authority" or the "Securities Authority"), under whose supervision the Stock Exchange, which is in charge of the trade in securities in public possession, operates.

Market Players

Securities Authority

The Securities Authority was established pursuant to the Securities Law (may be also referred to as the "Law"). Its function is to preserve the interests of the public investing in securities, as stipulated in the Law. The Authority is a corporation, legally competent with respect to any duty, right, or legal action.

The arrangements for dealing with applications for publication of prospectuses are prescribed by the Securities Authority with the approval of the Minister of Finance. Anyone considering himself injured by a decision of the Securities

1 Securities Law 5728-1968.

2 As of February 1st 2000, some of the securities related issues mentioned hereunder are governed by the new Israeli Companies Law, 1999, and related regulations. Among the key issues in the securities laws and in the course of operations of public companies, which were formalised pursuant to the new Companies Law and/or the regulations enacted pursuant thereto, the following are included, inter alia: class action, special and full purchase offer, relief to public companies whose securities are listed for trading on a stock exchange outside Israel, a chapter on transactions with interested parties, relief in transactions with interested parties, and voting in general meetings of shareholders by means of voting instrument or through the Internet.

Authority has the right to appeal to the Economic Division of the Tel Aviv District Court.[3]

Stock Exchange

In General. Trading in securities is performed via the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange. There is no other licenced stock exchange in Israel for trade in securities.

Pursuant to the Securities Law, opening and managing a stock exchange in Israel is subject to a licence granted by the Minister of Finance, following his consultation with the Securities Authority.[4] A licence to manage a stock exchange will be granted only to a company which does not limit the number of its members and:

- Whose Memorandum of Incorporation specifies that its exclusive objective is to manage a stock exchange;
- Whose Articles of Incorporation ensure that its profits will serve only for its objectives and will not be distributed among its members, provided that upon liquidation, the remainder of its assets shall be used for purposes stipulated by the Minister of Finance. This provision will apply only following the grant of two or more such licences;
- Which has enacted regulations as provided by the Law and such regulations have been approved by the Minister of Finance after consultation with the Securities Authority and by the Knesset Finance Committee; and
- Which manages its stock exchange in a city where no other stock exchange has yet been established.

Pursuant to the Securities Law, the rules for conducting trade in the Stock Exchange are regulated by the Stock Exchange Regulations, which, inter alia, establish rules for the regular and fair management of the Stock Exchange in the following fields:

3 Courts Law [Integrated Version] -1984, s 42D. The Economic Division of the Tel Aviv District Court was established according to the Courts Law (Amendment no. 59), 2010 and it commenced its operation on December 15, 2010. The Economic Division focuses on financial cases arising from both Securities Law and Companies Law, and, inter alia, has exclusive jurisdiction over most civil cases regarding the Companies Law and the Securities Law, including derivative claims and class action suits, administrative appeals against the Israeli Securities Authority, the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and the Israeli Registrar of Companies. The major purpose of the Economic Division is to address the complexity which very often accompanies cases of this sort.

4 Securities Law, ss 45–52.

Rules with Respect to Membership in Stock Exchange. Rules with respect to membership in the Stock Exchange include those relating to:

- Terms of eligibility for membership on the Stock Exchange and the procedure for admitting members;
- The spectrum of activities permitted to a member of the Stock Exchange;
- Duties of the members vis-à-vis the Stock Exchange and its members, including the duties of disclosure, recording, and reporting;
- Rules of behaviour for members of the Stock Exchange vis-à-vis their clients, including the duties of disclosure, recording, and reporting;
- The Stock Exchange's supervision and control of its members' compliance with the Stock Exchange's regulations and directives;
- Disciplinary offences by members of the Stock Exchange and jurisdiction with respect thereto;
- Terms and procedure for suspending and terminating the membership of a member of the Stock Exchange; and
- Application of the above rules, mutatis mutandis, to a company operating within the fields of activity permitted to a member of the Stock Exchange, which is controlled by a member of the Stock Exchange or by a party holding a controlling interest therein.

Rules for Registration of Securities for Trade on Stock Exchange. Rules for registration of securities for trade on the Stock Exchange (hereinafter, 'registration for trade') include those relating to:

- Specifications of a company whose securities may be registered for trade, regarding the period of its operation, the volume of its operation and business results, the value of its assets and liabilities, its relationship with other corporations, and its classification in registration groups, and various rules as above established in accordance with the economic activity in which the company engages;
- Specifications of the securities which may be registered for trade, regarding class, overall minimum value at the time of registration, the minimum proportion that will be in the possession of the public immediately after registration and the degree of dispersal thereof, and the maximum number of classes or series;
- The ratio between the price of the securities on issue and the price of the company's securities on the Stock Exchange and the manner in which the securities were issued and allocated;
- Registration for trade of securities allocated under a private offering;
- Prevention of any transaction or action with respect to securities in the possession of an individual or class, for a period to be determined;
- Obligation of the company to ensure that all shares of its issued capital will be fully paid-up;

- Obligation of the company that any and all shares of its issued capital will be registered for trade, with an exception for industrial companies to which the Law of Encouragement of Industry (Taxes) applies and companies whose share capital includes special state shares.[5]
- Obligation of the company that all its securities shall be registered for trade in the name of a registration company, with certain exceptions to this rule, including those regarding companies whose securities are listed for trade on a stock exchange outside of Israel and companies incorporated outside of Israel.

Rules with Respect to Trading on Stock Exchange. Rules with respect to trading on the Stock Exchange include those relating to:

- Trading days;
- Conducting trade in various trading groups and methods;
- The Stock Exchange's supervision and control of compliance with the provisions and directives of the Stock Exchange's regulations, and proper conduct of trading;
- Terms and procedures for temporary cessation or restriction of trade in a particular security or group of securities;
- Exclusivity of trade to members of the Stock Exchange and to whom the Stock Exchange has approved, and the terms of such approval;
- Publication of the results of trading; and
- Terms and procedure for conducting transactions outside the Stock Exchange by members of the Stock Exchange, in securities registered for trade on the Stock Exchange.

Duties of Company Whose Securities Are Registered for Trade. Duties of a company whose securities are registered for trade include those relating to:

- Continued compliance with the rules stipulated for registration for trade, even after registration, with the changes deriving from the fact that the securities of the company are registered for trade;
- The duty of giving notice of types of events and information as required by the Stock Exchange;

The Stock Exchange Regulations also address the following issues:

- Terms and procedure for suspending trade in securities or erasing a security from registration for trade, including erasure on the initiative of the registered company;

5 Stock Exchange Regulations, s 71.

- Publication of information by the Stock Exchange, including information relating to the trade, members of the Stock Exchange, and registered companies; and
- Commissions, registration fees, and handling fees for the Stock Exchange's services.

The Stock Exchange Regulations shall apply also to a corporation that is not a company and to units of a closed fund as defined in the Joint Investment Trust Law, if such corporation or units are registered for trade, and the adjustments required therefore.

The Stock Exchange Regulations may stipulate that the Stock Exchange's Board of Directors has the right to refuse to register securities for trade on the Stock Exchange if in its opinion there is a substantial conflict of interests between the company and a controlling party therein, or between the company and a company controlled by the controlling party, provided that the resolution is adopted by the majority of two-thirds of the members of the Board of Directors participating in the meeting and eligible to participate in the vote and provided that the company has been given proper opportunity to present its position in writing to the Board of Directors. The rules of the Stock Exchange and any amendment to such rules may determine provisions in addition to those set forth therein.

The Stock Exchange Board of Directors has the right to stipulate, subject to Securities Authority's approval, directives including details, terms, and reservations with respect to the rules established in the Regulations, if expressly authorised in the Regulations.

The Stock Exchange has the right, with the Securities Authority's approval, to issue temporary directives for a period of one year on the aforesaid matters, in order to examine them before they become established as permanent directives in the Stock Exchange Regulations.

Anyone considering himself injured by a decision of the Stock Exchange has the right to appeal (i) to the District Court, if such decision was made in the course of disciplinary proceedings; and (ii) to the Economic Division of the Tel Aviv District Court, in case of any other decision, provided such decision was not made during the course of trade on the Stock Exchange or does not refer to the by-laws or provisions of the Stock Exchange; notice of commencement of such proceedings shall be submitted to the Authority, and the Authority has a right to present its opinion to the court during the said proceedings.

The Stock Exchange Board of Directors has the right to alter the Stock Exchange Regulations, with the approval of the Minister of Finance after consultation with the Securities Authority and with the approval of the Knesset Finance Committee. The Authority also has the right to cause the Regulations to be altered, with the Stock Exchange's consent, or by application to the Minister of Finance for an order to alter the Regulations, with the approval of the Knesset Finance Committee.

The Securities Law stipulates that the Stock Exchange's activities will be continuous and it may not be closed down unless, in its opinion, or in the opinion of the Minister of Finance, it is necessary to do so for the benefit of the investing public. The Stock Exchange is under the supervision of the Securities Authority. It is the Securities Authority's duty to supervise the proper and fair management of the Stock Exchange and to instruct the Stock Exchange on its actions in case the Authority believes that the Stock Exchange is acting in contrary to its regulations or directives or in a manner which might impair its proper and fair management.

Procedures

Securities Definition

'Securities' are defined in the Securities Law as certificates issued in series by a company (including a foreign company), cooperative society, or any other corporation, conferring the right of membership or participation therein or claim thereon, and certificates conferring the right to purchase securities, whether or not they are 'registered in the name of' or 'to bearer', excluding securities issued by the Israeli government or Bank of Israel which comply with one of the following:

- They do not confer a right of participation or membership in a corporation and they are not convertible into or exercisable as securities conferring such right; and
- They are issued under special legislation.

It should be noted that the securities traded on the Stock Exchange are not limited solely to those that fall under this definition.[6]

Rules of Dual Listing and Trend of Globalisation

By 2000, a general determination was included in the Securities Law whereby when securities of a corporation registered abroad are offered to the public in Israel, the Securities Authority may exempt the offeror from the requirements of the Securities Law, in whole or in part, if it is convinced that the laws of the state in which the corporation is registered adequately secure the interests of the Israeli investors. The authority to grant such exemptions was left, pursuant to this arrangement, to the full discretion of the Securities Authority.

In view of the trend of globalisation that characterises international capital markets, the Israeli legislator decided in 2000 to amend and expand, within the framework of the rules of dual listing in the Securities Law,[7] the legislative arrangement which was practised up to that time, to encourage and attract companies incorporated in Israel whose securities are listed for trading on a stock exchange abroad, to join the Israeli capital market. As a result, the Securities Law enables these companies to list their securities for trading in Israel, without being required to publish a prospectus, but a listing document only,[8] and without subjecting themselves to the regular, current reporting obligations that apply to corporations whose securities were offered to the public pursuant to a prospectus,[9] all subject to the various restrictions as set forth below. This trend was intended to give these companies convenient access to the listing of their securities in Israel, without burdening them with the costs entailed in the listing and reporting procedures in accordance with the two parallel systems of laws. The preliminary threshold requirements for listing for trading under the dual listing rules are as follows:

- The company is required to be traded for a year on any of the NASDAQ Capital Market, the London Stock Exchange's Main Market (official list of the United Kingdom Listing Authority), Primary Listing; and following stock exchanges: NYSE, AMEX, or NASDAQ, and NASDAQ global market;[10] or
- The shares of the company are listed for trading on one of the stock exchanges and the market value of its shares is at least US $150 million.

The aforesaid rules of dual listing shall also apply to a foreign corporation if (i) the Authority and the foreign securities authority in the state in which the corporation was incorporated, have signed an agreement recognizing mutual equivalence of the laws and directives applicable in the State of Israel and in said state of incorporation, with respect to regulation, control and enforcement within the capital market (the "Recognition Agreement"); and (ii) the characteristics listed in Schedule 3-B of the Law are true with regard to the corporation and the securities whose listing is sought, including the characteristics concerning the country in which the corporation was incorporated, the exchange outside of Israel in which the securities are listed or in which they will be listed, and the type of securities.

As of the date of this publication, the requirements of Schedule 3-B apply to a corporation incorporated in France; that is traded on any market that has been licensed by Autorité des Marchés Financiers in accordance with the European Council directive 39/2004 and its traded securities are shares.

These preliminary requirements are the fruits of the conceptual balancing of interests between the aspect of encouraging and attracting the said companies to list their shares for trading in Israel, on the one hand, and the aspect of protection of the interests of the investors' public in Israel, on the other.

The Minister of Finance may, pursuant to a proposal of the Authority or in consultation therewith, and with the approval of the Finance Committee of the Knesset, add additional foreign stock exchanges to those currently recognized in the rules of dual listing, should he find that the rules of the foreign stock exchange and the law applicable to corporations incorporated in Israel whose securities are listed for trading thereon, together with additional details as will be included in the listing document pursuant to the provisions of the law, adequately secure the interests of the public in Israel.[11]

Nevertheless, the Minister of Finance may, pursuant to a proposal of the Securities Authority or in consultation therewith, and with the approval of the Finance Committee of the Knesset, remove a foreign stock exchange from the list of stock exchanges recognised in the rules of dual listing, should he find that, in view of a material change, the rules or the law applicable to corporations incorporated in Israel whose securities are listed for trading thereon no longer adequately secure the interests of the investor public in Israel.[12]

Without derogating from the above, the Minister of Finance may, pursuant to a proposal of the Israeli Securities Authority or following consultation therewith, issue a directive to amend the list of foreign stock exchanges recognized in the rules of duel listing, provided that such amendment will apply to a name determined by a stock exchange, foreign stock exchange, trade lists, regulated market, or a merger or division of trade lists which a stock exchange, foreign stock exchange, or a regulated market have announced.

Furthermore, the Securities Law also enables the Authority to apply the rules of dual listing, in whole or in part, to a corporation incorporated outside Israel, whose securities are listed for trading on a foreign stock exchange and seeking to have these securities listed for trade on the Stock Exchange, provided that no mutual Recognition Agreement has been executed between the Authority and the foreign securities authority in the state in which the corporation was 11 Securities Law, s 35R. In this regard, it should be noted that in the Brodet Committee Report ('The Committee's Report for the Dual Listing of Securities'), following which the rules of dual listing were enacted, determined that the rules and the laws practised on key stock exchanges in Europe should be examined in the future and that the possibility of making further modifications to and/or concessions in the laws should be examined, to enable access for companies listed for trading to those stock exchanges also to listing for trading on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

incorporated.[13] The Authority may make its decision contingent on conditions that it will determine.[14]

Requirements for the Offeror

Shares or securities convertible to or exercisable as shares shall not be registered for trade on the Stock Exchange unless the following conditions are fulfilled:

- With respect to a company whose shares are registered for trade for the first time — The company's share capital may consist of only one class of shares, conferring equal voting rights with respect to their par value; this condition shall not apply to special State shares, as defined in Securities Law; however, nothing in this provision shall be construed as prohibiting a company from issuing Preferred Shares (for example shares conferring a preferred right to dividends and not conferring voting rights), provided that one year has lapsed since the company's shares were first listed for trade; or
- With respect to a company whose securities are listed for trade — Any additional issue of shares will be of the shares with the most preferential voting rights; however, nothing in this provision shall be construed as prohibiting a listed company whose capital consists only of classes of shares permitted under the paragraph above from issuing Preferred Shares starting from the later of January 1, 1992, or the end of one year following the date on which its share capital consisted solely of shares as set forth above.[15]

As of August 1, 1990, a person holding foundation shares as well as capital shares in a company whose securities are registered for trade— as well as any person who purchased the foundation shares from him — will continue to hold capital shares at a rate not less than the rate he held on 1 August 1990, unless the reduction of the rate of his holdings in the capital shares derives only from rights conferred before 1 August 1990 to other holders of the company's securities to be exercised or converted into capital shares; this provision will not derogate from the application to the registered company of the provision with respect to issue of shares with the most preferential voting rights.[16]

Issue under Prospectus and Requirements Concerning Prospectus

In General

Issuing securities and offering or selling them to the public require the approval of the Minister of Finance or anyone appointed by him for that purpose; however, such approval should not be withheld unless the Minister of Finance or anyone appointed by him is of the opinion that the offering, or the terms or timing thereof, contravene the government's economic policy.

Such approval may be general or for a particular class or individual. The Authority will not grant a permit to publish a prospectus unless the offering has been approved pursuant to these aforesaid provisions of Section 39 of the Securities Law.[17]

According to this Section, the officer appointed by the Minister of Finance for this purpose has granted a general permit to:[18]

- Issue and offer to the public: shares, debentures, commercial instruments options, capital notes, capital notes convertible to shares, debentures convertible to shares, and participation units in partnership (excluding bearer securities); and
- Issue bonus shares.

Securities may only be offered or sold to the public under a prospectus, the publication of which has been permitted by the Securities Authority[19] or a draft prospectus that was approved and signed according to the provisions of the Security Law[20] and filed with the Securities Authority.

It is mandatory to include in a prospectus any information that may be important to a reasonable investor considering the purchase of the securities offered thereunder, and any information stipulated by the Minister of Finance in the Regulations. It is forbidden to include in the prospectus, as well as in a draft prospectus, report, notice, document or purchase offer specification, submitted to the Authority pursuant to the Securities Law any misleading information.[21] Such prohibition applies also to an expert opinion, report, review or confirmation, which are included or mentioned in the aforesaid materials submitted to the Authority, with the prior consent of the party giving such opinion, report, review or confirmation.[22]

In an offering of securities which is not a rights' offering, it also is permitted not to include certain details with regard to the underwriter and the distributor and to change the terms of the securities offered within the period starting on the date of publication of the prospectus and ending on the commencement date for placing of orders. Such details which are not included and/or amended should be specified in a complementary notice to be published by the offeror.[23] Information to be included in the draft prospectus and prospectus, and requirements concerning the structure and form of the prospectus, will be specified in the Regulations enacted by the Minister of Finance, as proposed by or after consultation with the Securities Authority, and with the approval of the Knesset Finance Committee.

Restrictions on and Exemptions from Publishing a Prospectus

Until the year 2000, the Securities Authority had the authority to exempt certain offerors, including offerors that were not issuers, from publishing a prospectus.

In 2000, the Securities Law was amended and, as part of this amendment, the scope of the said exemptions was significantly expanded. This legislative expansion was performed by determining clear standards in the Law in respect of the application of the exemptions that are no longer subject to the sole discretion of the Securities Authority. Moreover, specific and detailed provisions were included with respect to additional actions which are not deemed to be an offer of securities to the public that require the publication of a prospectus.[24] Furthermore, the list of exemptions to the general rule of offering of securities to the public solely by means of a prospectus the publication of which was approved by the Authority was determined.[25]

However, such exemptions shall in certain circumstances not apply to the resale to the public of securities which were not originally offered under a prospectus.[26] In addition, a new power was granted to the Authority to exempt from the provisions of the Securities Law, fully or partially, subject to the restrictions determined in the Law, a company whose securities are listed for trading outside Israel that has offered securities to its employees or to employees of a corporation under its control, in Israel, as part of an employees' benefit plan[27]. As part of the said amendment, it was determined that the following actions would not be classified as an offer to the public, and therefore do not require a prospectus:[28]

- An offering or a sale to a number of investors not exceeding 35,[29] provided that the number of investors to whom the offeror will sell the securities in the said offer, combined with the number of investors to whom he sold securities during the 12 months preceding the said offer, will not exceed 35; for this purpose, investors who purchased shares and securities that are convertible into or exercisable as shares, and investors who purchased other securities, will be counted separately;

- The allocation of bonus shares that do not offer a choice to those entitled to receive them; for this purpose, 'bonus shares' are shares allocated by the company, without consideration, to all its security holders entitled to receive the bonus shares according to their proportionate holdings of the securities on the date determined for it by the company, provided that the said date is later than the date of the notice of the resolution to allocate the bonus shares;
- An allocation or transfer of securities to all or any of the security holders of a corporation by virtue of any court judgement or decree granted in a class action as defined in the Companies Law, or any allocation or transfer of securities by virtue of a decision in a proceeding under Sections 350 or 351 of the Companies Law, provided that the Securities Authority was given the opportunity to appear in the proceedings and to state its position with regard to the necessity of publishing a prospectus in order to secure the interests of the intended offerees;[30] and
- Publication of intent to sell securities to a number of offerors not exceeding 35, such offerors to be selected by a procedure determined by the entity making the publication, or to certain investors as specified below:

An offer or a sale to the following investors (deemed sophisticated investors), provided, however that prior to each date of the securities' purchase by each such investor, it shall approve in writing that it fully understands the meaning of its classification as a sophisticated investor:[31] a joint investment mutual fund as defined in the Joint Investment Trust Law, 5754-1994, or a managing company of such fund; a provident fund or its managing company as defined in the Financial Services Supervision (Provident Funds) Law, 5765-2005; an insurer as defined in the Supervision of Insurance Business Law, 5741-1981; a banking corporation and an auxiliary corporation as defined in the Banking (Licensing) Law, 5741-1981, with the exception of a joint service company, purchasing securities on its own behalf or on behalf of clients that are sophisticated investors specified in Section 15A(b) of the Law; a portfolio manager as defined in Section 8(b) of the Regulation of Investment Advice and Investment Portfolio Management Law, 5755-1995, purchasing for himself or for clients that are sophisticated investors specified in Section 15A(b) of the Law; an investments advisor or investments distributor, as defined in Section 7(c) of the Regulation of Investment Advice and Investment Portfolio Management Law, 5755-1995, purchasing for himself; a member of the stock exchange purchasing for itself and for clients that are sophisticated investors specified in Section 15A(b) of the Law; an underwriter that complies with the requirements of the Law, purchasing for himself; a venture capital fund, for this purpose a venture capital fund shall mean a corporation whose main business is investing in corporations which, at the date of the investment, are engaged primarily in research and development or production of innovative and high-tech products or processes, and where the risk of investment is higher than what is customary for other investments; a corporation which is wholly owned by sophisticated investors specified in Section 15A(b) of the Law; a corporation, with the exception of a corporation which was incorporated for the purpose of purchasing securities in a specific offer, whose equity exceeds NIS 50 million.

30 Following rulings of the District Court regarding the level of disclosure required from companies seeking to reach an arrangement with their bondholders with regard to modification of the terms of the bonds, the Securities Authority decided that, in this constellation, a prospectus would, indeed, not be required; on the other hand, a high level of disclosure would be required by way of detailed, immediate reporting, to be published by the company regarding the arrangement proposed by it, which would create, together with the supervision of the Court, a substitute for the publication of a prospectus. This publication obligation will also apply to a company seeking the approval of its bondholders to a modification of the bond terms, also in case it is not a part of a statutory arrangement that requires the approval of the Court as set forth in Section 350 of the Companies Law.

A sophisticated investor is an individual regarding whom two of the following conditions are met and who has given his prior written consent to being considered a sophisticated investor for the purpose of Section 15A(b)(1) of the Law: (1) The total value of the cash, deposits, financial assets and securities – as defined in Section 52 of the Law — owned by the individual exceeds NIS 12 million; (2) The individual has expertise and skills in the capital markets field or has been employed for at least one year in a professional position which requires capital markets expertise; (3) The individual has executed at least 30 transactions, in average, in each quarter during the four quarters preceding his consent; for this purpose, the term "transaction" will not include a transaction executed by a portfolio manager for an individual who has entered into a portfolio management agreement with him. The Minister of Finance, in consultation with the Authority and subject to the approval of the Finance Committee of the Knesset, may add to the list of investors as set forth above or may derogate from it.

Negotiations between an offeror and a party who is considering assuming an underwriting commitment, provided that the said party complies with the qualifications and requirements set forth in the Law and regulations with regard to the underwriter.[32]

A commitment to purchase securities, which is not an underwriting commitment and which was made prior to the commencement of the period for placing orders, shall be void, unless it was made by (i) any of abovementioned sophisticated investors or (ii) an investor incorporated outside Israel, provided that the Authority believes that the said investor is capable of obtaining the information required to make a decision to invest in the securities, which would have been included in a prospectus, had a prospectus been published; provided further that: (a) the offer and sale, pursuant to a prospectus, of securities which are listed or are going to be listed for trading on a stock exchange, shall be carried out pursuant to equal terms and in a uniform manner to all. However, the Minister of Finance is authorized to determine conditions and circumstances under which all or certain of these provisions shall not apply, including with regard to certain types of offers, securities or purchasers, or with regard to securities that are being issued in an amount which is higher than an amount determined by the Minister of Finance, provided that the price of the offered securities is a uniform price as mentioned above; (b) a uniform offer shall be made without determination of a maximal price for the securities being offered; however, the Minister of Finance may stipulate in regulations that the prohibition regarding a maximal price for securities will not apply or that it will apply subject to certain conditions determined by the Minister.

In 2011 the Authority published a non-binding draft release, in which it proposed that only the following sophisticated investors managing funds for the benefit of others shall have the privilege to purchase securities under a prior commitment: (a) a fund manager who purchases securities for the funds managed by him, as these terms are defined in the Joint Investment Trust Law, 5754-1994; (b) a management company, defined in the Financial Services Supervision (Provident Funds) Law, 5765-2005, for investments made for the provident funds managed by it; (c) an insurer as defined in the Supervision of Insurance Business Law, 5741-1981, for investments held against return dependent liabilities; (d) a corporation operating outside of Israel, with characteristics similar to those of the entities mentioned hereinabove, subject to obtaining appropriate confirmations from a foreign supervisory authority of the country in which such corporation operates and from a local lawyer confirming that the said confirmation is valid as of the date of the prior commitment.

An IPO in Israel is often marketed shortly before the publication of the prospectus by way of a road show, during which the issuer, together with the underwriters/distributors, present the issuing company to institutional investors. The minimum tender price of the securities is often determined based on the responses of the potential investors. Fixing a maximum price is prohibited.

Corporations offering their securities to the public may start to market them based on a draft of prospectus made publicly available on the MAGNA reporting system,[33] prior to the final approval of the prospectus by the Authority. This relatively recent amendment is intended to modify the primary market and bring it closer to the American model, as well as facilitate the activities of foreign underwriters in Israel. Subject to certain conditions, unequal terms of securities' offering shall be permitted, regarding the identity of the offerees and the quantity of the securities which are to be sold to each of the offerees, upon the underwriter's discretion, provided however that the price of the offered securities is uniform. Prior to the said amendment, issuers were faced with significant difficulties in raising capital, inter alia, as a result of a limitation to market the securities being issued prior to the date of final approval of prospectus by the Authority. Generally, a company and its underwriters wish to shorten the period between the approval and commencing of trade in the security as much as practically possible, in order to minimize the risk of an event that shall impede the offering, while at the same time a longer period is required in order to find investors. Similar to the American "road show model", this amendment distinguishes between the phases of offering and sale: marketing of securities and closing of orders, made by the underwriter's discretion, are permitted following the submission of a draft prospectus to the Authority; however the sale may be performed only following the publication of the final prospectus, by a uniform price.

Provision of explanations at a meeting of employees of the corporation or employees of the corporation controlled by the said corporation or controlling it, regarding the offer of securities of the corporation to such employees, so long as no information is provided regarding a reporting corporation if such information has not, as of the date of the meeting, been published in a prospectus issued by the corporation or in a report that was filed pursuant to Chapter F of the Law;[34] the following entities are also exempted from offering of securities to the public solely by means of a prospectus:

- A controlling shareholder, a general manager, or a director of the corporation whose securities are being offered, or a corporation controlled by the corporation whose securities are being offered; and
- An investor incorporated outside Israel, should the Securities Authority believe that the said investor is capable of obtaining the information required to make a decision to invest in the securities, which would have been included in a prospectus, had a prospectus been published.

In addition, the said amendment determines that the obligation of publishing a prospectus by virtue of Section 15 of the Securities Law will not apply to the following:[35]

- An offer of securities issued by a reporting corporation to its employees, including to the employees of a corporation under its control, within the framework of an employee benefit plan, by means of an outline containing the details of the offer and the offered securities as prescribed by the 34 Securities Law, s 15A(a).

35 Securities Law, s 15B.

Regulations,[36] and references to the last periodic report, to the interim financial reports, and to the immediate reports subsequently submitted, all in accordance with the Securities Law;

- An offer by the State of Israel of securities of a reporting corporation, including securities that may be converted into or exercised as securities of the said corporation issued by the State of Israel, to the employees of the said corporation, including to the employees of a corporation in its control, made in the course of privatisation not pursuant to a prospectus, by means of an outline as stated in the previous paragraph;
- An offer of securities issued by a non-reporting corporation whose securities are not listed for trade outside Israel, to its employees, including to the employees of a corporation under its control, within the framework of an employee benefit plan, provided that the consideration received for the offer and the percentage of the issued and paid-up capital of the corporation which shall be allocated to the employees pursuant to the said offer, along with those received and allocated during the year preceding the offer, do not exceed the amount determined in the Regulations (being on the date of this publication NIS 19,156,000) or 10 per cent as at the date of the offer, taking into consideration the shares that were allocated in the offer and the shares deriving from the realisation of the exercisable securities that were actually given to employees in the offer and during the year preceding the date of the offer, and without taking into consideration the shares that will derive from the realisation or conversion of convertible securities that were allocated to others by the date of the offer;[37]
- An offer of securities of a non-reporting corporation, by the State, including securities that may be converted into or exercised as securities of the said corporation that are being issued by the State, to the employees of the said corporation, including to the employees of a corporation under its control, made in the course of privatisation not pursuant to a prospectus, in respect of which the restrictions existed as set forth in the above paragraph, concerning the offer of securities issued by a reporting corporation to its employees, including to the employees of a corporation in its control, within the framework of an employee benefit plan;

- An offer by a non-reporting corporation to a number of investors even if such number exceeds 35, including the offer made jointly by the corporation and its shareholder, provided that the consideration received does not exceed the amount determined in the Regulations (being on the date of this publication NIS 2,554,000); the percentage of the issued and paid-up capital allocated does not exceed five per cent of the issued and paid-up capital of the corporation, and that the two following conditions are satisfied: the portion of the capital of the corporation allocated in the said issue, together with the portion of the capital allocated by the corporation under previous offers made not pursuant to a prospectus, does not exceed 10 per cent of the issued and paid-up share capital of the corporation on the date of the offer; and the number of investors in the said offer, together with the number of investors to whom the corporation has previously sold securities not pursuant to a prospectus, does not exceed 75;[38] and
- A listing of securities for trade on a stock exchange as a result of: a public offering of securities pursuant to a prospectus or allocation of such securities; a private placement of securities by a listed company; an offering of securities that are of the same class as those listed for trade on a stock exchange, to the public outside Israel, including the listing of securities for trade on a stock exchange outside Israel; realisation or conversion of securities into securities that were offered to the public pursuant to a prospectus or that were offered through a private placement of securities by a listed company.

Restrictions on the Resale of Securities

The legislative amendment of 2000 expanded, as stated, the scope of the exemption practised until that date. At the same time, however, it promoted the interests of the investors by imposing restrictions on the resale of securities that were allocated not pursuant to a prospectus, by means of the creation of lockup and dripping periods, as set forth below.

Securities that were offered not pursuant to a prospectus, as stated above, are subject to a lockup period before the holder may offer them for sale, in the course of trading on the stock exchange. In addition, at the end of the lockup period, the securities may be offered for sale in a gradual manner only, over a number of additional periods (dripping periods) as set forth below.[39]

The rationale at the basis of these limitations on resale is to prevent the abuse of private placements of securities, as a fast track that would enable the indirect 38 Securities Regulations (Details Regarding, ss 15A–15C of the Law), 5760-2000, Regulation, no 4. It should be noted that the consideration includes consideration in respect of the realisation or conversion of exercisable or convertible securities.

39 Securities Law, s 15C.

distribution of shares to the public bypassing the prospectus requirements. Another reason for determining a lockup period is that the neutralisation of the ability to immediately sell the securities offered not pursuant to a prospectus would force the offerees to thoroughly examine the economic viability inherent in such purchase of securities, and would thus reduce the chance of performing transactions that are ineffective, from the point of view of the capital market.

For all of these reasons, the Securities Law and the regulations by virtue thereof determine that (i) an offer to a number of investors not exceeding 35, (ii) publication of an intent to sell securities to a number of investors not exceeding 35, (iii) an offer to certain investors specified in the Securities Law[40] and (iv) an offer of securities allocated to an offeror outside Israel that was made not pursuant to a prospectus, shall be deemed an offer to the public, notwithstanding the general exemption pursuant to which these acts should not be deemed as an offer to the public, and therefore do not require a prospectus, if:

- An offer is made during the course of trading on a stock exchange of securities listed thereon for trading, during the lockup period specified below;[41] or
- The number of securities offered during each calendar quarter of the dripping period exceeds the daily average volume of trade on a stock exchange of the securities of the class offered within an eight-week period preceding the day of the offer; and (ii) The percentage of the securities offered out of the issued and paid-up capital of the corporation whose securities are being offered exceeds, as of the date of the offer, one per cent of the issued and paid-up share capital of the corporation throughout each calendar quarter. These provisions shall also apply to the offer of securities resulting from the realisation or conversion of convertible securities that were allocated to offerees as stated hereinabove. The shares deriving from the convertible securities that have not yet been exercised or converted by the date of the offer will not be included in the issued and paid-up capital of the corporation.

In addition, if made during the lockup period specified below, an offer made during the course of trading on a stock exchange of securities listed thereon for trading, which were allocated to a corporation controlled by the corporation whose securities are being offered not pursuant to a prospectus, will also be deemed an offer to the public. The lockup and dripping periods that were determined are as follows:[42]

41 In accordance with a 2012 Authority's release, sale of dormant shares acquired by a company, as well as by its subsidiary, on the Stock Exchange shall also require a prospectus; Such release also informed of the Authorities' intention to adopt amendments to Israeli law intended to allow, through the adoption of a new ATM mechanism (At The Market Offering), intending to enable Israeli public companies to issue and offer their securities to the public through the secondary market trading. For further details see "Requirements for Offer Made by Shelf Prospectus" below. As of the date of this publication, such new ATM mechanism has not yet been adopted.

- With regard to an offer to a number of investors not exceeding 35, as stated above, publication of an intent to sell securities to a number of offerees not exceeding 35, as stated above, such publication or offer to sophisticated investors as specified in the Securities Law, and an offer of securities allocated to an offeree outside Israel that was made not pursuant to a prospectus, the lockup period is six months, and the dripping period is spread over six consecutive calendar quarters; and
- With regard to an offer made during the course of trading on a stock exchange of securities listed there for trading, which were allocated to a corporation controlled by the corporation whose securities are being offered not pursuant to a prospectus, the lockup period is one year, and the dripping period is spread over eight consecutive calendar quarters.

The lockup and dripping provisions will not apply to an offer made during the course of trading on a stock exchange, by the State of Israel, or by the entity that purchased securities that were offered by the State of Israel in the course of privatisation.

The last general arrangement that was included in the legislative amendment made in 2000 and related to the offer of securities to the public concerns the offer to employees of a corporation whose shares are listed for trading outside Israel. In this regard, the Authority may exempt from any or all the provisions of the Securities Law, a corporation whose shares are listed for trade outside Israel, which is not a reporting corporation, and which is offering or selling its securities to its employees or to the employees of a corporation under its control, in Israel, as part of an employees' benefit plan, if the Authority is convinced that the laws of the state where such securities are listed for trade adequately secure the interests of the employees in Israel.

Such requirement is similar to those disclosure requirements as set forth with regard to an outline regulating the offer of securities, issued by a reporting corporation to its employees as part of an employees' benefit plan, as stated above. The Authority may condition the grant of an exemption upon such terms as it will determine in order to guarantee that all the details required pursuant to the said outline are disclosed to the employees, including a translation of the offering documents into Hebrew and their submission to the employees.[43]

In addition to the foregoing, the Authority may determine, subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance, rules that will enable it to exempt an offeror from any or all of the provisions relating to the details, structure and form of a prospectus, or with regard to certain types of offers, offerors, corporations, or securities, which will be published in the same manner as other laws in Israel.[44]

Required Information

In General. The Securities Regulations,[45] in addition to the general principles provided under the Securities Law, prescribe the information to be included in the prospectus and govern the structure and form thereof. The Regulations include both technical and substantive provisions. The prospectus must state whether the shares offered confer, vis-à-vis their par value, less voting rights than other of the issuer's shares. The Authority has the right to grant an exemption from all or some of the provisions of this Regulation if it deems appropriate under the circumstances.

The prospectus must include information specified in these Regulations, in so far as it is relevant to the business of the issuer and is material to its fair presentation, including all additional information which might be important for a reasonable investor considering purchase of the securities being offered; there is no obligation to indicate the absence of a particular piece of information unless expressly stipulated in these Regulations.

An issuer (excluding a corporation offering its securities to the public in Israel for the first time) may incorporate in a prospectus by reference, information it published by means of electronic reporting in an immediate report or a periodic report or a quarterly report, within the meanings ascribed thereto in the Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Reports), 5730-1970, subject to certain limitations as detailed under the Prospectus Regulations.

If there is any underwriting obligation with regard to all or a part of the offered securities, information must be provided as to the name of the underwriter, the par value of the securities it undertook to purchase, the price at which it undertook to purchase the securities, the date of payment, and the commissions and other payments which the offeror undertook to pay pursuant to the agreement or in connection with the performance thereof; if the agreement applies to securities with respect to which rights have been granted, the underwriter's intention as to the securities he buys and the identity of the beneficiary who is entitled to any profits the underwriter obtains upon the sale thereof should also be specified.

If shares are offered, the issuer's capital, including the proceeds to be received for the shares, and the total delay in payment thereof, must be described; the changes that occurred in the issuer's registered, issued, and paid-up capital within three years preceding the prospectus date must be indicated, as well as the proceeds received for shares in the said period; if shares have been offered under a prospectus in the said period, the date of the prospectus and the par value of the shares offered thereunder and of the shares purchased by the public must be stated; if there was any underwriting agreement during the said period, pursuant to which the underwriter undertook to purchase the shares not purchased by the public, the name of the underwriter and the par value of the shares he purchased under such agreement shall be stated.

If debentures are offered, the issuer's capital, including the proceeds payable for the shares, and the timetables for receipt of payment therefore should be described; the changes that occurred in the issuer's registered, issued, and paid-up share capital in the three years preceding the date of the prospectus must be stated, as well as proceeds obtained for shares in such period.

The shares which any principal shareholder holds in the issuer on the prospectus' date or on a date as close as possible thereto, must be stated, to the best knowledge of the issuer and its management, providing the name of each principal shareholder, the percentage it holds of any type of the issuer's securities on the said date and on a fully diluted basis, and the par value of any type of the issuer's securities which it undertook to purchase or which the issuer undertook to sell to it. If shares are offered while shares of the issuer are registered for trade on the Stock Exchange, the highest and the lowest rates of all classes of the registered shares (including the dates of such rates) in each of (i) the two financial years prior to the prospectus' date and (ii) within the period commencing at the beginning of the financial year during which the prospectus was published, and ending on the prospectus date, or a date as close as possible thereto, should be specified.

If the issuer undertook to issue, or to avoid issuing or offering securities, in general or upon certain conditions, or to refrain from receiving loans, the particulars of such undertaking must be detailed. If holders of the offered securities are granted an exemption or easement with respect to payment of taxes or under foreign currency control regulations with respect to such offered securities, the particulars of the easement or exemption must be presented, and the provisions of the law should be specified or the approval should be disclosed, as the case may be. If such exemption or easement is granted to holders of securities issued by the issuer prior to the prospectus date, and such exemption or easement is still in force, the particulars of such exemption or easement must be presented. In an offer of debentures, the deed of trust must be enclosed, and the following must be specified:

- The trustee's details, the name of the trust company, the name of the person at the trust company in charge of the debentures, and the contact details of the trustee;
- The material provisions of the deed of trust, including the procedure for amending same, the trustee's powers and authorities according to the deed of trust, the rights of the debentures' holders to accelerate payment in accordance with the deed of trust, the corporation's right to perform early redemption of the debentures or a forced conversion of the debentures to other securities, and the terms of execution of such right;

- A description of the assets pledged and the type and class of such pledge, and to what extent, if any, has the issuer limited his authority to create additional pledges on his assets and to issue additional debentures;
- The value of the pledged assets shall be specified in the financial statements of the corporation;
- The guarantee that was given to secure the payment under the debentures and the name of the guarantor; and
- Details with respect to the debentures' provisions regarding the amendment, release, substitution, or termination of a pledge, guarantee, or other obligation given to secure the corporation's obligations pursuant to the debentures.

Any material interest which the trustee has in the issuer or the issuer in the trustee should be stated. In addition, specific details should be included in a prospectus, regarding the securities which could be used to purchase alternate securities (securities or shares purchasable in exchange for the offered securities), or regarding the shares whose rights could be altered by exercising a right attached to them. The Regulations also stipulate a special obligation to provide details of restrictions and undertakings with respect to capital dilution, if the alternate shares or the altered shares confer rights of participation in the issuer's surplus assets upon liquidation following repayment of his debts and paid-up capital.

Investment plans and other planned objectives for use of the proceeds expected from the offered securities and the amounts required for each use, shall be listed, stating separately the amount intended for working capital and the timetable required to achieve each such objective; the amounts should be determined in accordance with the prices on the prospectus date (the Regulations specify certain types of corporations that are exempted from providing such information, subject to certain conditions).

Methods of financing the amount which is missing to implement the objectives should be indicated, as well as the way the issuer will designate the proceeds if they are not received in full, subject to the obligation to return the amounts paid on account of the securities, as set forth in the Securities Law.[46] If a notice is included in the prospectus stating that the corporation reserves the right to alter the uses of the proceeds, or the amounts or the timetable required to achieve any or all of the objectives, then the terms under which the corporation is entitled to execute these rights, the corporate actions required to validate such change, and the manner in which such actions will be published in accordance with the corporation's articles should be detailed.

46 Securities Law, s 27(a).

If no minimum amount for the offer is specified in the prospectus, this must be indicated. If all or the majority of the proceeds to be received for the securities being offered are intended for investment in another company, or if any part of the proceeds is intended for investment in another company which thus becomes a subsidiary or an affiliated company of the issuer, the particulars required in these Regulations with respect to an affiliated company must be presented; with respect to a subsidiary, its most recent audited financial statements must be presented, as well.

As of 2004, these Regulations were amended as part of the ongoing trend to simplify and avail information to the investors, and the details regarding the description of the issuer were extensively expanded and formalised to unify the form and contents of a prospectus. This amendment introduced a number of new principles to be included in a prospectus, including forward-looking information, as opposed to past performance review only; certain reliefs in liability with regard to forward-looking information, under certain conditions, and a distinction between fields of activity in which a company is engaged, while giving a description with regard to each of them.

Explanations of the board of directors will be submitted regarding the state of the business of the corporation, the results of its activities, its shareholders' equity, and its cash flows, arranged in accordance with the provisions of the Securities Regulations (Immediate and Periodic Reports), 5730-1970 regarding the board of directors' report on the state of affairs of the corporation, mutatis mutandis, and with the exception of several provisions as set forth in the Regulations. In addition, the details regarding the exposure to market risks and their management, as stated in the Regulations of Immediate and Periodic Reports, should be submitted. The board's explanations will relate to the developments that took place in the aforesaid matters in each of the periods reflected in the financial statements presented in the prospectus, and will include a comparison between them. This provision will not apply to a banking corporation, a credit card company, or an insurer.

Pursuant to certain directives published by the Authority, certain additional information is required to be detailed as part of the board of directors' report, including the details regarding: the company's internal auditor; the company's auditor accountant's fees; the company's consent or refusal to participate in a peers' review (a review which is intended to ascertain the level of accountants in Israel and the procedures implemented during their performance of their auditing services); and critical accounting evaluation standards used by the company in its financial reports.

Certain details, regarding directors and senior officers of the issuer, as set forth in the Regulations, should be submitted. The prospectus shall contain details as to any existing agreement, undertaking, or custom, according to which the issuer pays amounts based on a proportion of its property, turnover, income, or profits.

The following information, with regard to the issuer's subsidiaries and affiliated companies shall be included in a prospectus: name of such subsidiary or affiliated company and country of its incorporation; issuer's rights in such entity, with a distinction (if any) being made between equity rights and voting rights; securities held by the issuer in such entity, which are exercisable into equity rights or into voting rights, with differentiating between securities that are immediately convertible and those that are not immediately convertible; issuer's investment in such entity, calculated as the net sum - based on the consolidated financial reports - of the total of all assets less the total of liabilities attributable to the owner of the parent company, presented in the issuer‘s consolidated financial reports, including goodwill; if the investment is made in an entity whose securities are listed for trading on a stock exchange — the stock exchange on which such entity's securities are listed for trading and the value, according to the exchange, of the issuer‘s rights in such entity; a general description of the principal fields of business of each of the issuer’s subsidiaries and affiliated companies stating their profits, before and after provision for taxes, in the two financial years that ended prior to the date of the prospectus, and the dividend, interest, and management fee received by the issuer or which it is entitled to receive from each such company with respect to the aforesaid period, and any such payment with respect to the subsequent period; to the best of the issuer’s and its management’s knowledge, the names of holders, holding on the prospectus date or on a date as close as possible thereto, more than 25 per cent of the issued share capital or of the voting power or the authority to appoint directors in the issuer’s subsidiaries and affiliated companies, and the rate of such holdings, should be specified.

If the issuer has invested, or is going to invest, in other corporation, whether in shares or loans or otherwise, 50 per cent or more of all its assets, including the proceeds of the securities being offered, the prospectus shall include, mutatis mutandis, all the details that would have been required to be included in the prospectus pursuant to the Regulations if such other corporation had issued the offered securities. This provision will not apply to an issuer offering investment grade certificates of indebtedness, the proceeds of which are designated to be invested in their entirety in debentures of an investment grade banking corporation or an insurer, and the repayment of the debentures of the banking corporation or an insurer is designated to be used for the repayment of the issued certificates of indebtedness; or an issuer offering investment grade certificates of indebtedness, all of which are to be deposited in an investment grade banking corporation or insurer, where the deposit will be used for their repayment.

For this purpose, ‘certificates of indebtedness’, are certificates issued in a series by a corporation which confer the right to claim money from such corporation, on a predetermined date or upon fulfillment of a certain condition, and which do not confer the right of membership or participation in such corporation, excluding such certificates which confer on their holder the right to convert them into securities of the corporation.

The remuneration granted to certain officers and affiliates of the issuer during the two financial years preceding the date of the prospectus, and during the period commencing on the beginning of the financial year in which the prospectus is published and ending on the date of the intermediate financial statements enclosed to the prospectus, should be specified as follows:

- Each of the top-five remuneration receivers amongst the senior office holders of the issuer or a corporation under its control, if such remuneration was granted in connection with such office holders' service in the issuer or in a corporation under its control, whether such remuneration was provided by the issuer or by another party; if a person served as a senior office holder in more than one corporation among the above-mentioned corporations, his compensation will be accumulated;
- If not listed under the above item, each of the top-three senior office holders receiving the highest remuneration from the issuer, provided such remuneration is granted in connection with their services in the issuer only; and
- A principal shareholder in the issuer, which is not listed under the above items, except for a subsidiary of the issuer, if remuneration was provided to him by the issuer or by a corporation under its control with regard to the services provided by him in the capacity of an officer of the issuer or an officer in a corporation under its control, whether an employer-employee relationship exists or not, and even in case such party of interest is not a senior office holder.

In addition the prospectus shall specify the remuneration, or obligation for remuneration, granted to anyone listed in the previous items following the date of the most recent financial statements included in the prospectus and the date of the prospectus, with regard to the publication of the prospectus.

Certain specified details must be provided, to the best of the corporation's knowledge, in relation to all transactions between the corporation and its controlling shareholder effected during the two years preceding the date of the prospectus, or still in effect on the date of the prospectus. The securities that a principal shareholder or an executive holds in the issuer, or any subsidiary or affiliated party thereof on the prospectus' date or on a date as close thereto as possible, as well as 12 months prior to the prospectus date, must be listed, to the best knowledge of the issuer and his management.

A prospectus, according to which securities of an issuer are being offered to the public for the first time, must include the issuer's annual financial statements, duly audited and prepared as of a date preceding the prospectus' date by no more than 14 months; such financial statements shall include comparative statements, as determined in the Regulations (Annual Financial Statements) - 2010. Furthermore, in certain circumstances a prospectus should include interim financial statements, including comparative figures, according to the terms and conditions set forth in the Regulations. An attorney's legal opinion shall be enclosed, confirming that the rights related to the securities being offered, as well as to other shares of the issuer or the offering party if the securities being offered are shares, have been correctly described, and that the issuer has the authority to issue the securities being offered in the manner in which they are being offered, and that the directors of the issuer or the offering party have been duly appointed and their names are included in the prospectus. The opinion shall state that the attorney has agreed in advance to include such legal opinion in the prospectus.

The prospectus shall include the professional opinion of the issuer's auditor on the issuer's audited financial statements and the audited consolidated financial statements included in the prospectus; if the issuer is required to arrange the financial statements according to the Securities Regulations, the confirmation of the auditor shall be added. As of 1 January 2008, the International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) became mandatory while the earlier adoption was only voluntary. The IFRS were applied as part of the Authority's policy, intended to integrate the Israeli capital market into the global capital markets and to increase the level of transparency and reporting standards in Israel. The opinion must state that the auditor has agreed in advance to including such opinion in the prospectus. A similar opinion must be presented by the auditor of a subsidiary whose financial statements are included in the prospectus, with respect to such financial statements.

Any report, opinion, or confirmation included in the prospectus, excluding an opinion of a lawyer and of an accountant that are included in accordance with specific provisions stated hereinabove, shall include all of the following:

- A signature of the person providing the certificate, stating his name and the date thereof;
- The prior consent of the person providing the certificate for its inclusion in the prospectus;
- If a commitment was made to indemnify the person providing the certificate, this shall be stated and details of the aforesaid indemnity provided, including the identity of the person providing the indemnity; and
- Details of the facts, assumptions, calculations, and forecasts upon which the person providing the certificate relied, and of the method used for preparing the certificate, and the reasons for choosing that particular model.

If the report, opinion, or certificate does not include all or part of the aforementioned details, the issuer must include them in the prospectus. If the date of the certificate preceded the date of publication by more than 90 days, this fact shall be stated, as well as the changes that occurred after the date of the certificate that may alter the conclusions stated in the certificate and the reasons of the issuer for including it in the prospectus notwithstanding these changes. If a very material valuation was used as the basis for determination of a reported value in a prospectus, including determination that the reported value should not be amended, the corporation shall attach the said very material valuation to the prospectus.

Excluding valuations conducted by the corporation itself, the valuation should, inter alia, reflect the following:

- Details of the corporation's organ that decided to contract the appraiser; and
- Existence of dependence between the corporation and the appraiser.[47]

Notwithstanding the regulations regarding incorporation by reference, a corporation may include in the prospectus by way of reference very material valuations that were made public by another corporation by means of an electronic filing, even though four years or more have elapsed from the date of its publication until the date of publishing the prospectus in which the reference is made, provided that the very material valuation is presented in compliance with provision detailed above.

Valuations attached to the prospectus shall include all matters listed under the Third Schedule to the Financial Reports Regulations, as well as any other material detail which is important to a reasonable investor.

If the language of the valuation is not Hebrew, the translation of the valuation into Hebrew, including a translator's certificate confirming the accuracy of the translation and his consent to include the translation and the certificate in the prospectus, shall be included in the prospectus; valuations written in English should be included in the original language. If the effective date of the valuation (the date to which the valuation refers) precedes the publication date of the prospectus by more than 90 days, the following should be stated in the prospectus:

- The period that elapsed following the effective date until the publication date of the prospectus, specifying that this period exceeds 90 days; and
- Changes that occurred following the effective date, which may alter the conclusions of the valuation, and the company's reasons for its inclusion in the prospectus despite the changes.

The Authority is authorised to exempt a corporation from including a very material valuation, in whole or in part, if it is persuaded, following the presentation of the corporation's case, that the exemption will not harm the interests of the public.

If a material valuation or a very material valuation were used to determine the value of the items in the prospectus, including a determination that there is no need to amend the value of the said items, the following details shall be provided:

47 The corporation should state its nature and clarify why the appraiser was preferred over other independent appraisers.

- Subject of the valuation (asset, obligation, transaction, capital, activity, income, or expense, as the case may be);
- Timing of the valuation;
- The value of the subject of the valuation, determined in accordance with its valuation;
- The value of the subject of the valuation immediately prior to the date of the valuation, as it would have been were generally accepted accounting principles (including depreciation and deduction), not have required the change in value in accordance with the valuation;
- The identity of the appraiser and its expertise, including education, experience in conducting valuations for accounting purposes in reporting corporations, in similar or greater scopes as the reported valuation, the dependence on the party ordering the valuation, including reference to indemnification agreements with the appraiser;
- Valuation model applied by the appraiser for the purpose of the valuation; and
- Assumptions under which the appraiser carried out the valuation, in accordance with the valuating model, including capitalisation rate, growth rate, percentage value of discard of the total value determined in the valuation (Terminal Value), standard deviation, prices used as a basis for comparison, and the bases for comparison.

The rate of commissions paid by the issuer must be stated, along with the maximum amount it undertook to pay or which it reserved the right to pay, in connection with subscription to or underwriting or distribution of the securities; the statement shall identify the parties entitled to receive such payment, and the estimated amount of all other expenses related to the securities offering and issue. Details of commissions the issuer paid or undertook to pay during the two years preceding the prospectus' date, with respect to subscription to or underwriting of any class of securities it issued, excluding those being offered, shall be provided.

The issuer shall specify all issuances of and undertakings to issue its securities, which were executed or made for consideration that was not exclusively in cash during the two years prior to the prospectus' date, stating the consideration given or to be given.

Exemptions. The Securities Authority has the right to exempt the offeror from including certain items in the prospectus if:

- In the opinion of the Securities Authority, the preservation of an offeror's trade secret justifies the non-disclosure of the item, provided such item is not one which, had it been included in the prospectus, would have deterred a reasonable investor from purchasing the securities being offered;[48] and 48 If such exemption is granted, it must be stated in the prospectus.

- The disclosure might be detrimental to the security or economy of the State of Israel or to any investigation being conducted by the Israel Police or the Securities Authority, and the Minister of Defence, or the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Police, the Chairman of the Securities Authority, or anyone authorised by any of them for such purpose, has confirmed that such disclosure could be detrimental.[49]

The draft prospectus shall include all the information that should be included in a prospectus as aforesaid; however, it does not need to include the price of the securities being offered and their quantity. An application for exemptions from the aforesaid requirements shall be submitted to the Authority together with a draft of the prospectus, and there is no obligation to include such information in the draft prospectus. The offeror has to deliver to the Authority in writing, upon its demand, any explanations, details, information, and documents in connection with the items included in the draft prospectus, or any other matter with regard to which the Authority may require clarification. The Authority has the right to demand from the offeror that a specific item in the draft prospectus be given special prominence in the prospectus in such form as the Authority shall direct.

Required Information

The Securities Authority may require the offeror to include in the prospectus the items listed below, if it believes that under those specific circumstances such items are important to a reasonable investor considering the purchase of the securities being offered:

- Any information in addition to that presented in the draft prospectus, or additional details beyond those required under the Securities Regulations enacted under Section 17 of the Securities Law;
- Particulars required under the Securities Regulations enacted pursuant to Section 17 of the Securities Law with respect to the issuer – also with respect to its subsidiary or affiliated company;
- A legal opinion relating to items in addition to those required under the Securities Regulations enacted under Section 17(b)(3) of the Securities Law;
- An opinion by an expert with respect to an evaluation or any other matter contained in the draft prospectus or in the financial statements included therein;
- Other reports or opinions, in addition to those presented in the draft prospectus; and
- After the offeror has been given proper opportunity to present his arguments, the Authority may require financial statements, opinions, or review by the 49 If the Securities Authority finds that, from the perspective of a reasonable investor considering the purchase of the offered securities, disclosure of such information is important, it will not permit publication of the prospectus.

auditor who audited or reviewed them, or by another auditor, instead of those presented in the draft prospectus if, in the Authority's opinion, such documents were not prepared in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles and generally accepted reporting standards, and they do not fairly reflect the state of the issuer's business affairs.

Publication

The Authority will grant a permit to publish the prospectus if it is satisfied that the draft prospectus complies with the provisions of the Securities Law and the Securities Authority's requirements thereunder, and all other permits as required by law have been obtained prior to its publication.

The permit shall not constitute a verification of the details presented in the prospectus nor confirm their credibility or completeness, nor does it express an opinion on the nature of the offered securities, and all these caveats should also be stated in the prospectus itself.

The draft prospectus initially presented to the Authority and the draft prospectus pursuant to which the securities will be offered to the public will be approved by the issuer's board of directors and signed by the issuer. If the securities are not being offered by the issuer, the entity offering the securities shall sign the said drafts; at least one of the designated pricing underwriters shall sign the draft of the prospectus pursuant to which the securities will be offered to the public.

The prospectus must be signed by the issuer, as well as by a majority of the members of its board of directors, provided that at least one of them is an External Director and, in case of an initial public offering - by at least one director who is not an interested party therein, other than by virtue of being a director; a director must sign personally or by means of a person authorised by him in writing to sign the prospectus on his behalf.

If there is an underwriter for the offer, the prospectus will be signed by the underwriter as well. If the securities are not being offered by the issuer, the prospectus will be signed by the offeror as well.

The Authority has the right to delay publication of the prospectus if a director has brought to the knowledge of the Authority, by written notice stating his reasons, his objection to the publication of the prospectus or he refuses to sign the prospectus, and the Authority is of the opinion that there are grounds which would enable intervention by the court had the matter been brought before it; the delay will be for 10 days commencing on the date of the Authority's decision, unless the court directs otherwise.

A prospectus which was approved for publication must be published through electronic reporting within seven days from the approval date; the prospectus must bear its publication date. In an offer to the public, as a result of which a corporation will become a reporting corporation, the offeror must, not later than one business day following the prospectus' date, file a copy of the prospectus, a copy of its approval for publication, and of the deed of trust (if applicable) with the Israeli Registrar of Companies and publish a notice in two widely distributed daily newspapers, published in Israel in Hebrew. Such notice shall not contain any misleading item.

Within the framework of a 2003 amendment to the Securities Law, the manual publication obligations, which prevailed until then, were replaced with electronic publication obligations. As a result, a draft prospectus and a prospectus whose publication has been permitted are to be filed according to the provisions of Chapter G1 of the Securities Law and the provisions of the Securities Regulations (Electronic Signature and Reporting), 5763-2003, enacted thereunder, under the Electronic Reporting — MAGNA.[50]

Post-Prospectus Date Actions

Subscriptions

A prospectus must specify the period for placing orders for the securities being offered thereunder, provided that such period will commence not earlier than 5 business days following the publication date, and will end no later than 45 days following the date on which it commences, with the exception of the period for placing orders for the securities offered pursuant to a shelf prospectus, as further detailed hereunder.[51] Notwithstanding the aforesaid, when securities being offered in the prospectus are commercial securities of a reporting corporation, the period for placing orders will commence not earlier than two business days following the date of the prospectus' publication. In addition, in a public offer made according to a shelf prospectus report, the period for submitting orders will commence no earlier than five trading hours following the date of the report's publication; 'trading hour' shall have the meaning ascribed to this term under the Securities Regulations (Shelf Prospectus Offer of Securities), 5765-2005. The Authority may shorten or extend these periods, provided it does not shorten them to a date prior to the publication of the prospectus, and provided it does not extend the period for longer than six months following the date on which the period commences. Offeror is prohibited from accepting orders placed before commencement or after the end of the period.

If the prospectus specifies a minimum amount which the offeror expects to obtain through the offer and the orders placed within the specified placing period do not amount to such minimum amount, the offeror shall refund the subscribers, within seven days following the expiration of the period for placing orders, any amount they paid on the securities account. If the placed orders exceed the total amount of the securities being offered, the offeror shall issue the securities in the manner stated in the prospectus, and publish a notice, within seven days following the expiration of the placing period, in at least two widely distributed daily newspapers published in Israel in Hebrew, with respect to such issuance of securities; the offeror shall refund the subscribers any amount they paid on account of orders which cannot be fulfilled, within two business days following the date of issuance. Funds paid by subscribers on account of securities shall be held by the offeror in a separate trust account with a banking institution and shall be invested prudently in order to preserve the principal and to produce interest, until the offeror fulfils its obligations to refund the subscribers' amounts received by it, as aforesaid (both the principal and the accrued interest), or until it is apparent that the offeror has no such obligation. At the same time, the Minister of Finance has the right, with the approval of the Knesset Finance Committee, to stipulate in regulations the manner of investing the funds received through subscriptions and the circumstances in which there will be no requirement to refund the interest. Should the offeror not fulfil its obligations to refund the amounts received through the subscription and the offeror is a corporation, the corporation's directors, jointly and severally, will be liable to the subscribers for any amount not refunded to them, excluding a director who took all appropriate means to ensure the fulfillment of such obligations.

Foreign Corporations

In addition to the various types of relief included in the rules of dual listing for trading in Israel of securities of an Israeli corporation which are listed for trading on a stock exchange abroad (an Israeli corporation which securities are listed for trading on a stock exchange abroad, hereinafter: the 'foreign corporation'), as set forth above, various types of relief were also determined within these rules, with regard to the prospectus of a foreign corporation.

In this respect, the rules of dual listing determine that the Authority may exempt from any or all of the provisions relating to the details to be contained in the prospectus, its structure and form a corporation that was incorporated in Israel, the securities of which are being offered to the public in Israel, if securities of the said corporation are listed for trading on the following stock exchanges: NYSE, AMEX, or on the regulated market NASDAQ and NASDAQ Global Market, the NASDAQ Capital Market, or on the London Stock Exchange's Main Market (Official list of the United Kingdom Listing Authority), Primary Listing, or if they shall be listed thereupon immediately after publication of the prospectus, should the Authority deem fit to grant such an exemption under the circumstances. The Authority may condition the exemption upon certain conditions.

Trading Securities of Foreign Corporation

Listing for trading on a stock exchange of securities of a foreign corporation may be pursuant to a listing document, if the foreign corporation complies with the preliminary threshold requirements for listing for trading under the rules of dual listing set forth above. The listing document will include two parts. The first part will include details regarding the following matters:[52]

- Details of the corporation — the name of the corporation, the fact that the corporation was incorporated in Israel and the date of incorporation, the types of securities issued by the corporation and the place where they are listed for trading, and their ticker symbol on the stock exchanges on which they are listed for trading; if the securities are partially listed for trading - the amount listed for trading of each class; the stock exchange abroad where the securities, which the corporation wishes to list for trading on the stock exchange in Israel, are listed; and the date on which they were initially listed for trading; details about the corporation, including the name and details of the person in the corporation who is responsible to maintain the contact between the corporation and the entity in charge of supervision or enforcement of the foreign law, and the name and details of the contact person in the corporation for contact with the Authority;
- Description of the shares of the corporation — the number of shares and the par value of each share, details as to whether the shares are registered or to bearer, the class of shares and the main rights attached to them, including with respect to dividend or redemption. In addition, it will be specified whether the shares entitle to participate in a distribution of full dividend or bonus shares, which will be declared after the date of the listing document and, if they do not entitle, the date of the commencement of such participation and its percentage;
- Description of convertible securities — if the securities that the corporation wishes to list for trading on the stock exchange enable the purchase of securities by way of conversion of the offered securities, the listing document shall include the following items: the securities to be issued upon conversion together with the consideration determined; the dates for submitting the conversion demand; the procedures for the conversion; and the dates on which the rights of the converted securities will expire and the rights of the securities that replace them will commence; and
- Description of bonds — If the securities that the corporation wishes to list for trading on the stock exchange are bonds or rights to purchase same, the listing document shall include the following items: the total par value of the bond series; the par value of each bond; whether the bonds are registered or to bearer; the rate of interest, the base and the terms of linkage of the principal, or the interest on the bonds (if any); the par value of the bonds in circulation, which will be re-valued in accordance with the terms of the linkage on the date of the listing document or on a date as close to it as possible (if the bonds can be re-valued under various terms, the revaluation will be made in accordance with the terms of the bonds that give the highest possible amount); the redemption dates for the bonds; the exchange rights attached to the bonds; if a guarantee was given for payment of the undertakings under the bonds, the name of the guarantor and the nature of the guarantee for the undertaking; and the name of the trustee for the bonds and the main points of the trust agreement.

The second part must include the following documents:

- The most recent annual report (termed: the 'periodic report') published or submitted by the corporation or which it was obligated to publish or submit under the foreign law, if it was already subject to such obligation;
- A document used for an offer of the securities of a corporation, published or submitted during the year preceding the year of the periodic report included in the listing document as stated above or on a date later than the date of the periodic report. A corporation whose securities were listed for trading on a foreign stock exchange and which is not yet subject to an obligation to publish or submit a periodic report will submit the document that was used for the initial offer of its securities to the public abroad;
- Any other report or notice published or submitted by the corporation or which it was required to publish or submit, under the foreign law, during the period after the publication of the periodic report or the last document as stated above by the date of the listing document; and
- Should a document included in the second part incorporate another document by way of reference, such other document will be attached.

In case of a corporation whose securities are listed for trading on the London Stock Exchange, the second part will also include the most recent prospectus used for the offering of the corporation's securities to the public, which was approved by the English securities authority, or a later report, which includes disclosures similar to those disclosed in such approved prospectus, approved by such authority. Documents originally published or submitted by the corporation in English may be included in the listing document in their original language.

Furthermore, details included in the documents published or submitted by the corporation under foreign law pursuant to the second part of the listing document do not need to be included in its first part. The listing document will include a notice that the stock exchange agreed to list for trading on it the securities underlying the listing document.

Manner of Performing the Listing for Trading

The foreign corporation will submit the listing document to the Authority, the Registrar of Companies, and the Stock Exchange, and it will publish a notice with this regard, within one business day following the date of it being submitted, in at least two widely distributed, daily newspapers, published in Israel in Hebrew according to article 55B of the Securities Law.[53] The Authority may instruct the foreign corporation to distribute copies of the listing document in such places and in such quantities determined by it under its discretion.

The securities offered pursuant to the listing document will be listed for trading on the stock exchange on a date not prior to the third day of trading following the listing document submission date, as stated hereinabove, and not later than one month following the date of its submission.

If, during this period, the foreign corporation was required to submit reports or notices in accordance with the reporting obligations applicable to a foreign corporation (as will be set forth below), and if the offered securities were listed for trading on the stock exchange within the said period, these documents will also be submitted not later than the date of commencement of trading of the corporation's securities on the stock exchange.[54]

The foreign corporation will submit to the Authority, in writing, at its demand or at the demand of an employee so authorised, within the period that will be determined, any explanation, details, information, or documents in connection with any item included in the listing document or which is required pursuant to foreign law. The Authority or the employee so authorised by it may contact the entity in charge of supervision or enforcement of the foreign law prior to addressing such foreign corporation.[55] Should the Authority or the employee so authorised by it be convinced that the corporation was unable to submit a report or notice as stated on the date determined, they may extend the date for the submission. In this case, the provisions of the Securities Law would apply relating to an order of the Court in connection with the submission of the reports,[56] and relating to the instruction of the Authority of the cessation of trading in the securities of the corporation,[57] *mutatis mutandi*s.

Stay of Proceedings in an Action in Israel

Should an action be brought before an Israeli court pursuant to any law, in connection with the securities of a foreign corporation ("a connection with the securities " is defined in the Securities Law as ownership, holding, purchase or sale), the court may, at the request of any litigant, stay the proceedings in such action, if it is satisfied that a suit has been brought to a court outside Israel regarding the same or similar cause of action, until an unappealable judgment is granted in the said suit.[58]

Delisting

If, within a year of having been listed on a stock exchange, the securities of a foreign corporation have been delisted from a foreign stock exchange, the same shall also be delisted from the Stock Exchange two months after the delisting from the foreign exchange, unless the corporation has published, during the said two months, a prospectus under which the said securities shall be listed for trade on a stock exchange.

Should the securities of the corporation be de-listed from the stock exchange as stated, and should its securities be held by the public, then the foreign corporation will be subject to the periodic and immediate reporting obligations in accordance with the provisions of the Securities Law as set forth below, as long as its securities are held by the public.[59]

A foreign corporation may request that its securities which are listed for trading on the stock exchange in Israel be de-listed from the said exchange, provided that it gave notice of its intention to do so in an immediate report submitted at least three months prior to the requested delisting date, and provided that it published a notice of the requested delisting in two widely distributed, daily newspapers, published in Israel in Hebrew according to article 55B of the Securities Law, within one business day from the date of the submission of the report.[60]

A foreign corporation shall be entitled to request delisting of its securities as long as the securities of the corporation are listed for trading on a foreign stock exchange and as long as the trading of the same securities has not been suspended, or as long as the foreign stock exchange has not announced its intention to suspend the trading of or to de-list the same securities. In case of delisting due to a foreign corporation's request, any reporting obligations pursuant to the Securities Law will not apply to such foreign corporation, effective from the date of the delisting of its securities from the stock exchange in Israel.[61]

Shelf Prospectus

In General

As of 2004, an amendment was introduced to the Securities Law, as well as new regulations promulgated thereunder, intended to be a form of relief for traded 58 Securities Law, s 35Z.

59 Securities Law, s 35AA.
60 Securities Law, s 35BB.
61 Securities Law, s 35BB.

companies which are interested to raise further capital in a swifter manner than the then prevailing manner. Pursuant to this amendment, a person may offer securities in accordance with a prospectus, on several occasions, at various times ('shelf prospectus'), in accordance with the provisions of the Law and regulations.

An offer to the public of securities in accordance with a shelf prospectus can be made within 24 months of its date of publication.[62] Notwithstanding the above, an offer to the public of commercial notes (securities issued by a corporation, which are an undertaking of the corporation to pay the holder a sum of money, on a date that is not earlier than seven days from the date of the offer and is not later than a year from the aforesaid date, and which cannot be exercised for, or converted into, other securities), in accordance with a shelf prospectus that includes only the details that should be included in a prospectus for an offer of commercial papers of a reporting corporation, must be made within 12 months of the date of publication of the shelf prospectus.

If the Authority discovers, following the grant of the permit to publish a shelf prospectus, that any of the requirements determined by the Minister of Finance with regard to an offer of securities in accordance with a shelf prospectus, were not fulfilled at the time the permit was granted as aforesaid, or that they subsequently ceased to be fulfilled, the Authority may, after giving the offeror an opportunity to state its case before it, order that no further securities shall be offered under the shelf prospectus, or it may condition the continued offering of securities thereunder upon such terms as it shall stipulate. A shelf prospectus shall indicate that an offer of securities pursuant to it will be carried out according to a shelf offer report, which will detail the specific details of each offer.

The structure and essence of the Shelf Prospectus are quite similar, mutatis mutandis, to the ordinary Prospectus, and include chapters such as offering details, the company's share capital, the terms and conditions of the offering of the company's securities, description of the corporation's business, board of directors, interested parties, financial statements etc. In 2012 the Authority published a proposed uniform sample chapter of securities offering under a shelf prospectus, for the purpose of improving and streamlining the processing of requests for a permit to publish a prospectus. Such uniform sample is intended to be adopted by all issuers as the basis for the chapter regarding the offered securities in their prospectus, further amended to reflect the specifics of each particular offering. On the date of this publication, the said proposal has not yet been adopted under the Israeli law.

Requirements for Offer under Shelf Prospectus

The offer of securities according to a shelf prospectus is permitted, provided that the issuer is a reporting corporation (a corporation which is subject to the reporting provisions of the Securities Law, and which has not obtained an exemption therefrom) and a 12-month period has elapsed following its previous public offer of securities pursuant to a prospectus, or, if the issuer is a foreign corporation (as defined hereinabove), to which Chapter E3 of the Securities Law applies, 12-months have elapsed from the date its securities were registered for trade outside of Israel, provided that none of the following occurs:[63]

- During the shorter of (i) a 36-month period, prior to an application for a prospectus publication permit, or (ii) the period following the date a corporation became a reporting corporation, or (iii) in the case of a foreign corporation – the period following the date on which Chapter E3 of the Securities Law has been applied to it, it came to the attention of the Authority that requirements regarding reporting obligations applicable to such corporation have not been fulfilled, all or in part or such corporation was convicted of an offence, under the Law, related to the breach of applicable reporting obligations, or a court ruled against it in connection with the aforesaid – in civil proceedings;
- During a 36-month period, prior to the publication of a prospectus, an officer of the corporation was found to have breached certain reporting obligations under the Securities Law, or has been ruled against in connection to same by a court of law in a civil proceeding; and
- If a corporation is a foreign corporation to which Chapter E3 of the Securities Law applies – during the earlier of (i) a 36-months period prior to the prospectus permit date, or (ii) within the period commencing on the date of listing for trade of its securities on a stock exchange outside of Israel, it was determined by the party in charge of enforcement of the securities law in the state where the foreign stock exchange is located and the securities of the foreign corporation are traded, that the corporation is not authorised to offer securities by means similar to a shelf prospectus.

At the beginning of 2012 the Securities Authority published a proposal to amend the Law in order to regulate the mechanism of offering securities during their trade on the Stock Exchange (‘on the floor’). The Authority proposes a new model of offering of securities to the public, in addition to existing models such as Shelf Prospectus, which is based on the U.S. “At the Market Offering” model (the “mechanism of the ATM”). According to this mechanism, companies shall be allowed to sell securities on the secondary market during trading, in quantities and prices as will be determined by them based on current market prices and demand. The goal of the proposed mechanism of ATM is to improve the market efficiency and add another effective tool for raising capital and debt. Todate, companies usually issue securities to the public through uniform proposal formats, where the price of the securities being offered is determined in a tender. According to the mechanism of the ATM however, there shall be no tender, but rather the company shall by itself or through a financial intermediary on its behalf, be able to offer securities directly to investors in the secondary market, during trade on the stock exchange, in quantities and at prices determined by it. According to the proposed mechanism of the ATM, the company may adopt an "ATM Plan" which would be consummated in the following manner: the company will publish a Shelf Prospectus report, and specify in it its intention to use the ATM mechanism to sell securities during trading and also specify the details of the ATM Plan. These details will include the period of the ATM Plan (not to exceed 90 days) during which the company could sell securities as well as the class and amount of securities that the company may offer under the ATM Plan. Following the publication of a Shelf Prospectus report containing the said details, the company shall be entitled to offer the securities in the course of trading on the Stock Exchange during the ATM Plan period at such sales volumes and prices as it shall determine at any time, without any prior notice to the public. The Authority also proposed certain restrictive conditions for the mechanism of ATM, which, inter alia, include the following: (1) publishing of a Shelf Prospectus as well as a of Shelf Prospectus report as described above, (2) obligation to enter into an agreement with an underwriter, (3) prohibition of marketing the securities thirty days prior to and within the period of the ATM Plan, (4) prohibitions on a company, its controlling shareholder and insiders, as defined in the Law, from effecting any transaction in the securities, (5) transactions under the ATM Plan are permitted during the course of trading on the Stock Exchange only, (6) demand for filing of an immediate report on each day of sales pursuant to the ATM Plan; (7) limitations of daily volume of sales etc. As of the date of this publication, such new ATM mechanism has not yet been adopted.

Shelf Offer Report

If the offeror wishes to offer securities in accordance with a shelf prospectus, it shall submit to the Authority a report concerning the offer ('shelf offer report'); this provision will not apply to an offer of securities in accordance with a shelf prospectus if all of its details, including the period for placing orders thereunder, were determined in the shelf prospectus on its date of publication.

A shelf offer report shall be submitted not later than five trading hours prior to the commencement date for placing orders and it shall be deemed published immediately with its submission. A shelf offer report shall include any material change or new detail that occurred regarding any matter, which has to be described in a shelf prospectus, and the offeror may incorporate such information by way of reference. In addition, the shelf offer report shall include the following details, if relevant to the offer:

- The securities being offered and their percentage out of the voting rights and out of the issued and paid share capital post issuance, as well as on a fully diluted basis;
- The amount of securities offered;

- The interest rate and index rate terms that the securities being offered will bear;
- The date of execution or conversion of the securities being offered;
- The price of the securities and the conditions of payment; and
- The period for placing orders.

A shelf offer report shall be deemed a prospectus, and the statements in the report shall be deemed, as of the date of its publication, an integral part of the shelf prospectus. Notwithstanding the above, the publication of a shelf offer report does not require a permit from the Authority under the Securities Law.

Registration for Trade

In General

Any registration for trade is subject to the approval of the Board of Directors of the Stock Exchange as stipulated in the Regulations and, inter alia, fulfilling the following conditions:

- All shares in the issued share capital of the company must be fully paid;
- The company's documents of incorporation may not limit the transferability of the securities listed for trade;
- There must be appropriate dispersal of the securities, whether with respect to public holdings or with respect to the breakdown of holdings, all as stipulated in the directives of the Board of Directors of the Stock Exchange;
- The company's articles of association must specify that voting at the general meetings will be by way of counting votes; and
- The company must undertake to comply with the Stock Exchange's Regulations and the Stock Exchange Board of Directors' directives thereunder, as amended from time to time and to the extent they relate to registered companies.[64]

The offeror of securities to the public may increase the amount offered to the public in a scope that will not exceed the proportion determined in the directives (termed: the 'additional amount'), when the demand for the securities at the price that was determined in a tender exceeds the amount offered in the tender, provided that the following conditions are satisfied:

- The additional amount will be issued at the price determined in the tender;
- The potential for increasing the amount being offered to the public, and the conditions under which the amount would be increased were specified in the prospectus;

64 Stock Exchange Regulations, ss 63A–69.

- The additional amount will be of units of a composition identical to that offered to the public in the tender; and
- The additional amount will be issued to offerees that submitted applications for the purchase of securities in the tender at the price determined in the tender or at a price higher than the price determined in the tender.

The additional amount will not be included in the determination of the price, even if it is necessary to determine a price that is lower than that determined in the tender, for the purpose of achieving a minimum spread.[65] The Stock Exchange Board of Directors has the right to stipulate in the directives additional terms for registration for trade, relating to the following issues:

- The number of classes or series of convertible securities registered for trade per company;
- Lock-up of securities held by a shareholder or type of shareholders for a period and at a percentage to be determined, provided the period shall not exceed three years following the date of registration for trade;
- Regulation of trading for a limited period, including immediately following the registration for trade, as stipulated in the directives;
- Registration for trade in various commercial groups and various trading methods;
- Limiting the quantity of subscriptions to securities registered for trade, or to issue units including various types of securities, restricting the percentage of the subscriptions or restricting the allocation per subscriber; and
- The period within which the subscription funds may be deposited.

The Board of Directors of the Stock Exchange may approve the listing for trading of securities in respect of which rules of listing were not determined pursuant to the Stock Exchange rules, provided that the terms of the said securities are similar to those of the securities in respect of which rules for listing for trading were determined. Such approval is subject to compliance of the securities whose listing is requested with the conditions set forth in the Stock Exchange rules for securities that are similar to them, *mutatis mutan*dis, as the Board of Directors will determine.

The Stock Exchange Board of Directors has the right, in special circumstances, not to approve registration for trade, or to condition the registration, even if all requirements under the Regulations have been fulfilled, provided that such decision is adopted by a majority of at least 75 per cent of the members of the Stock Exchange Board of Directors participating in the meeting, and provided that the company has been given due opportunity to present its position to the Board of Directors in writing.

Registration for Trade of Securities of Companies whose Shares Are Not Registered for Trade

In General

As mentioned above, the share capital of the company shall consist of one class of shares only, conferring equal voting rights with respect to par value excluding special State shares.[66] Nothing in this provision shall be construed as prohibiting a company from issuing preference shares, provided that one year has lapsed since the shares were first listed for trade.

All shares of a new company's share capital shall be registered for trade, excluding a company to which the Law of Encouragement of Industry (Taxes), 1969, applies and a company whose share capital includes special shares of the State of Israel, subject to limitations stipulated in the Stock Exchange directives.[67] A new company whose most recent financial statements included in its application are annual statements or interim three-month statements, shall comply with all or certain of the following conditions, as specified in the directives, as follows:

- The company must have completed certain periods of activity, as specified in the directives, in the field of business in which it is engaged, and in which it has stated that it intends to continue to engage following its registration for trade;
- The extent of the activity and equity capital prior to registration for trade shall not be less than the amounts specified in the directives;[68] and
- The equity capital following registration for trade shall not be less than the amount specified in the directives.

A new company that desires to register shares for trade, whose most recent financial statements included in the application are interim statements for six or nine months, must comply with the aforesaid conditions, subject to limitations to be stipulated in the directives.

The value and percentage of the public's holdings shall not be less than those specified in the directives. The ratio between options of any class and shares offered to the public shall not be less than the ratio between options of such class and shares issued before registration for trade.

66 Securities Law, s 46b.
67 Stock Exchange Regulations, ch J.
68 The Stock Exchange Regulations stipulate for that purpose a number of rules according to which the income, expenditures, profits, and added value will be calculated.

Further Conditions

The Stock Exchange Board of Directors may stipulate in the directives additional conditions for registering a new company for trade, in general or for each series separately, as to the following:

- Specification of classes of securities that may be registered for trade;
- Overall minimum value at the time of registration;
- The minimum share that will be held by the public and the dispersal rate thereof immediately following the registration;
- The percentage of public holdings immediately following the registration for trade if shares are registered for trade together with convertible securities; and
- The maximum number of classes or series.

Various rules may be stipulated in relation to the above, taking into account the characteristics of the company, the extent of the offering, and the classes of securities registered for trade.

The condition precedent for the listing of a new company spun off from a listed company, as part of a spin-off process, is that the percentage of public holdings in the listed company and the value of the public holdings in the listed company following the spin-off will not be less than those set forth in the directives.

The abovementioned rules also apply, subject to modifications to be stipulated in the directives, to registration for trade of a foreign company and of a company whose securities are registered for trade or are traded outside Israel.

Registration for Trade of Securities of Companies Whose Shares Are Registered for Trade

In General

As mentioned above, any additional share offering to the public following the initial offering must be made of shares with the most preferential voting rights.[69] The ratio between options of all kinds and shares offered to the public shall not be less than the ratio between options of such class and the shares issued before registration for trade.[70]

The Stock Exchange Board of Directors has the right to stipulate in the directives additional conditions for registration for trade of the shares of a registered company, in general or for each series separately, as follows:

- Specifications of classes of securities that may be registered for trade;
- The overall minimum value at the time of registration;

69 Securities Law, s 46B.
70 Stock Exchange Regulations, ch K.

- The minimum share that will be held by the public and the dispersal rate thereof immediately following the registration;
- The percentage of public holdings immediately following the registration for trade if shares are registered for trade together with convertible securities; and
- The maximum number of classes or series.

Various rules may be stipulated in this respect, taking into account the characteristics of the company, the extent of the offering, and the classes of securities registered for trade.

A registered company whose share capital consists of only one class of shares may issue only shares of the class registered for trade; should the registered company have various classes of shares, whether all of them or only a part thereof are registered for trade, any additional issuance shall be of the shares conferring the most preferential voting rights.

A registered company shall not issue shares or convertible securities unless the Stock Exchange Board of Directors approves that the shares or the security derived from the conversion may be registered for trade. The value and percentage of the public's holdings shall not be less than those stipulated in the directives.

Other Requirements

Shares and convertible securities of a registered company which are not registered for trade shall not be registered for trade and shall not be traded outside Israel, unless approval is granted by the Stock Exchange Board of Directors according to rules to be stipulated in the directives.

The offer by way of rights shall be of a type of shares permitted to be offered to the public, as provided above, and registered for trade, or of a convertible security which must be of a type permitted to be offered to the public and is registered for trade.

The Stock Exchange Board of Directors has the right to stipulate directives with respect to the method of calculating of the bonus component, timetable for the offering, trade of rights, manner of utilising the rights, and the trade in the securities registered for trade when the rights are offered.

To the extent it is required for proper trading procedures, or proper management of the Stock Exchange, the Stock Exchange Board of Directors has the right to condition the registration for trade of shares or convertible securities, offered by way of rights, upon including same also in a public offering.

Private Offering of Securities of Listed Company

Both under the Companies Law and under the Securities Regulations, legislative arrangements have been determined regulating a private offering of securities of a public company or of a listed company, as will be reviewed below.

Substantial Private Offering — Companies Law

Special Approval for Substantial Private Offering. The Companies Law incorporates a special arrangement concerning a substantial private offering as defined below, within the section contemplating transactions with interested parties.[71]

The following private placements must be deemed a substantial private offering, provided that the transaction does not harm the best interests of the company, and shall be subject to the approval of the board of directors and the general meeting of shareholders:

- An offering which provides 20 per cent or more of the total effective voting rights in the company before the issuance, provided that all or part of proceeds of such offering are not in cash or in securities listed for trading on the stock exchange or are not at market conditions, and as a result of which, the holdings of a principal shareholder (a person holding five per cent or more of the company's issued share capital or the voting rights in the company) in the company's securities will increase, or as a result of which a person shall become a company's principal shareholder following the issuance ('interested party').
- An offering as a result of which a person shall become a controlling shareholder of the company (a person with the ability to direct the company's activity, except for an ability deriving solely from acting as a director or an officer of the company. A person shall be deemed to be a controlling shareholder of a company if he holds half or more of a certain type of means of control of the company, as well as a person holding 25 per cent or more of the voting rights in the general meeting of the company's shareholders if there is no other person that holds more than 50 per cent of the voting rights in the company).

For this purpose, all private offerings conforming to one or more of the following requirements, shall be deemed a single private offering:

- They were made during a period of 12 consecutive months to the same offeree or anyone on its behalf, its relative, a corporation under its control or its relative's control and, if the offeree is a corporation – also to the controlling shareholders of the offeree, to the relative of the controlling shareholder and to a corporation under the control of the controlling shareholder or its relative;
- They were made during a period of 12 consecutive months, and in all of them consideration was determined in the same asset. For this purpose, different securities of one company shall be deemed as the same asset; or
- They constitute part of one transaction or they are conditional upon one another.

71 Companies Law, 5759-1999, ss 268–284.

For the purpose of determining market conditions, as set forth above, an offering shall be deemed reflecting market conditions if the board of directors resolved, based on detailed reasons, that the offer is at market conditions, unless proven otherwise. For the purpose of holdings, as set forth above, securities convertible or exercisable into shares, which are held by a person or which will be issued to a person pursuant to a private offering shall be deemed converted or exercised.

Special Exemption. The regulations granting relief to companies whose securities are listed for trading on a stock exchange outside Israel[72] provide a special exemption, under which the approvals required for a substantial private offering, will not apply to a public company whose shares have been offered only to the public outside Israel or which are listed for trading only on a stock exchange outside Israel.

Private Offering of Securities in Listed Company. Regulations of a private offering of securities in a listed company[73] which were enacted in 2000 deal with all requirements, various acts, and reporting aspects required in respect of a private offering of securities in a listed company, while categorically distinguishing between an exceptional private offering and a substantial private offering as specified below.

Private Offering and Exceptional Private Offering. A private offering is an offering to issue securities of a listed company other than a public offering. The total of all of the private offerings satisfying either of the following will be deemed one private offering:

- They were made during a period of 12 consecutive months, and they satisfy one of the following: (i) the offerings are to the same offeree or to someone on his behalf, his relative, a corporation controlled by him, or controlled by his relative; when the offeree is a corporation — also to the controlling shareholder of the offeree, a relative of the controlling shareholder, or a corporation controlled by the controlling shareholder or controlled by his relative; or (ii) they stipulate consideration in rights in the same asset and different securities of one corporation will be deemed the same asset; or
- They constitute part of a single transaction or they are conditional upon one another.

An exceptional private offering is:

- A private offering of securities that grants 20 per cent or more of the total of all the actual voting rights in the company before the offering; for this purpose, securities that may be converted into, or exercised for, shares that will be issued under the private offering will be deemed to have been converted or exercised; or

- A private offering to: (i) a director or general manager or to a person who will become a controlling shareholder subsequent to the offering, which grants 20 per cent or more of the effective voting rights in the company prior to the issuance, the proceeds of which, in part or in whole, are not in cash or in securities listed for trading on the stock exchange or which are not at market terms, and as a result of which (i) the holdings of a principal shareholder (as defined hereinabove) will increase or (ii) a person will become a principal shareholder following the issuance.

Approval of Listing for Trading. A private offering of securities of a listed company requires the approval of a stock exchange in Israel, in accordance with its rules, to list for trading the securities that will be issued under such offering or securities deriving from the conversion or exercise of the securities that will be issued thereunder.

Notice of Exceptional Private Offering. If the board of directors of a listed company resolves to effect an exceptional private offering, the company will give notice, within 14 days following such resolution, specifying its details and the convening of a general meeting, if one is required for approving the offering, by the following three methods:

- Filing an immediate report concerning the transaction (in this section, termed: the 'offering report', or 'report'), as specified below;
- Publication of a notice incorporating certain pre-defined details, in at least two widely distributed daily newspapers published in Israel in Hebrew (the company may publish the notice in any additional manner as it finds fit, including via the Internet and is also required to include information of convening the general meeting on its web-site, if any), on the date of filing the transaction report or on the next business day.
- Forwarding the transaction report by registered mail to a shareholder who is entitled to vote at the general meeting, at his request.

If the offering constitutes an event or a matter deviating from the ordinary course of business of the corporation, by virtue of its nature, scope, or likely outcome, and which has or is likely to have a substantial impact on the corporation, or which is likely to substantially affect the price of the corporation's securities, an immediate report will also be submitted in accordance with the Periodic and Immediate Reports Regulations,[74] as specified below.

Offering Report. The offering report will include any and all details relating to the offering and likely to be of significance to a reasonable investor or a reasonable shareholder for the purpose of voting at the general meeting, including:

- Name of offeree; if the offeree is a corporation and an interested party — its name and a breakdown of holdings of the controlling shareholder in the offeree;
- If the offeree is an interested party, specification of the facts by virtue of which he is an interested party;
- The terms of the securities proposed to be issued, the number thereof, and the proportion in percentage which they will constitute of the voting rights and of the issued and paid-up share capital of the company after the issuance as well as on a fully diluted basis;
- The fair value of the securities convertible or exercisable into shares, stating the manner and the formula for determining the fair value and the assumptions serving as the basis thereof;
- If the offering is part of a transaction, the transaction will be described; in the event the offeree is an office holder or an interested party and the offering is made as part of his reward, the offering report shall include the details specified in the Sixth Supplement to the Periodic and Immediate Reports Regulations, in addition to those specified in the Private Offering Regulations;
- The company's issued share capital, the amount and the percentage of the offeree's and of company's interested parties' holdings and the total holdings of the other shareholders in the company's issued and paid-up share capital and voting rights, as follows: prior to the issuance; following the issuance; in the event of convertible securities — following the issuance and assuming that the offeree will convert and exercise the securities issued to him under the offering; following the issuance, assuming that all existing and offered securities exercisable or convertible into company's shares will be converted and exercised;
- The consideration for the securities being offered, according to the specification required below (consideration in cash, consideration by waiver of liability, consideration by securities or whole or a substantial part of a corporation's activity, consideration in the form of a corporation's activity which does not amount to the substantial activity of such corporation, consideration in several assets, or consideration in another asset — all as specified below);
- The manner in which the consideration has been determined;
- The name of every principal shareholder or officer in the company who has, to the best knowledge of the company, a personal interest in the consideration, and the nature of his personal interest;
- If the securities being offered are shares — the average price of share during the six months preceding the date of publishing the offering report will be specified, taking into account any distribution, split, or issue of rights, and the share's price immediately before the resolution of the board of directors concerning the offering as well as immediately before publication of the report; If they are option warrants — the price of the option warrant will be specified if option warrants of the same series are listed for trading on the stock exchange, and the share's price, immediately before the board of directors' resolution concerning the offering as well as immediately prior to publication of the report; If they are bonds convertible into shares — the average price of the bonds during the three months preceding the date of publishing the offering report will be specified, and if bonds of the same series are listed for trading on the stock exchange, the prices of the bond and the share immediately before the board of directors' resolution concerning the offering as well as immediately before publishing the report; and if securities of the same series are listed for trading on the Stock Exchange — the proportion in percents between the price of the securities being offered and the stock exchange price of securities of the same series immediately before publishing the report will be specified;

- A breakdown of the investment plans and other designated use of proceeds of the offered securities, when the consideration is in cash; the company's plans in respect of the acquired asset will be specified where the consideration is not in cash;
- A breakdown of written and verbal agreements, between the offerees and shareholders in the company or between all or any of the offerees, between themselves or between them and others, concerning the purchase or sale of securities of the listed company or in respect of voting rights therein, to the best knowledge of the company, following examination it has conducted in this respect with the offerees and specifying the inspections it has conducted;
- Required approvals or conditions determined for the implementation of the issuance under the offering; whether such approvals or conditions were accepted or satisfied and, if not, the date, on which they are expected to be accepted or implemented;
- Specification of a limitation or restriction on performing actions with the securities being offered, which are applicable to the offeree pursuant to the regulations of a stock exchange in Israel, under any law or pursuant to an undertaking assumed by the offeree, to the best knowledge of the company;
- The board of directors' grounds for the approval of the private offering, the value determined for the securities being offered, and the value of the consideration for such securities, as well as the names of the directors who took part in the discussion of the board of directors concerning the approval of the offering, indicating those of them who are external directors of the company;
- The date of issuance of the securities;
- Venue for convening the general meeting, if required, the date for the meeting, the required majority for such meeting, the date for determining the entitlement of the shareholders to vote at the general meeting, and the number of shares constituting the proportion of the total voting rights, if determined, in the regulations promulgated pursuant to Section 89(3) of the Companies Law or the value of shares if determined in the said regulations;

- If the company has determined that an adjourned meeting will take place on a date later than one week following the date of convening the first meeting, such date will be stated;
- The fact that instructions given by the Authority or by an employee authorised by it, to provide explanations, details, information, and documents relating to the offering underlying the report, or instructions to amend the report in such manner and on such date as designated by the Authority, may delay the convening of the general meeting; and
- Details of the company's representative to attend to the report, including his office address and telephone and facsimile numbers.

A form of the voting card, as defined in the Companies Law[75] will be enclosed to the offering report. The report shall be signed by the company, specifying the names of the undersigned and their title. The cover of the report will designate, inter alia, the following details: the company's name, the offeree's name, in the event that the offeree is an interested party, the facts by virtue of which he is an interested party.

Newspaper Publication. As of 2008, following enactment of the Securities Regulations (Publication of Newspaper Notices) 2008, the requirement for certain details, to be included in a newspaper publication, was changed to include materially less details. The said requirement was replaced by reference to the electronic report published by the corporation on the same matter, which enables to receive additional information with respect to the subject matter. These Regulations require that only the following details shall be provided:

- The name of the reporting entity;
- The type of the reported event;
- Reference to an electronic report which enables to receive additional information with respect to the subject matter; and
- Important dates which are essential to the investor, if any, including the dates of a shareholders' meeting convened for purpose of approval of the subject matter or the dates of approval of a purchase offer.

Perusal and Forwarding of Documents. The company will make available to a shareholder, at his request, at such place as it will designate and subject to the provisions of any law, a copy of any document relating to an exceptional private offering, including the documents presented to the board of directors within the procedures of discussion and adoption of a resolution in this regard.

75 Companies Law, s 75.

The company will transfer to a shareholder, at his request, and subject to the provisions of any law, a copy of the said documents as well as a copy of the offering report and may charge him with reasonable costs in respect of photocopying and transfer.

Consideration in Cash. In the event that all or any part of the consideration for the securities being offered under an exceptional private offering is in cash, the report will specify the sum, the dates of payment and the terms of payment that are determined; if the company or an interested party therein has granted the offeree, whether directly or indirectly, a loan for the purchase of the securities being offered, the report will specify the details of the loan, including due dates, securities, and terms of linkage and interest.

Consideration by Waiver of Liability. In the event that all or any part of the consideration for the securities being offered under an exceptional private offering is by waiver of liability, the details of the liability and the waiver will be described in the report.

Consideration in Securities or in Corporation's Activities. In the event that all or any part of the consideration for the securities being offered under an exceptional private offering is in the form of a corporation's securities or the transfer of all or a substantial part of the activities of a corporation (termed: the 'corporation'), the report shall include:

- The description of the corporation in respect of the period commencing two years prior to January 1st of the year in which the report is submitted and ending immediately before the date of the report or the amended report, as the case may be, in accordance with the breakdown specified in the outline, to the extent that any matter specified in the report involves the corporation and is material for the corporation's activities or operations;
- Financial statements as stated in the paragraph below will be enclosed to the report; and
- Explanations of the offering company's board of directors to the enclosed financial statements, in accordance with the outline.

Financial Statements. The corporation's financial statements, to be enclosed to the offering report (termed: the 'financial statements'), shall include the details as required by the applicable Regulations with regard to financial statements included in a prospectus,[76] mutatis mutandis, and the following shall apply:

- Annual and interim financial statements will be prepared in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles and shall also include disclosure provisions set forth in the Financial Statements Regulations and Periodic and Immediate Reports Regulations, as the case may be;

76 Securities Law Regulations (Details, Structure and Form of Prospectus and Draft Prospectus), 1969, sec 56.

- The financial statements shall be audited or reviewed, as the case may be;
- A report of the accounting auditor or the review report, as the case may be, will be incorporated in the offering report, and will state that the two abovementioned conditions are met, and that the person that prepared such statements or report has given his prior approval for the inclusion of this information in the report;
- In the event that the language of the financial statements (including the auditing or the review reports) is not Hebrew, a translation of the reports into Hebrew and the translator's confirmation in respect of the accuracy of the translation and his consent to the inclusion of the translation and confirmation in the report should be included in the report; and
- In the event that the currency of the financial statements is not NIS, and such currency is not exempted in accordance with the Financial Statements Regulations, a convenience translation of the stated sums into NIS should be included, prepared in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles.

A Corporation Whose Securities Are Listed for Trading. In the event that the securities of the corporation are listed for trading on the Stock Exchange and the corporation reports pursuant to Section 36 of the Securities Law (as specified below), and no exemption from reporting was granted to the corporation, the company will be deemed to have complied with the requirements as to the inclusion of the information and documents in the offering report listed in the previous two paragraphs (consideration in a corporation's securities or all or a substantial part of its operations and financial statements), if it includes in the transaction report the corporation's periodic report for the last year that has ended prior to the date of publication of the transaction report, as well as its last interim report, published after the date of such periodic report, provided that any significant change that occurred in the corporation's business in any matter which should be described in the periodic report, until the date of the transaction report, will be specified. The inclusion can be by way of incorporation by reference.[77]

Consideration by Means of Insignificant Corporation's Activity

In the event that the consideration for the securities being offered under all or any part of an exceptional private offering is the transfer of the corporation's activity not amounting to the substantial activity of the corporation:

- The report will include a description of the said corporation's activity as set out in the outline presented below, to the extent that any issue detailed in the report relates to the corporation and is material to the corporation's affairs or activity;

77 Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Statements), 5730-1970, s 5A.

- The description will be provided in respect of the period commencing two years before January 1st of the year in which the transaction report is submitted and ending immediately prior to the date of the transaction report or the amended transaction report, as the case may be;
- The description will only refer to data from financial statements prepared according to Israeli or International generally accepted accounting principles, audited or reviewed, as the case may be, with respect to which an unqualified opinion has been given;
- The financial statements will incorporate a note as to the accounting policy and will state the principles according to which they have been prepared; the name of the auditor who signed the auditor's report will be stated and the auditor will state that he provided an unconditional opinion and has agreed to the reference to the auditor's report in the transaction report; and
- If the transferred activity is a sector or a number of sectors of the corporation's financial statements, the transaction report will incorporate, in addition, the data from the corporation's Financial Statements relating to such sector or number of sectors (The term "sector" shall mean operating sector as defined in the generally accepted accounting principles).

Consideration by Several Assets. If the consideration for the securities being offered comprises several assets, then certain reporting requirements specified above (regarding (i) consideration made in securities or all or a substantial part of a corporation's activity, (ii) financial statements, (iii) report by a corporation whose securities are listed for trading on a stock exchange in Israel, and (iv) consideration by means of insignificant corporation activity) will not apply in respect of any of the assets offered as consideration, if the company's board of directors considers that the securities issued in consideration for such asset reflect less than five per cent of the voting rights in the company. In such event, the calculations made by the board of directors and the assumptions on which it relied will be specified in the report.

Consideration in Another Asset. If all or any part of the consideration for the securities being offered is an asset other than securities or all or a substantial part of the activity of a corporation, or insignificant activity of the corporation, the report will include a description of the asset, including the rights and liabilities related to the asset or involved in the transfer of such asset, and shall comply with the requirements specified in the Periodic and Immediate Reports Regulations with regard to purchase of assets.

Professional Opinion. If the value of the consideration in an exceptional private offering is also based on a professional opinion, the opinion will be incorporated in the report. Inter alia, the opinion will contain certain details specified in the Periodic and Immediate Reports Regulations with regard to value assessment.

If the date of the value determination opinion precedes the date of the approval of the offering by the company's board of directors by more than 90 days, the following details will be stated in the transaction report: the fact that the board of directors has relied on an opinion whose effective date is 90 days prior to the date of approval of the offering by the board of directors; the period lapsed from the effective date thereof until the approval date; the changes that took place after the effective date which are likely to change the value of the asset as determined in the opinion and the grounds of the board of directors for reliance on the opinion notwithstanding such changes.

If the effective date of the opinion precedes the date of convening the general meeting by more than 90 days, the changes in the asset commencing on the effective date up to the date of submitting the offering report or the amended offering report, as the case may be, should be specified.

Instruction by Authority. The Securities Authority or an employee authorized by it to this end may, within 21 days following the date of submission of the offering report, instruct the company to provide, within the designated period of time, an explanation, specification, information, and documents pertaining to the offering forming the subject matter of the report, and it may further instruct the company to amend the report in such manner and on such a date as will be designated by it.

In the event that the Authority has instructed to amend the report, the Authority may also instruct to postpone the date of the general meeting to a date within a period commencing three (3) business days and ending thirty five (35) days following the date of publishing of the amended offering report. In the event that the Authority instructed a company as specified above, the company will announce such instruction in an immediate report.

Unless otherwise instructed by the Authority, the company will file an amendment made in accordance with the instruction through an amended immediate offering report, which will be circulated to all shareholders to whom the original offering report has been circulated, and will publish a notice in a manner specified in the Securities Regulations (Publication of Newspaper Notices) 2008. In the event that instructions concerning the postponement of the general meeting were given, it shall be reported in an immediate report.

If 21 days have elapsed following the date of the report submission and no instructions have been given by the Authority, the company may issue the securities pursuant to the offering, provided all other conditions relating to this matter and stipulated in the Private Offering Regulations and in any applicable law have been met.

A corporation is entitled to amend any details presented in the offering report, subject to the applicable provisions of the Offering Report Regulations. Any amendment thereto shall, inter alia, be released to the public in an immediate report.

Depositing Offering Report with Authority. A listed company may deposit with the Authority, within 14 days following the date of approval of the transaction by the board of directors, a preliminary offering report which will include all the details to be set forth in an offering report as aforesaid, being signed by the company and designating the signatories' names and their position with the company. The right of the Authority to receive clarifications, specifications, information, and documents and to request amendment of the report and postponement of the general meeting will apply to such preliminary report, mutatis mutandis.

On the date of filing of the preliminary report, the company will submit an immediate report, describing the principles of the board of directors' resolution regarding the offering (the 'summary report'). If applicable, in the summary report the company will state that it is about to submit an offering report for the approval of an exceptional private offering at the general meeting and designate the date of the general meeting.

If the company is instructed to amend the preliminary report, the company will submit an amended report in accordance with the Authority's instructions and will give notice of convening a general meeting for the approval of the offering, if such meeting is required.

In the event that 21 days have elapsed from the date of deposit the preliminary report, and the Authority has not contacted the company with instructions to amend the preliminary report, the company will submit the report in the manner offering reports are submitted. Such submitted report shall also be subject to the Authority's amendments during a period of 21 days following the submission, all as specified hereinabove. If the preliminary report is updated or revised, the listed company will notify the Authority of the changes it has introduced.

Substantial and Insubstantial Private Offering

Definition of Substantial Private Offering. A substantial private offering is one of the following private offerings:

- A private offering to a principal shareholder[78] or private offering representing five per cent or more of the total effective voting rights in the company before the offering, provided it is not an exceptional private offering. In this context, securities convertible or exercisable into shares, to be issued under such private offering, will be deemed to have been converted or exercised; or
- A private offering to a director or a general manager other than an exceptional private offering.

Substantial Private Offering. If the board of directors of a listed company resolved upon a substantial private offering, the company will publish an immediate report, within seven days following the date of the resolution; the immediate report will specify all details concerning the substantial private 78 A shareholder holding five per cent or more of the company's issued share capital or the voting rights in such company, or a person who will become such a shareholder following the issuance of the securities.

offering likely to be important for a reasonable investor or a reasonable shareholder, including, inter alia:

- Name of offeree; if offeree is a corporation and an interested party - name and holdings of the controlling shareholder in the offeree;
- If the offeree is an interested party, specification of the facts by virtue of which he is an interested party;
- The terms of the securities proposed to be issued, the number of securities, and their percentage in the voting rights and the issued and paid-up share capital of the company following the issuance as well as on a fully diluted basis;
- If securities of the series being offered are listed for trading on the Stock Exchange: the price of the securities being offered and the price of securities of the same series on the Stock Exchange on the day preceding the publication of the immediate report, as well as the percentage proportion between them;
- The fair value of the securities convertible or exercisable into shares, stating the calculation formula and assumptions serving as the basis for such calculation;
- If the offering is part of a transaction, the principles of the transaction will be described; in the event that the offeree is an office holder or an interested party and the offering is made as part of his remuneration, an immediate report shall include the details specified in the Sixth Supplement to the Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Reports) 5730-1970;
- The company's issued share capital, the quantity and the percentage of holdings of the offeree, company's interested parties, and the total holdings of the other shareholders in the company's issued and paid-up share capital and voting rights, as follows: before the issuance; following the issuance; in the event of convertible securities: following the issuance and assuming that the offeree will convert and exercise the securities issued to him under the offering; and, following the issuance, assuming that all existing and offered securities exercisable into or convertible into company shares will be converted and realised;
- Details with regard to the consideration: if the consideration is in assets other than cash, the primary facts with respect to the asset will be specified;
- The manner in which the consideration has been determined; and
- The name of every principal shareholder or officer in the company who has, to the best knowledge of the company, a personal interest in the consideration, and the nature of the personal interest of each of them.

Private Offering Which Is Not Substantial Private Offering. If the board of directors of a listed company has resolved upon a private offering other than a substantial private offering or an exceptional private offering, the company will publish an immediate report, specifying as follows:

- The terms of the securities proposed to be issued, their number and percentages in the voting rights, and the issued and paid-up capital of the company following the issuance as well as on a fully diluted basis;
- If securities of the series being offered are the same as those listed for trading on the Stock Exchange: the price of the securities being offered and the price of securities of the same series on the Stock Exchange on the day preceding the publication of the immediate report, as well as the percent proportion between them;
- The consideration;
- Written and verbal agreements, between the offeree and a shareholder in the company or between all or any of the offerees, between themselves or between them and others, concerning acquisition or sale of securities or in respect of voting rights, to the best knowledge of the company, following examinations it has conducted and specifying the same; and
- Specification of a limitation or restriction on the offered securities applicable to the offeree, pursuant to the regulations of the Stock Exchange, under any law or pursuant to an undertaking assumed by the offeree, to the best knowledge of the company.

Immediate Report on Outcome of Meeting. Not later than one business day following a general meeting convened for the approval of a private offering the company must file an immediate report on the results of the voting at the meeting, which will include the following details: the total number of shares participating in the voting, the number of shares voted for and against the offering, and their percentage out of the total number of voting shares, distinguishing between persons having a personal interest in the transaction and those who do not have a personal interest in the transaction.

Issuance to Employee. The provisions listed above will also apply to the issuance of securities to an employee under an employee's benefit program pursuant to an outline as defined in Section 15b(1) of the Securities Law.

Exemption from Disclosure in Report. A company whose securities are listed for trading on the Stock Exchange will be exempt from disclosing information in the report pursuant to the above provisions if, in the opinion of the Authority, the protection of a trade secret of the company justifies non-disclosure of such information, provided that, had the information in question been included in the report, a reasonable investor would not have abstained from purchasing the securities being offered. The fact that an exemption from disclosure was granted will be specified in the report.

Scope of Reporting in Respect of Exceptional Private Offering. The description of the corporation as stated below will include the following details:

- Description of the corporation, its activity, and business environment as well as those of any other corporation or activity purchased by the corporation, in the form and specifications required in a prospectus, as detailed above under the description of the issuer provided in the Prospectus Regulations;

- Financial position of the corporation;
- Results of the corporation's business activities;
- Liquidity of the corporation;
- Sources of financing;
- Income of subsidiaries and associated companies; and
- List of loans.

Registration Procedure

The Stock Exchange Regulations also apply to the registration for trade of securities issued under a non-public offering ('private placement') and securities 'of a company whose securities are traded on the stock exchange' derived therefrom, mutatis mutandis, and with changes specified in the directives.[79] Registration for trade of securities issued in a private placement is subject to the following conditions:

- The percentage of public holdings following the issuance shall not be less than determined in the directives, provided the percentage of the minimum required public holdings does not exceed the percentage and value of the public holdings required from a new company of the same type; and
- The directives allow for alleviating rules for a company that announced in its most recent periodic report or in an immediate report that it is in difficulties and that it has initiated a recovery program, and the issuance is designated for the company's recovery ('company in difficulties'), provided that at least one of the conditions stipulated in the directives is fulfilled with respect to such company.

The aforesaid provisions will not apply to:

- A private placement to a provident fund, trust fund, and employees who are not interested parties in the company by virtue of shareholdings, and who will not become interested parties in the company by virtue of shareholdings following the issuance to employees, even assuming they will exercise all the convertible securities held by them that are not registered for trade on the Stock Exchange, including those issued to them in the private placement;
- A private issuance to an insurer against obligations arising from businesses of participating life insurance, as defined in the Insurance Business Control Regulations (Methods of Investment of the Capital, Funds of Obligations of an Insurer), 5746-1986;

79 Stock Exchange Regulations, ch L.

- A private placement to a foreign investor who is active in recognised markets and is a provident fund or a trust fund or an insurer, as against an obligation in the nature of participating life insurance; and
- A private placement in a listed company that is a banking corporation, subject to the circumstances and conditions as set forth in the Regulations.

Periodic Reports

Corporation's Duty to Report

A corporation whose securities have been offered to the public under a prospectus is required to submit to the Securities Authority the reports or notices set forth below, as long as its securities are held by the public.[80]

A corporation whose securities are traded on the Stock Exchange or listed for trade thereon is required to submit the reports or notices to the Stock Exchange, as well.

A document that must also be submitted to the Stock Exchange pursuant to the provisions of the Law and is electronically reported to the Authority, as detailed below, will be delivered by the Authority to the Stock Exchange, and such electronic report to the Authority will be deemed to constitute compliance with the obligation of submission to the Stock Exchange.

The details to be included in the reports or notices, their form, and dates of preparation and submission, including details therein that are presented 'to the best knowledge of the corporation's directors', must be stipulated in regulations to be enacted by the Minister of Finance as proposed by or after consultation with the Securities Authority, and with the approval of the Knesset Finance Committee.

These regulations shall refer to any matter which, in the opinion of the Minister of Finance, is of importance to a reasonable investor who is considering the purchase or sale of securities of the corporation, and also may relate to any of the matters set forth in regulations concerning publication of a prospectus as aforesaid, and will require, in addition to a periodic report, also an immediate report of specific events.

A corporation must submit to the Securities Authority, at the special demand of the Securities Authority or of an employee duly authorized by it for such purpose, within the period stated in such demand, provided such period being not less than the period prescribed in relation thereto in the Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Reports), 5730-1970, an immediate report on any event or matter if, in their opinion, information regarding the same is important to a reasonable investor considering the purchase or sale of securities of the corporation.

80 Securities Law, ch F.

A corporation must submit to the Securities Authority, upon the demand of the Securities Authority or its authorised employee, in writing, explanations, details, information, and documents in connection with details contained in the report or notice submitted by a corporation; and submit a report that amends a report or notice that has been submitted as set forth above, within the period stipulated in such demand, if a report or notice that has been submitted does not comply with the aforesaid provisions, or that the details that were submitted require such amendment. The Securities Authority has the right to direct a corporation, after it has been given proper opportunity to state its arguments, to submit, within a period as it determines, the following:

- A report containing an opinion in addition to the opinion originally contained therein, if the Authority considers that the report was not submitted in accordance with the provisions of the Law, or that the details presented to the Authority as aforesaid require the above directive; and
- Financial statements, opinions, or reviews by the auditor who audited or reviewed them or by another auditor, to replace those included in the report submitted to the Securities Authority if, in its opinion, they were not prepared in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles and customary reporting standards, and do not duly reflect the corporation's state of affairs.

If the Securities Authority or an employee authorised by it for such purpose, are convinced that a corporation is unable to submit a report or notice under Chapter F of the Law within the period specified therefor in the Regulations, they may extend the date for submission.

Securities Authority's Power to Direct as to Manner of Presentation of Particulars

The Authority may instruct a corporation as to the manner of presenting items in the financial statements, the periodic report, or the immediate report, if it considers such action necessary to preserve the interest of the public investing in the securities of such corporation, provided that provisions with this regard were not stipulated in the Regulations as above or in the regulations with respect to items of the prospectus or in generally accepted accounting principles and customary reporting standards.

The Securities Authority also has the authority to determine general guidelines regarding the manner of presenting such items, which will be effective for a period of one year following the date of publication thereof, unless instructions with regard to such matter were previously determined in the Regulations or in the generally accepted accounting principles and customary reporting standards; the Securities Authority has the authority, with the approval of the Minister of Finance, to extend the effectiveness of the directives for a period not exceeding one additional year.

Exemption from Reporting

The Securities Authority may exempt a corporation from disclosing certain items in the report if, in its opinion, preserving the corporation's commercial secret justifies non-disclosure of such items, provided that had the said items been contained in the report, a reasonable investor would have refrained from purchasing the offered securities of such corporation.

The Court may exempt a corporation from disclosing an item in the report if it is of the opinion that such disclosure could be detrimental to the security or economy of the State of Israel or to an investigation conducted by the Israel Police or the Securities Authority, or the Ministry of Defence or the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of the Police or the Chairman of the Securities Authority, as the case may be, or anyone authorised thereby has confirmed in a signed certificate that such disclosure could be detrimental. If such exemption from disclosure is granted, such fact shall be stated in the report.

If a corporation did not submit a report as aforesaid on the date specified therefor, or submitted it not in accordance with the Law and the directives, or did not amend it within the period as prescribed by the Securities Authority or by an employee so authorised, or did not submit an explanation, detail, information, or document in regard with items included in the report or notice or did not submit an additional or other opinion as requested by the Securities Authority, the Court, upon the Authority's request, may order the corporation and its directors to submit the report or amend it or submit an additional or other opinion, within the time specified by the Court and, to the extent necessary, to order an interested party or a senior executive to submit a notice to the corporation as set forth below.

Principal Shareholder's Duty to Submit Notice

If the Reporting Regulations require a corporation to disclose in its reports details of its securities held by a principal shareholder or senior executive therein, or other details pertaining to a principal shareholder or senior executive therein, including changes in the said holdings, then the principal shareholder or senior executive shall submit to the corporation a notice providing such details, within such period so as to enable the corporation to fulfil its obligations. If the securities are held by a trustee, and the trustee submitted a notice pursuant to this requirement, the holder shall be exempt from submitting the said notice. Should the party submit such notice, the trustee shall be exempt. These provisions with respect to the duty of notification shall apply to a person who has ceased to be a principal shareholder or a senior executive, with respect to the event by virtue of which such person ceased to be a principal shareholder or a senior executive.

For the purposes of periodic reports a senior executive is defined as a (i) general manager, chief business manager, deputy to the general manager, vice-general manager, any person performing aforesaid functions in the company, and also any director or manager who is directly subordinate to the general manager;(ii) chairman of the board, substituting director, comptroller, internal auditor, an authorized independent signatory; (iii) senior officer of the company which has a material effect on the corporation; and (iv) any individual holding another position in the corporation, which holds 5 per cent or more of the corporation's equity or voting rights.

If a principal shareholder or a senior executive has not submitted such notice or has submitted it in contravention to the provisions of the Law, the Court may, at the corporation's request, order it or him to submit or amend the notice within the period specified by the Court. The date for filing of a notice is no later than one trading day following the date of the event or matter in respect of which the notice must be submitted.

The date for filing a notice, in case of a change in the number of securities held by a principal shareholder, is immediately after the principal shareholder has learned of such change and, in any event, not later than one trading day following the date of such change.

The date for filing a notice regarding the appointment of a senior officer of the corporation is not later than the day of his appointment. The date for filing of a notice regarding the resignation of a senior officer is the date on which such senior officer notified the corporation of his resignation.[81] A holder of the corporations' securities, an interested party or a senior executive who submitted such report or notice will bear civil liability.

Directive to Cease Trading

Without derogating from the powers of the Stock Exchange, under its Regulations, to impose cessation of trading in securities, the Securities Authority has the authority, after consultation with the Chairman of the Stock Exchange's Board of Directors and after giving the corporation proper opportunity to state its arguments, to order the Stock Exchange to cease trading in the corporation's securities, if one of the following has occurred:

- It failed to submit a report or notice as aforesaid on the date specified therefore; or
- It submitted a report or notice which does not comply with the aforesaid, provided the Securities Authority is convinced that such deviation concerns material issues.

If the report or the notice has been subsequently submitted as required, to the Authority's satisfaction, the Authority shall instruct the Stock Exchange to resume trading in the corporation's securities.

Reporting Regulations

In General. The Reporting Regulations stipulate both technical and material provisions concerning details required to be included in the aforesaid reports or notices, the form thereof, and the dates on which they are to be prepared and filed.[82] The above Regulations contain various provisions relating to periodic and immediate reports, as well as to interim financial statements.

It should be noted that these Regulations have undergone material amendments as a result of the transition from the mode of handwritten reporting to electronic reporting, and in last several years as a result of the Authority's comprehensive approach intended to improve the current reporting practices of reporting corporations, pursuant to which the reporting requirements have been substantially extended, as detailed below. In addition to the Reporting Regulations, in certain events, such as a transaction between a company and its controlling shareholder and a private placement of securities in a listed company, provisions of several other regulations enacted pursuant to the Law and/or the Companies Law should be fulfilled with regard to immediate reports. Immediate and periodic reporting of a foreign corporation whose shares are listed for trading on a stock exchange in Israel within the double listing rules, are also regulated by specific regulations.

Incorporation by Reference. A corporation may incorporate in a report details that are required by the Reporting Regulations by way of reference to a quarterly report or to an immediate report as published by means of electronic reporting and filed in accordance with the Law, subject to certain terms and conditions as detailed under the Reporting Regulations.

Periodic Reports. The corporation must submit to the Authority a periodic report each year, within three months following the end of its reporting year, provided the report is submitted at least 14 days prior to the date specified for convening the general meeting at which the corporation's financial statements will be submitted, or within three days following the date of execution by the corporation's auditor of his opinion concerning the corporation's audited financial statements, whichever is earlier.

The execution date of the periodic report shall not be more than three days prior to the date on which such report is submitted to the Authority. The periodic report will include the documents and details as specified below, including a table of contents. The periodic report shall be divided into five chapters in accordance with the following order:

- Description of the corporation's business;
- Report of the board of directors on the state of the corporation's affairs;
- Financial statements of the corporation;

82 Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Reports), 1970.

- Additional details concerning the corporation; and
- A report on the effectiveness of internal auditing on the financial reporting and disclosure.

A declaration signed by the Chief Executive Officer as well as a declaration signed by the most senior corporate financial officer, attesting to the accuracy of the reflection of the financial situation of the company in the periodic report shall be enclosed to a report on internal auditing.

As of 2004, pursuant to the recommendations of a special committee established to examine the matter of periodic reports submitted by corporations as part of the ongoing policy to simplify and avail information to the investors, the form of such reports changed, mainly by adding a chapter describing the corporation and its business, in an extent, form, and contents similar to those of a prospectus.

Description of the Corporation's Business. The periodic report shall include a description of the corporation and the progress in its business activities that occurred in the previous year, in accordance with the details and the principles in the First Schedule to the Securities Regulations (Details, Structure and Form of Prospectus) Regulations, 5729-1969, mutatis mutandis, and, wherever the Schedule includes the term 'prospectus', it will mean 'report'.

Valuation. If a very material valuation was used as the basis for determination of a reported value in a periodic report, including determination that the reported value should not be amended, the corporation shall attach the said very material valuation to the periodic report.

Notwithstanding the above, if a corporation publishes a valuation of a pledged asset (an asset pledged for securing a corporation's obligations under a debenture, excluding assets pledged by way of a floating charge over all of the corporation's assets) or certain figures under such valuation, an updated valuation must be attached to each periodic report subsequent to the above publishing date, until the full repayment of the debenture, even in the event such valuation is not a very material one; the said valuation shall be prepared in accordance with the provisions above and shall detail the material differences between it and the previous valuation of the pledged asset, published by the corporation.

If a valuation of a pledged asset is used to determine the value of the items published in the corporation's report, including an update of the previous valuation and determination that the value of the items regarding the asset in the report should not be amended, the valuation must be enclosed to the report, even in the event such valuation is not a very material one.

This provision shall not apply to very material valuations pertaining to lawsuits, client receivables, nor to inventory balances, nor to very material valuation used as the basis for determination of reported values of 'included affiliates', excluding 'included affiliates' whose financial statements are enclosed to the corporations report in accordance with the applicable provisions of the Financial Statements

Regulations. Excluding valuations conducted by the corporation itself, the valuation should, inter alia, reflect the following:

- Details of the corporation's organ that decided to contract the appraiser; and
- Existence of dependence between the corporation and the appraiser, to the extent that such dependence exists.[83]

Notwithstanding the regulations regarding incorporation by reference, a corporation may incorporate in its periodic reports by way of reference very material valuations that were released to the public by another corporation by means of electronic filing, even though four years or more have passed from the date of its publication until the date of the report in which the reference is made, provided that the very material valuation is presented in compliance with the provisions detailed above.

Valuations enclosed to the periodic report shall include all matters listed under the Third Schedule to the Financial Reports Regulations, as well as any other material detail which is important to a reasonable investor; in the event the valuation did not include all such details, the corporation shall complete those details in the periodic report.

If the language of the valuation is not Hebrew, the translation of the valuation into Hebrew, including a translator's certificate confirming the accuracy of the translation and his consent to include the translation and the certificate in the periodic report, shall be included in the report; valuations written in English should be included in the original language. If the effective date of valuation (the date to which the valuation refers) precedes the publication date of the periodic report by more than 90 days, the following should be stated in the periodic report:

- The period that elapsed following the effective date until the publication date of the periodic report, specifying that this period exceeds 90 days; and
- Changes that occurred following the effective date, which may alter the conclusions of the valuation, and the company's reasons for its inclusion in the periodic report despite the changes.

The Authority may exempt a corporation from including a very material valuation, in whole or in part, if it is persuaded, following the presentation of the corporation's case, that the exemption will not harm the interests of the public.

If a material valuation or a very material valuation were used to determine the value of the items in the periodic report, including determination that there is no need to amend the value of the said items, the following details shall be provided:

83 The corporation should state its nature and clarify why such appraiser was chosen over other independent appraisers.

- Subject of valuation (the asset, obligation, transaction, capital, activity, income, or expense, as the case may be);
- Timing of valuation;
- The value of the subject of valuation, determined in accordance with its valuation;
- The value of the subject of valuation immediately prior to the date of valuation, as it would have been if the generally accepted accounting principles, including depreciation and deduction, did not require the change in value in accordance with the valuation;
- The identity of the appraiser and its expertise, including education, experience in conducting valuations for accounting purposes in reporting corporations in similar scopes as the reported valuation, or in greater scopes, and the dependence on the party ordering the valuation, including reference to indemnification agreements with the appraiser;
- The valuation model applied by the appraiser for the purpose of the valuation; and
- The assumptions under which the appraiser carried out the valuation, in accordance with the valuating model, including capitalisation rate, growth rate, percentage value of discard of the total value determined in the valuation (Terminal Value), standard deviation, prices used as a basis for comparison, and bases for comparison.

The provisions of the Reporting Regulations with regard to description of the corporation's business and valuation, as well as the provisions with regard to the board of directors' report on the corporation's affairs and the summary of the quarterly statements of profit and loss, do not apply to:

- Banking corporations;
- Insurers;
- Information provided in a periodic report of a corporation with which a banking corporation is consolidated or partially consolidated or of a corporation for whom a banking corporation is an included affiliate, to the extent such information refers to the banking corporation;
- Information provided in a periodic report of a corporation with which an insurer is consolidated or partially consolidated or of a corporation for whom an insurer is an included affiliate, to the extent such information refers to the insurer; and
- Information provided in a periodic report of a corporation with which an Israeli corporation whose securities are registered for trade in a stock exchange outside of Israel (a special corporation) is consolidated or partially consolidated or of a corporation for whom a special corporation is an included affiliate, to the extent such information fulfills both of the following conditions: refers to a special corporation and is not subject to disclosure under foreign law that applies to the special corporation.

Financial Statements. In 2005, the professional committee of the Israeli Accounting Standards Board resolved that the financial statements of reporting corporations shall be conducted according to the International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS), commencing on 1 January 2008.

This decision was an additional expression of the trend of globalisation that characterises international capital markets in general, and publicly traded corporations in Israel in particular, and is intended to facilitate a common accounting language, which is designed to increase the level of certainty, and decrease the costs of inspections and the costs of investments of foreign corporations in Israel.

This transition from the then-existing Israeli accounting standards to the IFRS was optional to all reporting corporations as of 2006 and, as stipulated above, has become mandatory on 1 January 2008.

The corporation's annual financial statements shall be presented, as of the date on which the corporation's reporting year ended (may also be referred as the "financial status report"), prepared according to generally accepted accounting principles, and duly audited. Financial statements shall also include the disclosure provisions as set forth in the Financial Statements Regulations. Periodic reports shall include an opinion by the corporation's auditor regarding the corporation's audited financial statements, and shall also include confirmation that the statements were prepared in accordance with the generally accepted accounting principles as mentioned above. Furthermore, such auditor's opinion shall be presented with respect to the financial statements of any company whose financial statements are attached to the corporation's financial statements.

An opinion will bear the date of signature by the auditor. Excluding financial statements of an affiliated company or a guaranteed company, which are not a reporting corporation, attached to the corporation's reports, the financial statements shall be signed, on behalf of the corporation, by the chairman of the board of directors, the general manager, and the most senior officer engaged in financial matters, or by a director who has been duly empowered by the board of directors, instead of any of the persons listed above, to sign the financial statements at a certain date, and the date of signature will be stated. The name of the signatory and his position in the company will appear next to every signature.

Pro-forma Report

In case a pro-forma event has occurred during the reporting year, following the date of the financial status report and prior to the date of the approval of the financial statements, or if it is virtually certain that the pro-forma event will be completed during the three months' period following the financial statements' approval date, provided that such completion does not involve substantive conditions, the following pro-forma data shall be included in the periodic report, as well as the auditor's opinion and the assumptions on which such data is based:

- A financial status report which includes the impact of the pro-forma event, as of the end of the reporting year, unless the pro-forma event was fully reflected in the corporation's financial status report as of the end of the reporting year;
- A report regarding the total profit, which includes the impact of the pro-forma event (hereinafter: "the pro-forma total profit report") for each of the reporting years whose data are included in the corporation's financial statements; a corporation that presents the data on income and expenses, which were recognized during the period, in two separate reports, shall also include in the pro-forma total profit report a report that presents components of pro-forma profit or loss. If the aforementioned data did not appropriately reflect the effect of the pro-forma event on the corporation, the data of the pro-forma total profit report shall be included only for some of the reporting years whose data is included in the financial statements, to the extent that the pro-forma data shall appropriately reflect the effect of the pro-forma event on the corporation, and provided that it shall include data for the last reporting year, as well as explanation of the corporation on the non-inclusion of part of the aforementioned data;
- An additional financial statement, including a report on changes in equity and a cash flow statement, if requested by the Authority or of an employee authorized by the Authority; and
- The pro-forma financial statements shall be prepared, mutatis mutandis, in accordance with the Financial Statements Regulations, provided that the notes for the data that are included in the pro-forma financial statements shall be presented only to the extent they are necessary for the purpose of understanding same.

Notwithstanding the provisions mentioned above, if a pro-forma event occurs following the date of the financial status report and prior to the date of the approval of the financial statements, or if it is virtually certain that the pro-forma event must be completed during the three months following the financial statements' approval date, provided that such completion does not involve substantive conditions, the corporation may publish a pro-forma statement by means of an immediate report, within 90 days following the date of the pro-forma event or of its completion, as the case may be, or in the quarterly report for the period in which the pro-forma event occurs, whichever is earlier.

Subject to the applicable provisions of the Regulations, the Chairman of the Authority may (i) instruct a corporation to release pro-forma report also in circumstances that do not constitute a pro-forma event; (ii) instruct a corporation to release the pro-forma data by means of an immediate report; or (iii) exempt a corporation from releasing pro-forma report.

"Pro-forma event" means any one of the following: (i) a material business combination, provided any of the following shall be deemed the same - (a) the percentage of the profit or the loss of a acquired corporation for the period referenced in the report or the results of the acquired activity during the last year, which can be attributed to the corporation, due to its holding in the equity of the purchased corporation or the purchased activity, respectively, represent, in absolute terms, thirty percent or more of the profit or loss of the corporation for the period, which is attributed to the owners of the parent company, during the same period in absolute terms, according to the corporation‘s and acquired corporation’s last financial statements respectively; (b) the corporation‘s share of the acquired corporation or of the acquired activity, multiplied by the total of the acquired corporation‘s assets or the total of the acquired activity, as the case may be, represent, in their absolute value, thirty percent or more of the corporation‘s total assets, in their absolute value, according to the financial statements of the corporation and the acquired corporation; (ii) a material sale of securities of, or rights in, a corporation whose financial statements have been consolidated or proportionally consolidated with the corporation‘s financial statements, or a sale of a material portion of the corporation‘s activity.

Report on Effectiveness of Internal Auditing of Financial Reporting and Disclosure

According to an amendment to the Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Reports), 1970, applicable since 2010, a corporation, excluding a bank corporation and insurer, shall enclose to the periodic report, an annual report specifying the evaluation of the Board of Directors and the management with regard to the effectiveness of the internal auditing. The annual report on internal auditing will address the following:

- A disclosure whether the internal auditing was evaluated as effective. If a material weakness was found in one of the following internal auditing components, then the internal auditing shall be deemed ineffective: (1) Entity Level Controls; (2) controls on reports preparation and approval process; (3) Information Technology General Controls (ITGC); and (4) controls on processes deemed very material for financial reporting and disclosure (hereinafter: “the Internal Auditing Factors”).
- If a disclosure regarding the existences of material weakness has been provided for the first time in the annual report on internal auditing and such material weakness was not cured by the date of the subsequent annual report on internal auditing, then as of the date of such subsequent annual report, the reports of the corporation shall be deemed non-compliant with the law. The Chairman of the Authority or anyone authorized by him in writing may exempt a corporation from the aforesaid limitations, or extend a conditional exemption, if he believes that under those specific circumstances the corporation was prevented from curing such material weakness as of the aforementioned date. If such an exemption has been granted, that fact shall be stated in the annual report on internal auditing.
- If the internal auditing has been evaluated as ineffective, all the existing material weaknesses in the internal auditing as of the date of the report, the date on which they were firstly disclosed, their effect on the financial reports and on disclosure, the actions taken until the date of the report in order to cure the material weaknesses and the timetable and actions that the corporation intends to take in order to complete this curing, shall be described. In addition, the actions taken by the corporation in order to ensure that the reports are prepared according to applicable law, despite the existence of the material weaknesses, shall be specified.

- All material weaknesses that were cured during the reported year will be specified, including the date of the report in which they were first reported, except for material weaknesses that were discovered and cured within the same quarter.
- Details regarding the manner and scope of the evaluation of the internal auditing effectiveness by the corporation, and
- In the annual report on internal auditing, the corporation may include additional details regarding significant defects discovered in its internal auditing as of the date of the report.

A report by the corporation‘s auditor will be enclosed to the annual report and will include his opinion regarding the effectiveness of the internal auditing of the financial reports and describe the material weaknesses that he identified in the internal auditing, including those that were not properly disclosed in the evaluation of the Board of Directors and the management as described in the annual report on internal auditing. Such auditor’s opinion shall refer to each one of the Internal Auditing Factors.

Declarations shall be enclosed to the annual report on internal auditing, one signed by the Chief Executive Officer; and another signed by the most senior corporate financial officer. The aforementioned declarations do not detract from the responsibility of their signatories or the responsibility of any other person, according to any law.

The Chairman of the Authority may instruct that the internal auditing effectiveness report of a particular corporation shall be in the format determined by a different law or other arrangement, if he believes that under those specific circumstances a different law or arrangement applies to the corporation.

Separate Financial Report by Corporation

The periodic report shall include, together with the opinion of the auditor, financial data out of the corporation‘s consolidated financial statements which are attributed to the corporation itself as a parent company, and any and all material information which is important for a reasonable investor in order to understand the corporation‘s financial situation, the results of its activities and its cash flow, or is likely to affect financial decision made with respect to the corporation, as described in the Tenth Schedule to the Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Reports), 1970.

Report on Debenture Inventory According to Date of Redemption

According to an amendment to the Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Reports), 1970, applicable since 2011, the majority of corporations, are required to enclose to their periodic report, a report concerning the liabilities of the reporting corporation and the consolidated companies or the companies proportionately consolidated in its financial statements. In general, such report will include insofar as regarding the liabilities of the reporting corporation as a separate legal entity, debentures issued by the reporting corporation and held by the public as well as debentures that are not held by the public, credits received by the reporting corporation from an individual or from a non-bank corporation, credits received by the reporting corporation from a company that has received a bank license according to Clause 4 of the Banking Law (Licensing) — 1981, etc. In addition, in respect of consolidated companies and proportionately consolidated companies of the reporting corporation, it shall specify total financial guarantees and commitments for the provision of credit provided by the consolidated companies and credit and liabilities balances.

The report shall include data regarding credit from companies in the group or debentures held by companies in the group, including, inter alia, the following: (i) credit received by the reporting corporation from its parent company or controlling shareholder and the total balances of debentures issued by the reporting corporation that are held by them; (ii) credit received by the reporting corporation from companies controlled by its parent company or companies controlled by its controlling shareholder and which are not controlled by the reporting corporation and total balances of debentures issued by the reporting corporation that are held by them.

The disclosure as mentioned in this paragraph shall be provided by redemption dates, based on the accumulated amount of the repayments according to the terms of the debentures for each of the four years commencing at the end of the reporting period which the financial statements relate to, and accumulated amount in relation to the fifth year and onward; the disclosure will differentiate between payments of principal and interest, with a breakdown of the liabilities according to their terms of linkage.

Board of Directors' Report on Corporation's Affairs.

The board of directors shall present a report on the corporation's affairs in the reporting year, which shall contain the board of directors' explanations relating to the state of corporation's business affairs, the results of its operations, its equity capital, and cash flows; the explanations shall relate to the way the events affected the figures in the report, if this effect is material, and the reasons for the changes occurred in the corporation's state of affairs in comparison with the reporting years contained in the financial statements.[84]

The board of directors' report shall relate to the principal figures in the financial statements, and may include additional information in the corporation's possession with respect to the reported year if, in the board of directors' opinion, they are important for a balanced understanding of the corporation's business position by a reasonable investor considering purchase or sale of the corporation's securities.

The board of directors' report will also include details as to accounting exposure of the corporation to market risks and the ways in which they are managed, including the market risks that relate to equity values, the net profit or loss, or the cash flow that is included in the corporation's financial statements, the market risks that relate to the value of the corporation or to its cash flows and an itemised breakdown concerning the management of market risks, with a reference to the steps that the corporation is taking in order to address its exposure to market risks (as such term is defined under GAAP). The need for reporting such particulars has even intensified in view of the increasing use by companies of sophisticated and complex financial instruments, the use of which may expose the company to a higher level of risk, without such exposure being suitably expressed in the financial statements.[85]

The required reporting standard includes a broad duty of disclosure that applies to companies, in relation to the market risks to which they are exposed during the course of their activity, to achieve a double objective:

- Improving the ability of the investors to make reasoned decisions, which is designed to lead to greater market efficiency; and
- Creating a risk management culture and awareness in companies, and increasing the awareness of the senior management echelon to the importance of the subject.

The board of directors' report shall be in a prescribed format. The explanations shall relate to every one of the following subjects:

- Financial position;
- Results of operations;
- Liquidity;[86]

84 This requirement does not apply to certain corporations, as detailed above.

85 The issue of the company's exposure to market risks is given stronger emphasis inter alia, given the events that led to the enactment of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002.

86 If the public held debentures issued by the corporation on the date of the report which were offered under a prospectus (hereafter: debentures in circulation) and the board has determined, for the purpose of examining the warning signs as detailed hereafter, that a working capital deficit or ongoing negative cash flow from current operations

- Financing resources;
- Pro forma details as provided in the pro forma report; and
- Major details from the description of the corporation‘s business.

Within the framework of the said subjects, the board of directors shall refer to the matters set forth in the First Addendum to the Reporting Regulations, to the extent they affect the corporation, and additional matters that are important, in the board of directors' opinion, for an understanding of the corporation's affairs, as aforesaid. Matters addressed in the First Addendum to the Reporting Regulations, include the following:

- Financial Situation Explanations —developments that have occurred in the financial status report items and in the following matters: acquisition or realisation of fixed assets, land and facilities, including real estate for investment and real estate for development, which is likely to have a material effect on future activities of the corporation — the purpose of such acquisition or realisation will be specified, as well as the sector of the activity that will be served by such acquisition or from which the asset was extracted and the manner in which such acquisition was financed; the exposure studied from the information included in the financial statements, and protective steps taken by the corporation;
- Business Results Developments — explanations regarding developments concerning the total profit report items, including all income and expense items that were recognized during the period, whether a single report or two reports that differentiate between profit or loss components and other total profit components were presented;
- Liquidity — explanations regarding the state of liquidity of the corporation and cash flow from current activity, from investment activity, and from financing activity;
- Sources of Financing — explanations regarding the sources of the corporation's capital as well as their cost and changes that have occurred in them, by reference, to the issue of securities, exercise of options, or conversion of securities convertible into shares, the average volume of long-term loans during the reporting year, the average volume of short-term credit, suppliers' credit and credit from customers or, alternatively, the range of such credit as given above, all if a substantial hiatus exists between them; and
- Explanation regarding very significant figures that appeared within the framework of the Company's statements of operations in accordance with the details and the principles in the First Schedule to the Securities Regulations (Details, Structure and Form of Prospectus), 5729-1969, and for which no explanation was given within the framework of the above matters.

does not indicate a liquidity problem, the report must detail the examination performed and the reasons for its decision.

No reference are required to be made to matters that do not affect the corporation, or which, in the board of directors' opinion, are immaterial, or the absence of which would not impair an understanding of the state of the corporation's affairs. The information set forth in the financial statements should not be repeated. The following issues shall be addressed:

- Any effect caused by events and trends in the corporation's activities and its business environment, and the liabilities undertaken by the corporation, on the figures in the financial statements;
- Exceptional or one-time events;
- Events that may indicate financial difficulties;
- The effect of a joint transaction, an investment in another company or corporation, or increase or decrease in the rate of participation in such transaction or investment, on the figures in the financial statements, if such effect is very material;
- Explanations concerning issues, to which the corporation's auditor has drawn attention in his opinion on the financial statements, and the effect of special contracts, as defined in the Financial Statements Regulations, on the financial statements' figures; and
- Acquisition plans reported by the corporation during the reported period or effective as of the date of the report, including details of the manner in which the plans will actually be implemented; for this purpose, acquisition shall mean paying a dividend or an undertaking to do same, directly or indirectly, and also acquiring, or providing the financing for the acquisition, directly or indirectly, by the company or by its subsidiary or by another corporation that it controls, of company's securities, or redemption of redeemable securities which are part of the company's share capital, and including an undertaking to do each of the foregoing, all provided that the seller is not the company itself or another corporation fully owned by the company.

Explanations must be provided regarding material changes which occurred in the corporation's activity and its affairs and with respect to the data in its financial statements' in each quarter in the reporting year and, in particular, in the fourth quarter. Explanations shall be provided regarding the relationship between the compensation made to each of the five highest paid employees among the corporation's senior officers, the contribution to the corporation by the persons receiving the compensation and whether such compensation is fair and reasonable. Reference must be made to events occurring after the financial report date as mentioned in the financial statements.

Details shall be provided concerning the corporation‘s policy with regard to charitable donations, if any such policy has been established, and concerning the incorporation of such policy within the corporation‘s business; details shall be provided of the amounts of the corporation‘s donations in the reported year, indicating any undertaking to make donations in future periods.

The board's report shall provide details concerning exposure to market risks and the methods implemented in their managing, concerning the following topics that are detailed extensively in the second schedule to the Reporting Regulations: the persons in the corporation in charge of management of market risks, a description of the market risks to which the corporation is exposed, the corporation's market risk management policy, the supervision over such risk management policy and the method of its implementation, index bases report, maximum holdings in derivatives, positions in derivatives, and events occurring after the date of the financial status report concerning exposure to market risks and their management (see discussion on the subject in previous sections).

If a significant disparity exists between the actual outcome and material assumptions, evaluations, and projections which are the basis of valuations, including a professional opinion attached to the report, during the last three years preceding the reporting date, such disparity should be stated, specifying the reasons therefor and its impact on the value set.

As of 2006, the Reporting Regulations require that detailed explanation, pertaining to directors with accounting and financial expertise, shall be presented in board's report as follows:

- The minimum required number of directors with accounting and financial expertise shall be specified, in accordance with the decision of the board of directors under the provisions of the Companies Law (the 'minimum number'), as well as the board's grounds for the decision, with reference to liabilities, authority, and duties imposed on the board of directors in accordance with the law, and by taking into consideration the type of company, the size, scope, and complexity of its activity;
- If the board of directors has changed its resolutions pertaining to the minimum number during the reporting period, the change should be stated and the board of directors' reason therefor should be specified;
- If the number of directors with accounting and financial expertise falls below the minimum number, the reasons therefor should be specified, along with measures which the company intends to take to comply with the minimum number and the timetable provided for the aforesaid compliance; and
- With regard to each director whom the company perceives as possessing accounting and financial expertise (including an individual who acts on behalf of a director that is a corporation, having accounting and financial expertise), the following should be stated: name, qualifications, education, experience, and knowledge that constitute the basis for the company's determination of him as having accounting and financial expertise.

As of 2009, and following an amendment to the Companies Law allowing public companies, if they so choose, to amend their Articles of Association to include the requirement that such companies' board of directors will also include members qualifying as Independent Directors (directors with qualifications of external directors who have not served as directors in such company for more than nine years). The Reporting Regulations require that additional information will be provided regarding such directors, as follows:

- Whether the articles of a public company include a provision regarding the number of independent directors, or do not include such provision, and whether the articles were amended during the reported period revoking such provision; and
- In the event the articles of a public company included a provision as detailed above and the number of independent directors decreased below the required number, such fact will be stated in the report along with the actions which the company is planning to take in order to meet the required number, including timetables.
- In the event that a corporation has submitted a report (hereinafter: the original report) pertaining to an event or matter (hereinafter: a possible event or matter) that could occur at a date later than the one stated in the report, the corporation shall submit a report pertaining to all significant developments that occurred with respect to the possible event or matter and an update shall be included with regard to each possible event or matter and shall also prescribe any update regarding same; if the original report states the anticipated date for a possible event or matter, the corporation must submit an immediate report pertaining to the situation regarding the possible event or matter, as of the anticipated date. An update shall be included in the board of directors' report with regard to each possible event or matter. Details regarding the corporation's internal auditor shall be provided as prescribed in the Fourth Schedule of the Reporting Regulations.
- Details regarding the corporation‘s external auditor shall be provided as prescribed in the Seventh Schedule of the Reporting Regulations.
- Details shall be provided regarding the corporation‘s debentures as follows: With respect to debentures in circulation on the date of the report, details will be included in the report regarding each series of debentures as of the end of the reporting year as prescribed in the eight schedule of the Reporting Regulations and it will be stated whether each series is material; for this purpose, a debenture series will be considered material if it reflects, as of the end of the reporting year, five percent or more of the company‘s total liabilities. In addition, a description and explanation will be provided of significant events and changes that have occurred with respect to the aforementioned debentures subsequent to the date of the financial status report. If debentures were redeemed in full during the reported year or subsequent to it, this fact will be stated. If the aforementioned debentures were redeemed not in accordance with their original terms, the corporation will provide the reason for the redemption and the differences between the actual redemption terms and those of the debentures.
- With respect to debentures in circulation, details will be provided regarding warning signs in the corporation as follows: If warning signs appear in the corporation, the corporation will attach a forecasted cash flow report, as well as an explanation by the Board of Directors. However, the corporation may refrain from attaching the aforementioned cash flow report, even though warning signs exist, if its Board of Directors has determined that there is no reasonable concern that during the forecasted cash flow period the corporation will not meet its existing and expected obligations as they mature. If the Board of Directors determined that there is no such concern, it will state that fact and provide an explanation of it. For these purpose: "Forecasted cash flow report" shall mean — a list of the existing and expected liabilities that the corporation will be required to redeem during the two-year period commencing at the end of the reported period or the date of the report, as the case may be, as well as a list of the financial sources from which the corporation expects to redeem the aforementioned liabilities. "Warning signs" — are any of the following: (1) A deficit in equity; (2) An opinion or review by an accountant as of the date of the report that relates to the difficulties in obtaining financing for the corporation‘s activity, the dependency of the corporation‘s continued activity on the attainment of additional means of financing, the dependency of the corporation‘s continued activity on an event substantially uncertain to occur, the existence of persistent losses or any other indication of the existence of difficulties related to the continued activity of the corporation; (3) A deficit in working capital together with a persistent negative cash flow from current activity; or (4) A deficit in working capital or an ongoing negative cash flow from current activity, provided the corporation's board of directors has not determined that this is not an indication of a liquidity problem in the corporation. Forecast flow report provisions shall not apply to (1) A corporation that has issued debentures to the public and at the date of their issuance was (i) an issuer offering investment grade certificates of indebtedness, the entire proceeds of which are to be invested in the debentures of an investment grade banking corporation or insurer, and the repayment of the debentures of the banking corporation or insurer is intended to be used for the repayment of the issued certificates of indebtedness, or (ii) an issuer offering investment grade certificates of indebtedness, all of which are to be deposited in an investment grade banking corporation or insurer, where the deposit will be used for their repayment (2) The issuers of index products; and (3) A corporation, for which the opinion of the accountant that is attached to its financial statements as of the date of the report, draws attention to the existence of significant doubts with regard to the continued existence of the corporation as a going concern.

- Details shall be provided regarding the corporation's financial statements approval procedure, including the identity of the corporation's organs which are in charge of supreme control, specifying the names and positions of officers among them, as well as the processes taken by the organs which are in charge of corporation's supreme control prior to the approval of the corporation's financial statements.

The board of directors' report of a corporation which prepared consolidated financial statements, shall refer to such statements. The report of the board of directors must be drafted in a clear and understandable format and shall be divided into the topics detailed above, but the board of directors may combine the explanations on subjects and matters that are interconnected if, in its opinion, this will contribute to the clarity of the report.

The board of directors' report must be approved by the corporation's board of directors, simultaneously with approval of the financial statements, and shall be signed by the chairman of the board of directors or another director authorized for that purpose by the board of directors, and the chief executive officer or whoever fulfils such position in the corporation, even under a different title.

Summary of Quarterly Statements of Profit and Loss. A table shall be presented containing a summary of the corporation's statements of its total profit for each quarter in the reporting year, in the format of interim financial statements.[87] A corporation that presents the data on income and expenses that were recognized during the reporting year in two separate reports shall also include in the total profit statement a report presenting components of profit or loss, as defined in generally accepted accounting principles, for each of the quarters.

Use of Proceeds of Securities. The report shall provide details regarding the use made by the corporation of the proceeds from the sale of any securities offered under the prospectus most recently published before the date of the report, making reference to the designation of the proceeds as set forth in the prospectus, the amounts required to achieve each of the objectives, the date of achievement thereof, and details of the current status of the objectives that have not yet been achieved.

The amounts to be specified with respect to the proceeds shall be determined at the level of prices on the prospectus date, in comparison to the level of prices on the report date. If one or more of the designated objectives stated in the prospectus was not achieved, or was not achieved in accordance with the anticipated timetable, such fact shall be indicated, and the reasons therefor shall be detailed. If, during the reporting year, the corporation exercised a right it had reserved in the prospectus to alter the objectives for which the proceeds were designated, or the amounts or the timetable required to achieve one or more of the objectives, the amended provisions shall be stated and detailed as set forth above. The said data shall be presented so long as all of the proceeds have not been expended and a final statement specifying the designation of the proceeds has not been filed.

List of Investments in Subsidiaries and Affiliated Companies. The report shall include a list of the corporation's investments at the financial status report date in each of its subsidiaries and affiliated companies, containing, inter alia, the following details:

87 This requirement does not apply to certain corporations, as detailed above (under Periodic Reports).

- The number of shares or convertible securities of all classes, their par value, their adjusted cost at balance sheet date, their value in the corporation‘s solo based financial report, the price of the shares or the convertible securities listed for trade on the Stock Exchange on the financial status report date and, if no trade was conducted on the financial status report date, on the last trading day preceding it, and the percentage of shares and convertible securities held by the corporation out of the total amount of the issued securities of same class;
- The percentage of each subsidiary‘s and affiliate‘s issued share capital, the voting power, and the authority to appoint its directors, as held by the corporation; and
- The balance of debentures and loans in the financial status report, their principal terms, including redemption years, linkage terms of the principal or interest and the linkage basis, details regarding the rights to convert the debentures or loans for shares or other securities, and the price of the debentures registered on the Stock Exchange on the date mentioned above.

Changes in Investments in Subsidiaries and Affiliated Companies. The report shall include details regarding the changes in the corporation’s investments during the reported year in any subsidiary and any affiliated company, including dates of the changes and the principal terms of the transactions connected with such changes. These details shall also be presented with respect to changes in a company which became or ceased to be a subsidiary or affiliated company of the reporting corporation during the reported year.

Income of Subsidiaries and Affiliated Companies and Income Therefrom. The report shall specify the total profit of each subsidiary or affiliated company of the corporation, in the last reporting year that ended on the date of the corporation‘s financial report, or prior to that if it is adjusted to the corporation’s financial report date. The following data shall be presented, differentiating between profit or loss and other total profit, as defined by generally accepted accounting principles:

- The dividend and management fees received by the corporation prior to its financial report date from every such company for the reported year, as well as such payment for the subsequent period, all adjusted to the corporation’s financial report date;
- The dividend and management fees received by the corporation following its financial report date or which it is entitled to receive from each such company for the reported year, as well as such payment for the subsequent period, indicating the dates of payment; and
- The interest the corporation received or which it is entitled to receive from each company for the reported year, as well as for the subsequent period, indicating the dates of payment.

List of Loans. Should the corporation's major business activities include providing loans, the report shall include the loan balances as at the financial report date, classified in appropriate groups according to the amounts of the loan balances and indicating the number of borrowers included in each group. If a borrower received more than one loan, all the loans received by it shall be deemed as one loan in an amount equal to the total balance of all his loans.

Trade on the Stock Exchange. If securities issued by the corporation were registered for trade on the Stock Exchange during the reporting year, or if trade therein had been ceased during that period, the class of the said securities and their par value must be stated; if trade had been ceased, the reason for such cessation shall be specified.

Payments to Senior Officers. The report must provide the details with respect to remuneration[88] granted during the reporting year to (i) each of the top-five remuneration receivers amongst the senior office holders of the corporation or a corporation under its control, if such remuneration was granted in connection with such office holders' services to the corporation or to a corporation under its control, whether such remuneration was provided by the corporation or by another party; if a person served as a senior office holder of more than one corporation of the abovementioned corporations, his remuneration for the purposes herein shall be accumulated; (ii) each of the top-three senior office holders receiving the highest remuneration from the corporation, if such remuneration was granted in connection with such office holders' services to the corporation and if he is not listed as one of the top-five remuneration receivers detailed above; and (iii) any principal shareholder in the corporation, excluding the corporation's subsidiaries, who is not one of the remuneration receivers detailed above, whether remuneration was provided to him by the corporation or by a corporation under its control with respect to services he provided as an officer in such corporations, whether employment relationship exists or not and also in the event the principal shareholder is not a senior officer in such corporation. The said details must be provided also with regard to any remuneration provided to them following the reported year and prior to the submission date of the report, in connection with their services or employment during the reported year, but was not recognized in the financial statements for the reported year.

The name of the corporation's controlling shareholder and, if control has been transferred during the period described in the report, the name of the corporation's controlling shareholder during the aforementioned period, shall be stated.

88 The definition of "remuneration" includes an undertaking to provide remuneration, directly or indirectly, including any sum of money and or payment in kind, salary, bonus, management fee, advisory fee, rent, commission, interest, share based payment, retirement remuneration which is not pension payment, and any benefit, all excluding dividends.

Transactions with Controlling Shareholder. The report shall include details, to the best of the corporation's knowledge, regarding any transaction with a controlling shareholder or any transaction in the approval of which the controlling shareholder has a personal interest, which the corporation had entered into during the reported year or further on until the report's filing date, or which is still ongoing at the date of the report, including details with regard to the identity of the parties to the transaction, its nature, qualitative and quantitative characteristics, personal interest of the controlling shareholder, date of approval, and details of the corporation's organ which approved the transaction; such details shall be provided while distinguishing between an exceptional transaction with a controlling shareholder pursuant to Section 270(4) of the Israeli Companies Law and other transactions.

Holdings of Principal Shareholders and Senior Officers. The report shall specify, to the corporation's best knowledge, (i) the holdings of the corporation's shares and other securities held by each principal shareholder on the date of the report, or on a date immediately prior thereto, including the name of each principal shareholder, the percentage of the corporation's shares, and each of the other securities held by him on that date, and on a fully diluted basis, and the par value of the corporation's shares which he undertook to purchase or which the corporation undertook to sell him; (ii) the holdings of a principal shareholder, on the date of the report or on a date immediately prior thereto, in shares or other securities of a company held by the corporation if its activity is material to that of the corporation.

Details also must be provided, to the best of the knowledge of the corporation, regarding dormant shares (shares of the company that have been acquired by it directly and/or through companies that it controls, and which do not confer any rights for as long as such shares are held by the company or a party acting on its behalf), and securities that are convertible into or exercisable as dormant shares, which the corporation or a subsidiary or other corporation controlled by the parent company (shares of the company held by a subsidiary or another corporation controlled by the company which do not bestow voting rights as long as the company's shares are held by them) holds in the corporation at the date of the report or at a date as near as possible thereto, giving itemised details of the holder's name, the amount of shares held by it and in each of the corporation's convertible securities on the date set forth above, and on a fully diluted basis, and the par value of the corporation's shares which it undertook to purchase or which the corporation undertook to sell to it. The corporation and its senior corporate officers who hold the corporation's securities will be deemed the corporation's principal shareholders.

Authorized Capital, Issued Capital, and Convertible Securities. The report must detail the authorized share capital of the corporation, its issued share capital and its issued share capital excluding dormant shares, differentiating between the number of shares that do not confer voting rights and the number of shares that do not confer any rights whatsoever; details of the corporation's convertible securities will also be provided. The report must also include the corporation's shareholders' register.

Registered Address. The registered address of the corporation, its e-mail address and telephone and telefax numbers, shall be specified.

Directors of the Corporation. With regard to each of the directors and alternate directors of the corporation, the following must be specified:

- Name;
- Identity number;
- Date of birth;
- Address for service of court papers;
- Nationality;
- Membership in a committee or committees of the board of directors;
- Whether he is an independent director or an external director as defined in the Companies Law, whether he has accounting and financial expertise or professional qualifications, and whether he is an expert external director;
- If he is an employee of the corporation, of its subsidiary, of its affiliate, or of a principal shareholder therein - the position or positions that he holds;
- The date on which he began holding office as director of the corporation;
- Education and occupation in the last five years, providing details of the corporations in which he serves as director, as well as details of his education and stating his professions or fields of the education, the institution in which the education has been acquired, and the academic degree or professional diploma he holds;
- Whether he, to the best of the corporation and its directors' knowledge, is a relative of another principal shareholder in the corporation, providing details if any; and
- Whether he is a director deemed by the company to possess accounting and financial expertise required to comply with the minimum stipulated by the board of directors in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Law.

The Authority may exempt the corporation from disclosing an item as detailed above if it believes that the circumstances of the case justify this. As of 2011, corporations cannot serve as directors in public companies.[89]

Senior Office Holders. With regard to each of the senior office holders of the corporation, as to whom the aforementioned details were not included in the report, the following shall be stated:

- Name;
- Identity number;

89 Companies Law, s 235

- Date of birth;
- Date on which he began to hold office;
- Position he holds in the corporation, its subsidiary, its affiliate, or a principal shareholder thereof; if the senior office holder is an independent authorized signatory of the corporation, such fact will also be indicated;
- Whether he is a principal shareholder in the corporation or a family member of another senior office holder or a principal shareholder in the corporation; and
- Education and business experience in the last five years; details of the senior office holder's education including: professions or fields of acquired education, the institution in which the education has been acquired, and the academic degree or professional diploma he holds.

Authorised Signatories. Details must be provided with respect to the number of independent authorised signatories as determined by the corporation.

Report about Directors. As a result of the credibility crisis that has beset the global capital markets and principally the American capital market, which has exposed weaknesses in the functioning of boards of directors and particularly in relation to their ability, in practical terms, to take action to ensure disclosure and proper reporting by the company to the public, and in light of the complicated financial realities in which public companies are currently operating and which make increasing use of sophisticated and complex financial instruments such as derivatives and, in view of the complexity of the business environment, the accountancy reporting rules, and the economic and legal environment in which public companies currently operate, the Companies Regulations (Terms and Conditions for a Director with Accounting and Financial Expertise and a Director with Professional Expertise), 5765-2005, were enacted, replacing a special directive in this matter enacted by the Authority.

According to the Companies Law, in addition to an external director (as defined in the Companies Law) having accounting and financial expertise (as defined hereunder) serving in a public company or in a private company whose bonds are listed for trade on the stock exchange or were offered to the public pursuant to prospectus or offered to the public outside of Israel pursuant to a public offering document required by the law outside of Israel, and held by the public (hereinafter: a "Debenture Company"), additional directors, having accounting and financial expertise, shall serve on the board of such companies. The minimum number of directors with accounting and financial expertise shall be determined by the board of directors of each such company, while taking into account, inter alia, the type of the company, its size, the scope of the company's activity, and the complexity thereof, and subject to the number of directors as determined in the company's articles of association.

The aforementioned Regulations are intended to reduce, to the extent possible, the gulf that has, on numerous occasions, been revealed between the abilities and individual qualifications of certain directors and the combined abilities and qualifications of boards of directors in certain companies, and the scope and complexity of the obligations imposed on them.

Under the Regulations, a director with accounting and financial expertise is one who, due to his education, experience, and qualifications, has high expertise and understanding in business and accounting issues, as well as in financial statements, in a manner allowing him to deeply understand the corporation's financial statements and raise a debate as to the manner in which the financial data is presented. In evaluating the accounting and financial expertise of a director, the overall considerations to be taken into account by the board of directors are his academic qualifications, his experience, his knowledge, and the degree to which the director is familiar with the following matters:

- Accounting issues and auditing issues that characterise the sector of business in which the company operates and the company's approximate size and complexity;
- The functions of the auditor, and the obligations imposed on him; and
- The processes of preparation of financial statements and their approval pursuant to the Securities Law and the Companies Law.

A director will be deemed to have professional skills in each of the following cases:

- He holds an academic degree in one of the following subjects: economics, business management, accounting, law, or public administration;
- He holds a different academic degree or finished another academic studies, all in the company's main field of business or in a field relevant to the office; or
- He possesses at least five years' experience in at least one of the following, or has an accumulated five years' experience in at least two of the following: (a) a ranking office in the business management of a corporation with a significant business scope; (b) a senior public office or a senior office in the civil service; and/or (c) a senior office in the company's main fields of business.

The evaluation of the professional skills of a nominee to serve as a director shall be performed by the board of directors. A nominee shall declare in writing details regarding his education and experience, as well as attach documents and diplomas supporting his declaration, relevant for examining whether he complies with the aforementioned requirements. Such declaration shall be attached to the company's immediate report regarding the proposed appointment of a nominee as a director. The issue of fitness and expertise of nominees to serve as directors in public companies is also addressed under the new corporate governance regime[90].

90 See further details under 'Corporate Governance' hereinbelow.

Company's Accountant. The name of the company's accountant and the address of his office must be detailed in the report. If, to the best of the company's knowledge, the accountant or his partner is a principal shareholder or a relative of a principal shareholder or of a senior office holder in the company, appropriate details must be provided.

Scope of the Internal Auditors Work. The report must provide details with respect to the scope of the internal auditor's work, including the number of yearly working hours, the explanation for determination of such scope of work, and its flexibility, and distinguishing between the hours spent in internal auditing (i) of the corporation, (ii) its subsidiaries, (iii) with respect to activity inside Israel, and (iv) outside Israel.

Change in Memorandum or Articles. Any change to the corporation's memorandum or articles of incorporation in the reported year shall be presented.

Recommendations and Resolutions of Directors. The report shall present the recommendations of the directors to the general meeting as well as their resolutions that do not require approval by the general meeting concerning:

- Payment of dividends or making a distribution, [91] by other means, or distributing bonus shares;
- Change in the corporation's registered or issued capital;
- Change in the corporation's memorandum or articles;
- Redemption of redeemable securities;
- Early redemption of debentures; and
- Transaction between the corporation and principal shareholder therein which is not at the fair market value excluding transaction between the corporation and its subsidiary.

The report must specify the resolutions adopted by the general meeting that do not comply with the directors' recommendations on the matters set above. Furthermore, the resolutions of any extraordinary general meeting shall be presented.

Decisions of Company. Details must be provided regarding the company's resolutions as specified below:

91 The term 'distribution' is defined in the Companies Law as paying of a dividend or an undertaking to do so, directly or indirectly, and also acquiring, or providing the financing for the acquisition, directly or indirectly, by the company or by its subsidiary or by another corporation that it controls, of shares of the company or of securities that are convertible or exercisable into the company's shares, or redemption of redeemable securities which are part of the company's share capital, and including an undertaking to do each of the foregoing, all provided that the seller is not the company itself or another corporation fully owned by the company.

- Approval of actions of any company officer that involve: a conflict of interest between the performance of his function in the company and the performance of any other function, and his personal affairs; competition with the company's business; the exploitation of business opportunity of the company for a personal benefit; whereby such an action must be approved by the board of directors, and in certain circumstances also by the audit committee and the general meeting of the company. Such disclosure shall include the name of the officer and his position, the date of the action and its details, the date of approval of the action, a description of the procedures pursuant to which the action was approved, and the reasons for its approval;
- Any action listed above, which has not been approved, whether or not submitted for approval, including the name of the officer and his position, the date of the action and its details, the date of the decision, a description of the procedures that preceded its non-submission for approval or for its non-approval, and the reasons for same;
- An exceptional transaction[92] between the company and its officers and/or between the company and another person, in which an officer in the company has a personal interest (however (a) an officer in a parent company and also in a subsidiary under its complete control and ownership, shall not be deemed to have a personal interest in a transaction between the parent company and the subsidiary, only due to his serving as an officer in both; and (b) an officer in several subsidiaries that are wholly owned and wholly controlled by the same person shall not be deemed to have a personal interest in a transaction between aforesaid subsidiaries, only due to his serving as an officer of the contracting companies); and
- An exemption, insurance, or undertaking for indemnification, granted to an officer (general manager, chief business manager, deputy to the general manager, vice-general manager, any person performing aforesaid functions in the company, and also any director, or manager who is directly subservient to the general manager), which is in force on the date of the report.

This Authority has on various occasions indicated that it intends to materially modify the form and contents of the periodic reports, including, inter alia, the structure thereof, and has published from time to time drafts of certain proposals, in order to receive feedbacks and comments. For example, the Authority has indicated that it intends to replace the board of directors' report by a management report, focusing only on a company's state of affairs. Unless otherwise specifically indicated herein, all such proposals and initiatives of the Authority have not been formally adopted on the date of this publication and are therefore non-binding.

92 An exceptional transaction is defined in the Companies Law as a transaction that is not in the ordinary course of the company's business, a transaction not under market conditions or a transaction that is likely to have a material effect on the company's profitability, property or obligations.

Immediate Reports

Date for Submitting Immediate Report. An immediate report must be filed as follows:

- If an event became known to the corporation prior to 9:30 am on any trading day — not later than 1 pm on that same day; or
- If an event became known to the corporation at another time — not later than 9:30 am on the next trading day immediately following the date the event became known to the company.
- A corporation will be deemed to have become aware of the occurrence of an event as of the date one of the following persons has become aware of the occurrence of the event:
- The chairman of the board of directors of a corporation;
- Its general manager;
- Its chief business manager;
- The most senior officer in the field of the corporation's finances;
- The secretary of the corporation; or
- A person performing any of the abovementioned functions in the corporation even if his office is defined differently.

The immediate report shall specify the date and time at which the event occurred and the date and time at which the corporation first learned about its occurrence, and the details listed below.

In any event, the immediate report shall be filed before the information contained in it, in whole or in part, has been disclosed to the public by the corporation or by its senior officer. If the immediate report has been filed within the half hour prior to the opening of trading or during the hours in which trading takes place on the stock exchange on which the corporation's securities are listed, the corporation will neither publish nor cause the publication of part of or all of the information contained in the report, until the publication of the report at the distribution site (the Authority's web site, accessible to the general public, presenting the reports of the reporting parties).

Immediate Report upon Securities Authority's Demand. If the Securities Authority learns of an event, which does not require an immediate report in accordance with the Regulations, and the Authority believes such event is important for a reasonable investor considering purchase or sale of the corporation's securities, the Authority has the authority to instruct the corporation to file an immediate report regarding the event, within a period it determines.

Change in Corporation's Capital, Dormant Shares and Other Securities. If any change occurs in the corporation's registered or issued share capital, an immediate report shall provide details of all the changes in all classes of the share capital and the consideration paid or to be paid for the issued shares.

In the event a change in the number of shares in the issued share capital is less than one per cent of the corporation's issued share capital, the report will be made by means of a condensed report which will be submitted between the first and fifth of every month following the month in which such change occurred (termed: 'condensed report'). The condensed report shall provide details regarding each change separately. In the following cases a condensed report will be filed at the dates set out above for filing an immediate report:

- The cumulative change that has occurred since filing the previous condensed report amounts to one per cent of the corporation's issued capital;
- The effective date has arrived for confirmation of the ownership of shares in the company for the purpose of voting in a general meeting, or the effective date in relation to entitlement to interest, redemption, dividends' rights, benefits, or any other right; or
- The total cumulative change in the corporation's equity as a result of the increase of its issued share capital or its reduction since filing the previous condensed report is of at least NIS 1,000,000.

If dormant shares have been created in the issued share capital of the company or a change has occurred in their number or in the identity of their holders (termed: 'change'), details of such change will be provided in an immediate report, stating, inter alia, the following details:

- Name of the holder of the dormant shares;
- Name of the share;
- Date of the change;
- Form of the change — acquisition, including acquisition of shares other than in accordance with a special or full purchase offer as defined in the Companies Law, sale, forfeiture of a share that has been issued by the company and in respect of which the consideration that the shareholder undertook to pay for it has not been wholly or partially paid on the due date and in accordance with the terms and conditions stipulated for the same in an agreement or conversion regulations, or another change;
- If the change occurred by way of acquisition or sale, it will be stated whether it occurred in the course of trading on a stock exchange or outside of a stock exchange and, in the case of an acquisition by an issue being made, whether such issue was to the public or by way of an exercise of rights;
- The number of dormant shares which the holder held prior to and following the change;
- The percentage of the corporation's outstanding share capital held by the person holding dormant shares following the change;
- The percentage of voting power in the corporation vested in the person holding dormant shares following the change;
- The price at which the change was made and the total consideration in money. If the price, in whole or in part, was not paid on the date of the change, the date on which the price or the balance is due shall be specified. If such payment was not made at the prescribed date, an additional immediate report will be filed, specifying such fact and the reasons therefor;

- If it was agreed that some or all the shares or the convertible securities will not be transferred at the time of the agreement regarding the change, the date stipulated for such transfer will be stated; if such transfer has not taken place at the stipulated time, an additional immediate report will be filed specifying such fact and the reasons therefor;
- If the change occurred as a result of the company acquiring its own shares as part of an acquisition plan, the immediate report regarding adoption of the acquisition plan will state the date of its submission and the portion of the plan implemented following the change. If there was a change in the number of debentures or warrants offered to the public according to a prospectus, the immediate report shall provide the details of the change. If the aforementioned change is less than one per cent of total debentures or warrants in the affected series, the report shall be made in the form of a condensed report.
- If the change in the number of the dormant shares is less than one per cent of the corporation's issued share capital and the aforementioned change is the result of an action taken by a member of an institutional reporting group that is managed or controlled by the reporting corporation, the reporting shall be made by means of a condensed report, subject to the foregoing exceptions; and
- Detailed particulars will be attached to a report, as previously stated, of the number of shares contained in the corporation's registered share capital, the number of shares contained in its issued share capital, and the number of shares as aforesaid after deduction of the dormant shares, differentiating between the number of shares which do not confer voting rights and the number of shares which do not confer any rights at all.

Changes Related to the Company. If the name of the company has been changed with the approval of the Registrar of Companies, details of such change and the date on which such change was registered with the Registrar will be provided in an immediate report. If a change has occurred in the corporation's address, telephone, and telefax numbers, or in the corporation's electronic mail address, details of such change will be provided in an immediate report. If the corporation has adopted a resolution to amend its articles of association and/or its memorandum of association, the complete text of such amendment and the date on which it becomes effective will be provided, and the text of the amended articles of association and/or memorandum of association (as the case may be) in its entirety will be attached.

If an application has been submitted to the court with regard to a change of the provisions of the memorandum of association or its revocation, an immediate report shall provide details regarding the application submission date, its main principles, and the court's decisions in relation thereto. If changes occurred in the company's shareholders' register, details of such change will be provided in an immediate report, and an updated shareholders register shall be attached thereto. Notwithstanding the foregoing, if the cumulative rate of change in the nominal value of the shares that were added or subtracted from the shareholder register is less than one percent of the total nominal value of all shares included in the register, the change will be reported, once a month, in a report to be submitted on the second trading day of the month.

Changes in Terms of Trust Deed. If the trust deed (typically included as part of an offering of debentures) was amended, such amendment shall be detailed in a report, including the date of such amendment coming into effect, and the amended trust deed shall be attached thereto. If the trustee for the debentures has been replaced, or details regarding such trustee have been changed in comparison to those provided in the interim or annual report, such changed details and its date shall be provided.

Material Events in Life of Company. An immediate report will be published in respect of the material events as detailed below:

- Discrimination — If an application has been submitted to the court for the removal of or the prevention of discrimination (in which it is alleged that any of the company's affairs have been conducted in a manner that could be construed as involving oppression of some or all of the shareholders) except for an application whose effect on the company is negligible, details will be provided as to the date of submission of the application and its main principles, and decisions of the court pertaining to such application;
- A Public Company Becoming a Private Company — If the corporation has converted from being a public company[93] into a private company (meaning a company that is not public), details of the circumstances under which the corporation becomes a private company will be provided, and it will be stated whether the reporting obligations under Section 36 of the Law will continue to apply to it;
- Compromise or Arrangement (Settlement) — If an application is made to the court for a settlement by way of a compromise or arrangement between the company and its creditors or its shareholders, or between the company and a class of creditors or shareholders under Sections 350 or 351 of the Companies Law, except an ex parte application for a stay of proceedings order, such application shall be attached to the report and the following details and/or documents shall be provided and/or attached to it, as the case may be: (a) the date on which the application was submitted to the court and its main principles and the form of the notice that was published as required by law; (b) the main principles of the recovery plan, as required by law, that has been submitted to the court, if submitted; (c) additional applications submitted to the court in connection with the application for compromise or arrangement that are likely to have a substantial effect on the corporation, and the date of submission of such applications as well as their main principles; (d) granting of an order of stay of proceedings or an order for the transfer of assets, as the case may be; (e) appointment of a functionary by the court and his powers; (f) a decision to convene a meeting of creditors or of shareholders, as the case may be; (g) results of the creditors or shareholders' meeting, as the case may be; and (h) the court's decisions.

- Submission of an Application to Approve a Distribution[94] — If the corporation has submitted an application to the court to approve a distribution pursuant to Section 303 of the Companies Law,[95] details will be provided of the date of submission of the application to the court and the form of notice that was published and details as to the decisions of the court in respect of the application;
- Application for Winding up the Corporation or appointment of functionary — If an application has been submitted to the court or to the Head of the Execution Office, as the case may be, to issue an order for the winding up of the corporation or for the appointment of a receiver, liquidator, temporary liquidator, trustee, special manager, or other functionary (termed: functionary), an immediate report shall specify the date thereof and its main points, except an application made on negligible grounds; submission of additional applications to the court or to the Head of the Execution Office, as the case may be, their main points, and the date of the submission, except applications in proceedings based upon negligible grounds and in respect of which no report has been submitted; appointment of a functionary by the court or by the Head of the Execution Office, as the case may be, and his powers; rulings issued by the court or the Head of the Execution Office, as the case may be, except a ruling dismissing an application, the grounds for which are negligible or the dismissal of such additional applications made in proceedings based upon negligible grounds, and in respect of which no report was submitted; or if a functionary has submitted a report to the court or to the Head of the Execution Office, as the case may be, details will be given of the main points of the 94 Paying a dividend or a binding commitment to do so, directly or indirectly, as well as acquisition or providing financing for the acquisition, directly or indirectly, by a company or by its subsidiary or by another corporation that it controls, of the company's shares or securities that are convertible into shares of the company or that can be realised as company shares, or redemption of redeemable securities which are part of the company's share capital, and including an undertaking to do each of the foregoing, all provided that the seller is not the company itself or another corporation fully owned by the company.

95 A distribution that does not meet the conditions of the profit test, namely, a distribution that is not made out of the company's profits as defined in the Companies Law, but does comply with the requirements of the solvency test, namely there is no reasonable concern that payment of a dividend will prevent the company from satisfying its existing and foreseeable obligations as they become due.

report submitted as aforesaid, stating the place and times at which it can be reviewed; and

- Merger — If the board of directors of the corporation resolved to effect a merger, an immediate report shall include the following details: the merger proposal — a joint proposal to approve a merger which has been drawn up jointly by the boards of directors of the merging companies, after the merger has been approved by each of the boards of directors, and resolutions of the general meeting of the shareholders and of class shareholders' meetings. If the vote has taken place at a general meeting of a merging company whose shares are held by the other merging company or by a person who holds 25 per cent or more of any class or the means of control in the other merging company,[96] the following details will be included: the total amount of shares that participated in the vote, the number of shares that voted in favour and against the proposal, and the percentage of those in the total number of all the shares that were counted for the purpose of the vote, making the requisite distinction between shareholders counted as belonging to the other merging company, the holder, or any person acting on their behalf, including their relatives or corporations under their control, and shareholders who are not counted or defined as above; notwithstanding the aforementioned, the approval of the general meeting of shareholders for a merger transaction is not required at a target company fully owned and controlled by the receiving company, or at the receiving company, provided that all of the following has occurred: the merger does not involve a change in the receiving company's memorandum or articles; the receiving company does not issue, as part of the merger, more than 20 per cent of the voting rights in the company, as a result of which no person from the company must become a controlling shareholder of the receiving company;[97] the receiving company's shares are not held by the target company or by another person holding 25 per cent or more of any class or the means of control in the target company; and no person holds 25 per cent or more of any class or the means of control in the merging companies. If a creditor has made an application to the court to delay or prevent the merger based upon a reasonable suspicion that, as a result of the merger, the absorbing company (into which all the assets and liabilities of the merging company will pass following the merger, and which will thereafter be liquidated) will not be able to meet the merging company's obligations, the report shall provide details regarding the date of the filing of the application and its main arguments; rulings of the court; notification of the Restrictive Trade Practices Controller (Israeli Anti-Trust Authorities), as defined in the 96 A person may not be deemed as holding the other merging company if the holdings derive solely from holding shares in the merging company.

97 For this purpose, securities convertible or exercisable into shares, held by a person or deemed to be issued to a person as part of the merger, must be deemed as if converted or exercised.

Immediate Report Regarding Approval of Acquisition Plan. If the corporation[98] or a corporation controlled by it has decided, according to a plan, to acquire[99] its own securities which were previously offered to the public by means of a prospectus, the corporation will submit an immediate report that will state any detail that is likely to be important to a reasonable investor and such report will include the following details:

- The class of security to be acquired under the acquisition plan;
- The identity of the acquiring corporation and its affiliation with the reporting corporation;
- The planned date for commencing implementation of the acquisition plan, the estimated timing of future acquisitions and the period for the execution of the plan;
- The date on which the acquisition plan was approved by the board of directors;
- The board of director's reasons for executing the acquisition plan;
- The total estimated cost of the acquisition plan or the quantity of securities that are likely to be acquired as part of the acquisition plan;
- The tax implication of executing the acquisition plan for the company and for the holders of its securities;
- Sources of funding for executing the acquisition plan. In case the acquisition plan is intended to be financed with a loan, the terms of such loan shall be provided;
- The manner in which the acquisition is to be performed – acquisition on the Stock Exchange, acquisition through a tender offer, acquisition by means of a swap of securities in an arrangement, acquisition by instructing third parties to collect securities on the market or any other method of acquisition to be described;
- Details of the acquisition plans approved during the three years prior to the date of the report; the aforementioned details may be provided by incorporation by reference of the reports that describe the aforementioned plans; and

98 This provision applies to all types of corporations except for an issuer of index products.

99 Acquisition for this purpose shall mean acquiring, or providing the financing for the acquisition, directly or indirectly, by the company or by its subsidiary or by another corporation that it controls, of company's securities, or redemption of redeemable securities which are part of the company's share capital, including an undertaking to do same, all provided that the seller is not the company itself or another corporation fully owned by the company.

- If the acquisition plan involves shares or securities convertible into shares, the following details will also be provided: (a) The corporation‘s profits (as defined in Section 302 of the Companies Law[100]); (b) Whether the acquisition according to the plan is expected to materially affect the holdings of principal shareholders.

If the acquisition plan is amended or canceled before it was completed, the corporation will submit an immediate report which will state the reasons for the change or the cancellation, as well as the effect of the change or cancellation on the details provided as aforementioned.

It is presumed that one of the following is an acquisition according to a plan: (1) Acquisitions carried out according to a decision of the board of directors; (2) Acquisitions effected in proximity to each other.

A company acquiring its own securities may, in certain events, be liable for violation of prohibitions upon use of insider information. In order to address such concern the Authority published in 2010 a ‘Safe-Harbor’ directive intended to reduce exposure to such violations.[101]

Right to Purchase Shares. If the corporation grants rights to purchase shares, an immediate report shall specify the class and number of shares, the consideration therefor and for the undertaking to issue them, and the expiry date of the right to purchase them.

Holdings of Principal Shareholder or a Senior Executive. If any change occurs in the number of all classes of shares or other securities held in the corporation, or in any material subsidiary or affiliate thereof, by a principal shareholder of the corporation, or if a contract is signed the execution of which will cause such change, an immediate report shall describe such change to the best knowledge of the corporation, including the following:[102]

- Name of the principal shareholder and his identity number;

100 The corporation’s profits for this purpose shall mean a profit balance or profits accrued in the last two years, whichever is the larger amount, all according to the last adjusted audited or reviewed financial reports prepared by the company, subtracting earlier distributions if they were not already subtracted from surpluses, provided that the date of such financial reports is not more than six months prior to the distribution.

101 For further details see ‘Insider Information’ hereinbelow.

102 Where regulations under Section 36 require a corporation to disclose in its reports details of the holdings of its securities principal shareholders or by senior corporate officers therein, or other details concerning the said principal shareholders or senior corporate officers, including changes in such holdings, such principal shareholders or senior corporate officers are required to notify the corporation of such details and within such period so as to enable the corporation to fulfill its aforesaid reporting obligations.

- Name of the security;
- Date of the change;
- Method by which the change was made: purchase, sale, including selling short, signature of a loan document, decrease due to partial or complete redemption of certificates of indebtedness, conversion, or other change;
- If the change was made by way of purchase or sale, including selling short, whether it was made in the course of stock exchange trading ('on the floor'), or outside a stock exchange ('off the floor') and, if by acquisition by way of issuance, if the issuance was to the public or by way of an exercise of rights;
- Number of securities that the principal shareholder held prior to and subsequent to the change and its proportion out of the total securities of the same class;
- The price at which the change was made and the total amount of monetary consideration. If part, or all, of the price was not paid at the time of the change, the date on which payment of the price or the balance was supposed to have been made, will be stated. If payment was not made at the stipulated time, a further immediate report will be submitted in which this fact and the reasons therefore will be stated;
- If the executed contract is an option agreement to purchase or sell a corporation's securities, details regarding the exercise price and exercise period specified therein as well as the identity of the other party to the contract in case he is a principal shareholder as well, shall also described;
- If it has been agreed that some or all of the shares or other securities will not be transferred on the date of the agreement concerning the occurrence of change, the date stipulated for such transfer will be stated; if the transfer has not taken place on the stipulated date, a further immediate report will be submitted in which this fact and the reasons therefore will be stated;
- The percentage of the corporation's issued share capital held by the principal shareholder following the change and also the same on a fully diluted basis;
- The percentage of voting power in the corporation that is held by the principal shareholder following the change and also the same on a fully diluted basis;
- If the change was made by way of signing a loan document, details will be provided as of the manner in which the loan shall be terminated, whether by way of returning the loaned securities to the lender or by way of selling the loaned securities if the borrower is not returning the loaned securities to the lender; and
- Whether the reported securities are dormant shares or securities convertible into dormant shares.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the corporation shall report, to the best of its knowledge, of the cumulative monthly change in the Principal Shareholder's holdings of its securities, excluding changes of the Principal Shareholder's "Nostro" account, if the change applies to securities of the corporation held by a Principal Shareholder who is a member of a reporting institution group or holding via members of the reporting institution group controlled or managed by the Principal Shareholder.

Once a month, on the fifth trading day in the month, the corporation shall file a report containing details of the principal shareholders therein and of their holdings of the corporation‘s securities (hereinafter: “Status Report”) as of the end of the last trading day in the previous month (hereinafter: “ the Validity Date”), unless on the said Validity Date there was no change in the holdings of the principal shareholders in comparison to their holdings as described in the previous Status Report. Notwithstanding the foregoing, if the cumulative change in the holdings of a Principal Shareholder via members of a reporting institution group controlled or managed by the Principal Shareholder, since the later of the submission of the previous status report or the submission of the last immediate report under this provision, has amounted to at least 1% of the corporation‘s issued and paid-up capital, or to at least 5% of the debentures series’ total nominal value, as the case may be, and the next status report is not due yet, the corporation shall submit an immediate report.

If a person has become a principal shareholder in the corporation, the following information must be provided: his name, address, and the number of all classes of shares or convertible securities held by him, to the corporation’s best knowledge, in the corporation or any of its subsidiaries or affiliates, as well as details relating to the act which resulted in the person becoming a principal shareholder in the corporation. The above mentioned provision shall apply also to a corporation that has become a principal shareholder in itself.

If a person has become a principal shareholder in a corporation by virtue of the corporation’s shares having become dormant shares (as defined above) or due to the purchase of a corporation’s debentures by its subsidiary, such change will be stated not later than when such change was made in such person’s holdings, subsequent to which he will become or remain a principal shareholder in the corporation.

If a person ceased to be a principal shareholder in a corporation, the date on which such status ceased, as well as details regarding the event as a result of which such status ceased, will be stated.

Changes in Senior Executives. If a senior officer of the corporation ceases to serve in his position,[103] an immediate report shall detail his name, the position 103 In accordance with the Authority’s directives, like other material events, when a notice regarding the termination incumbency of the CEO or other senior officer in the company (as long as it is deemed to be a material event), has been given to the company, the company must publish an immediate report, whether the termination comes into effect immediately or in the future, whether the decision of the termination is conditional or whether its absolute.

terminated, the date of termination, whether he will continue to be a principal shareholder or senior officer in the corporation, and, to the corporation's best knowledge, one of the following: the circumstances involved in the termination which should be brought to the knowledge of the corporation's shareholders, or a statement that the termination does not involve such circumstances.

In the event that a director ceased to serve in his position, then in addition to the required details mentioned above, the immediate report shall specify whether this director was considered by the company as having accounting and financial expertise, to uphold the minimum number determined by the board of directors, and whether as a result of the director's retirement, the number of directors having accounting and financial expertise has decreased under the minimum.

In the event that a director in a public company ceased to serve in his position, and the articles of association of the company include a provision with respect to the number of independent directors, then in addition to the required details mentioned above, the following details shall be specified in an immediate report:

- Whether such director is deemed to be an independent director for the purpose of fulfilling the provision with respect to the number of independent directors; and
- Whether, due to the cessation of a director's services, the number of independent directors serving on the board of directors decreased from the minimum required for fulfilling the provision with respect to the number of independent directors.

If the corporation appoints a senior officer, an immediate report shall provide the details concerning him as set forth in the Regulations. If the corporation's articles of association included a provision regarding the amount of independent directors, the report shall specify whether following the appointment of the senior officer the amount of independent directors serving on the board of directors of the corporation is less than the amount required by such provision. If a director was appointed not by the general meeting, then, in addition, an affidavit signed by such a director shall be attached to the immediate report.

Matters That Deviates from Corporation's Ordinary Course of Business. An immediate report shall provide details of any event or matter that deviates from the corporation's ordinary course of business due to its nature, scope, or potential consequences, and which has or is likely to have a material effect on the corporation, and as to any event or matter that could have a significant effect on the price of the corporation's securities.

If an event or matter described above is the corporation's undertaking to purchase a significant asset, the corporation shall submit an immediate report at every stage of the transaction commencing from the negotiations phase, containing details of the asset to be acquired, and of special risk factors thereof.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, a corporation may delay the submission of an immediate report of an event or matter, in whole or in part, if disclosure of such information is likely to prevent the completion of the underlying transaction or to substantially detrimentally affect its terms and conditions, provided that information about such an event or matter has not yet been made public.

However, a corporation is not entitled to delay submission of an immediate report in the period commencing five days prior to the last date for converting the corporation's convertible securities. If the corporation has delayed the submission of an immediate report prior to the commencement of this period, the corporation will submit the details no later than five days prior to the last date for converting such convertible securities.

The Regulations leave to the company's discretion whether any event or matter that has occurred requires disclosure, while supervision and control over the manner in which such discretion is exercised by the company, vests with the Securities Authority, subject to a number of exceptions detailed above and below.

This legislative model is in the form of a balance of interests (which is based on cost-benefit considerations) between the interest of the public in immediate disclosure, and the interest of the corporation in taking action to complete an action or transaction as stated above:

- After the removal of the impediment to the submission of an immediate report, the corporation will submit an immediate report about the event or matter and will also state the reason for the delay and the date and time at which the impediment to the submission of the report was removed;
- If the submission of an immediate report regarding an event or matter is being delayed by the corporation, and information regarding such event or matter has nevertheless been made public, the corporation is required to submit an immediate report about such event or matter and to also refer in this report to the correctness of the information that has already been made public;
- In relation to a delay in publication of an immediate report, the date of removal of the impediment or the date on which the information was first made public, as the case may be, will be deemed to be the date on which the corporation first learned of the event; and
- These provisions will not apply to an event or matter that is well known within the public domain, unless it has a special effect on the corporation's business.

Failure to Achieve Objectives in Use of Proceeds. If one or more of the objectives presented in a prospectus as its use of proceeds has not been achieved, or if the timetable presented therein has not been met, the corporation shall report the same in an immediate report and provide the reasons therefore.

Convening Meetings of Security holders. If a meeting of the securities holders of the corporation is convened (including general meetings of shareholders, a class meeting, a meeting of holders of options, a meeting of holders of debentures, and any other meeting of holders of the corporation's securities, excluding a meeting of the shareholders of a corporation whose shares are not held by the public), the corporation shall submit an immediate report stating the following details:

- The type of meeting;
- The place where the meeting is being held;
- The date and time of the meeting;
- Details of matters on the agenda;[104]
- Place and times for review of proposed resolutions;
- The majority required for each issue on the agenda, if it is not an ordinary majority;
- The date for determining the entitlement of the shareholders to participate and to vote at the general meeting;
- The legal quorum for the holding of the meeting; and
- If the agenda of the meeting included a proposal to appoint a person to a directorship in the corporation, details listed under Directors of the Corporation above, and pertaining to him should be presented.[105] The notice convening the meeting and the applicant's signed statement to serve as a director as required under Sections 224(A) and 241 of the Companies Law also must be provided.

In addition, the Companies Regulations (Notice of a General Meeting and a Class Meeting in a Public Company), 5760-2000, stipulate further information to be detailed in a notice concerning the convening of a general meeting, including the address of the distribution site and the stock exchange's site, in which form the voting instruments and opinion statements can be found, details regarding the procedure of voting on a voting instrument, and dates regarding the transfer of the voting instruments and opinion statements.

A company that has a web site shall also publish the said notice on its web site. An immediate report pursuant to the Periodical and Immediate Reports Regulations shall be filed on the day on which the date and agenda of the meeting are determined. If the meeting is postponed, an immediate report shall be submitted, stating such fact, and the information specified hereinabove provided with regard to the postponed meeting; the information may be provided by way of reference to the report published concerning the convening of the meeting being postponed.

104 With regard to each matter, the report shall provide a description of its nature, while specifying the main facts required for proper understanding of such matter. The report shall also provide the text of each proposed resolution or a brief description of its principal points.

105 If the subject of the proposal is the extension of the director's term of service, the corporation is authorised to include the details by means of reference to the last periodic report submitted by it, provided that no change had occurred in such details reported in the periodic report.

These provisions will not apply if an immediate report is submitted on the convening of a general meeting pursuant to the certain specific Securities Regulations.[106]

Votes in Writing and Notices of Position. The immediate report must include the notices of position and voting papers which are required to be filed with the Securities Authority by virtue of Section 89 of the Companies Law and the regulations promulgated thereunder, on the dates which are determined in the aforementioned regulations.[107]

Results of Meeting. Resolutions adopted by the general meeting will be presented in an immediate report. In the event that the meeting adopted resolutions requiring special majorities, the following details also must be presented: the total amount of the shares which participated in the vote, the number of the shares which voted for the proposal and against it and the percentage of these out of the total of all the votes which were included in the vote count, with a distinction between the controlling shareholder or a party on its behalf and those who are not the controlling shareholder or a party on its behalf; and every other distinction between the shareholders, which is required to be made in terms of establishing that the proper majority has approved the resolution.

Recent directives of the Authority impose additional requirements with regard to presenting the results of general meetings adopting resolutions requiring certain special majorities, which include an immediate report also specifying, to the best of company's knowledge, the vote of the following shareholders: (i) principal shareholders; (ii) executive officers; and (iii) institutional investors.[108]

Recommendations and Resolutions of Directors. The immediate report shall present the directors' recommendations to the general meeting and their resolutions that do not require the general meeting's approval at the time of their adoption, concerning:

- A distribution as defined in the Companies Law — along with an indication of the balance of the profits within the meaning thereof in Section 302 of the Companies Law, prior to and following the distribution. The report also must specify the examinations made by corporation's board of directors with regard to compliance of the distribution with the requirements of the profit test and the solvency test, and its approval with regard to same;

107 See additional details below under 'Voting Instruments and Opinion Statements'.

108 For the purposes of this directive 'institutional investor' means (i) management companies, with regard to the investments made for pension funds managed by it; (ii) insurers, with regard to investments held against interest-dependent liabilities; and (iii) managers of investment trust fund.

- Distribution of bonus shares;
- Changes in the corporation's registered or issued share capital;
- Amendment of the corporation's memorandum or articles of incorporation;
- Redemption of redeemable securities and early redemption of debentures;
- Exercise of a right reserved by the corporation in its prospectus to change the Use of Proceeds of securities offered under such prospectus, including the amounts or the timetables thereof;
- An extraordinary transaction between the corporation and a principal shareholder, excluding transactions between the corporation and its subsidiaries; and
- An initial determination or a change of the minimum required number of directors with accounting and financial expertise, and the reasons for such initial determination or change, as the case may be.

The recommendations of the directors to the extraordinary meeting shall also be presented by means of immediate report.

Decisions of Company. An immediate report shall provide details regarding the following company's resolutions:

- Approval of actions under Section 255 of the Companies Law (an action of an officer that involves: a conflict of interest between the performance of his duties in the company and his personal affairs, or that involves competition with the company's business, or that involves the exploitation of a business opportunity of the company with the object of obtaining a benefit for himself or for another person, whereby such an act must be approved by the board of directors, and in certain cases also by the audit committee and the general meeting of the company), giving fully itemised details of the name of the officer and his position, the date of the action and details thereof, the date of approval of the action, a description of the procedures pursuant to which the action was approved, and the reasons for its approval;
- Any action described above, which has not been approved, whether or not it was submitted for approval, with itemised details of the name of the officer and his position, the date of the action and its details, the date of the resolution, a description of the procedures that preceded its non-submission for approval or for its non-approval, and the reasons therefore;
- Extraordinary transactions which require approvals pursuant to Section 270(1) of the Companies Law (certain affiliated party transactions);
- Engagement of a company with its general manager or with a party carrying out that function within the company, even if he holds a different title, with respect to the terms of his employment or service; and
- Grant of indemnification to an officer with regard to liabilities or expenses imposed on him or which he incurred due to his actions performed by virtue of his being an officer in the company.

Approval of the audit committee and the board of directors of a transaction or agreement, effected by the company, pursuant to the Section 270(3) or (4) of the Companies Law (certain affiliated party transactions), which does not require the approval of a general meeting in accordance with regulations 1–1B of the Companies Regulations (Easements in Transactions with Principal Shareholders) 5760-2000, as well as details pertaining to:

- The principal points of the transaction;
- The board of director's and the audit committee's arguments in favour of approving the transaction or the agreement; and
- The right of shareholders to object to the easement as detailed under Regulation 1C of the Companies Regulations (Easements in Transactions with Principal Shareholders) 5760-2000.

Details of a transaction with a controlling shareholder or of a transaction that the controlling shareholder has a personal interest in its approval, including the main points of the transaction, and the details of the organ which approved the transaction and the summary of his reasons for approval.

Transactions Involving Valuations. Following a transaction carried out by a corporation (if carried out within two years following the date the valuation had been first attached to the report of a corporation, including the professional opinion), whose derivative value is substantially different from the one provided under the valuation, the corporation should submit an immediate report containing details pertaining to the differences between the derivative value of the transaction and the value provided under the valuation, accompanied by explanations of the said difference.

Duty to Update. Following a report submitted by a corporation pertaining to an event or issue ('original report') that could occur at a later date ('probable event or issue'), the corporation is required to submit a report pertaining to all material changes that occurred in relation to the probable event or issue; if the original report states an anticipated date for a probable event or issue, the corporation should submit an immediate report pertaining to the state of probable events or issues, on such anticipated date.

Interim Financial Statements

Date of Filing of Quarterly Reports. The corporation shall file a quarterly report with the Securities Authority within two months following the report date, provided that it is filed within three days of the date on which the accountant of the corporation signed the review report that relates to the interim financial statements. The execution date of the quarterly report shall not precede the date on which it is filed with the Securities Authority and the Stock Exchange by more than three days.

Update of Information Included in Periodic Report. A quarterly report shall specify any material change that occurred during the reported period in the business of the corporation related to any matter that should be described in the periodic report.

Principles for Preparing Statement. The interim report shall be prepared in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles of financial reporting for interim periods and shall duly present the corporation‘s financial status, its performances and cash flow and the changes in its financial status and its equity during the reporting periods included in the interim report. Each amount therein shall be presented together with the corresponding amount for the corresponding period of the previous reported year and for the whole reported year; the currency of the intermediate statements must be as stipulated under Regulation 4 of the Securities Regulations (Preparation of Annual Financial Statements), 5753-1993; The corporation will include in its interim financial statements an express and unconditional declaration regarding its full compliance with generally accepted accounting principles with regard to financial reporting for the interim periods.

The interim statement shall present the financial report as of the report date. A total profit statement, report on changes in equity capital, and cash flows shall be presented as follows: for the first quarter - in the first-quarter interim statement; for the second quarter and the six-month period ending on the date of the second-quarter statement - in the second-quarter interim statement; for the third quarter and the nine-month period ending on the date of the third-quarter statement - in the third-quarter interim statement.

Comparative Statements. Each amount in the balance sheet shall be presented together with the corresponding amount in the financial report for the corresponding quarter of the reported year and for the whole reported year.

Required Details. The interim report shall provide disclosure of every change in accounting policy, every updated estimate and correction of a mistake made during the reported period and shall include the following details:

- If, during the reported period, the corporation changed the accounting policy that it had implemented during the previous reported periods, the change shall be explained and the reasons therefor shall be presented, including the reasons why the implementation of the new accounting policy provides more reliable and relevant information, and the amounts of the adjustment for the reported period in which the change was made and for all previous reported periods included in the interim report shall be specified; and
- If a material mistake in the previous period was corrected by presenting it again in the interim financial statements, then the interim financial statements in which the error was corrected shall provide all the details required for understanding the mistake and its correction.

If during the reported period the corporation changed an accounting estimate, the report shall specify the change and the reasons therefor, the amount of the change in the estimate, which has an effect during the current reported period or is expected to have an effect in future reported periods, excluding disclosure of the effect in future periods when it is not feasible to estimate the effect. If it is not feasible to assess the effect of the change in the estimate on future reported periods, such fact and the reasons therefor shall be disclosed.

The aforesaid details shall be presented separately in the notes, and there is no requirement to include in the report any information which, under the circumstances, is immaterial.

Attaching Statements of 'Included Company'. A corporation shall attach to its quarterly report the interim financial statements of an included company, for the same quarter, if: (i) the corporation's investment in the included company constitutes, in its absolute value, 20 per cent or more of the total assets in the corporation's financial report; or (ii) the amount included in the profit or loss due to the corporation's investment in the included company constitutes, in its absolute value, 20 per cent or more of the absolute value of the corporation's profit or loss; or (iii) the included company has significant importance for the corporation's business or operations in their existing formats, or in future formats intended for them; or (iv) any of the requirements in subsections (i) or (ii) was met in the previous reported year and the same is anticipated in the next reported year as well; (v) the company became the corporation's included company after the date of the corporation's financial report, and requirement of subsection (iii) was met.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, interim financial statements of an included company shall not be attached to corporation's quarterly report under the following circumstances: (i) the included company's reports are insignificant in relation to the corporation's reports; (ii) none of the requirements listed in subsections (iii) through (v) hereinabove is met, none of the requirements listed in subsections (i) or (ii) hereinabove was met during the previous reported year, and the same is anticipated in the next reported year; (iii) after the date of the corporation's financial report, the company ceased to be the corporation's included company.

Interim financial statements of an included company will be arranged in accordance with Regulation 23 of the Financial Statements Regulations,[109] as follows: (i) the statement will be prepared in accordance with the generally accepted accounting principles; (ii) in the event they are not presented in the same currency as the corporation's reports, the exchange rate between the currency of the included company's reports and the currency of the corporation's reports shall be specified, as of the date of the financial statements, and any change in such rate during the reported year shall be indicated; (iii) the statements shall be audited in accordance with Israeli accepted auditing standards, or in accordance with the international auditing standards or in accordance with a set of comprehensive foreign auditing standards; (iv) an auditor‘s report shall be attached to the statements, indicating the accounting rules in accordance with which the statements were prepared and the auditing standards in accordance with which the statements were audited; (v) if the language of the statements is neither Hebrew nor English, translation of the statements into Hebrew (including auditors’ report) shall be attached, as well as a translator’s certificate confirming the accuracy of the translation and the translator‘s consent to including the translation and the certificate in the reports; if the duly signed translation into Hebrew of the financial statements has been attached, the statements in the original language are not required to be attached.

If the attachment of the interim financial statements of an included company was not preceded by the attachment of its annual financial statements, the interim financial statements of the included company shall also include a note regarding the accounting policy that was applied with regard to its recent annual financial statements.

The corporation’s quarterly report shall provide summarized information regarding an included company, for each of the periods included in the corporation‘s consolidated financial statements, distinguishing between summarized information on the included company‘s financial status and summarized information on the results of its activity, all according to Regulation 24 of the Financial Statements Regulations, mutatis mutandis.

Attaching Statements of Company Guaranteed under Unlimited Guarantee. The Regulations specify the duty to attach the interim statements of a guaranteed company, as defined in the financial statements.

Pro Forma Data. The company shall enclose to the quarterly report a pro forma report in event that a pro forma event occurred during the interim period, following the interim financial report date and up to the financial report approval date or if there is high probability that a pro forma event will be completed within a three-month period following the interim financial report approval date, provided that the completion of such event is not dependent on the fulfillment of any material conditions.

Notwithstanding the above, if a pro forma event occurred following the interim financial report date and up to the financial report approval date, or if there is high probability that a pro forma event shall be completed within the three-month period following the interim financial report approval date and the completion does not involve the fulfillment of any material conditions, the company shall publish the pro forma report through an immediate report 90 days from the day of the pro forma event or its completion, as the case may be, or through a periodic or quarterly report for the period in which the pro-forma event took place, whichever is earlier.

The interim Financial Statements, shall also include, alike the annual report, mutatis mutandis, report on the effectiveness of internal auditing of financial reporting and disclosure, separate financial report by the corporation and report on debenture inventory according to date of redemption.

Approval and Signature of Statement. The report shall be executed in the name of the corporation by the chairman of the board of directors, the general manager, and the most senior financial officer, or by a director who was authorized by the board of directors to execute the financial statements for a particular date instead of any of these executives.

The signature date, the names of the signatories, and their positions in the corporation will be indicated in the financial statements. The periodic report shall be submitted by electronic media (Internet) to the Securities Authority, pursuant to the provisions of the Securities Regulations (Electronic Signature and Reporting), 5763-2003, as further detailed hereunder.

Auditor's Review. A review by an auditor shall be attached to the interim report, confirming that the statements have been prepared in accordance with the Regulations. The auditor shall confirm preparation of the review by his signature and shall specify the date thereof.

Board of Directors' Report for Interim Period. The board of directors' report for the interim period,[110] containing explanations with respect to events and changes occurred in the corporation's business during the interim period and the cumulative period commencing the end of the last reporting year and ending on the date of the statement, provided that the effect of such events and changes on the data in the interim financial statements is significant, shall also be attached to the financial statements.

The scope of the board of directors' report for the interim period shall be limited and it shall be prepared based on the assumption that its readers also hold the board of directors' report for the previous reporting year and therefore there is no need to repeat the information which had already been included therein; the interim board of directors' report which is submitted by a corporation which has offered securities to the public for the first time, and has not yet published a board of directors' report, shall be prepared based on the assumption that its readers hold the prospectus.

An interim period directors' report must be prepared in accordance with the following provisions: explanations shall be provided on each of the issues as set 110 This requirement is not applicable to banking and insurance corporations as well as to information in the periodic report of a corporation that had consolidated fully or on a relative basis, a banking corporation, as far as the information relates to the banking corporation; or to information in the periodic report of a corporation that had consolidated fully or on a relative basis, an insurer, as far as the information relates to the insurer; or to information within the periodic report of a corporation that had consolidated fully or on a relative basis a corporation which comes under the provisions of Chapter C5 of the Securities Law ('consolidated corporation'), providing that the information: (a) pertains to a consolidated corporation and (b) is not required under disclosure requirements of the foreign law which applies to the consolidated corporation.

forth with respect to the annual board of directors' report, and shall include comparisons to the interim periods the statements for which were included as comparison figures in the interim financial statements. Expression shall be given to:

- Seasonal effects on the results of the corporation's operations;
- Extraordinary or one-time events;
- Events that may indicate financial difficulties; and
- Explanation of issues to which the corporation's auditor drew attention in his letter of review of the interim financial statements.

Reference must be made to the material changes that occurred in determination or recommendation of payments to each of the five persons receiving the highest salaries in the corporation among the senior officers, and explanations shall be provided for the reasons of the board of directors on which the determination or recommendation of such changes were based. Reference shall also be made to events that occurred after the status report date which are mentioned in the interim financial statements.

The report must include reference to very material changes which have taken place during the interim period and during the cumulative period commencing on the end of the last reported year and ending on the day of the report, in relation to exposure to market risks and to ways of dealing with them as specified above, mutatis mutandis.

If the board of directors changed its determination pertaining to the minimum number of directors with accounting and financial expertise, during the reported period, the change should be stated together with the board's reasons for the change. If the number of directors with accounting and financial expertise has fallen below the minimum number, the reasons should be stated, along with the actions the company is planning to take to comply with the minimum number and the proposed timetable therefore.

The report of the board of directors will be drafted in a clear and comprehensible manner and it will be divided into sections as specified above corresponding to the annual report of the board of directors, but the board of directors is entitled to combine the explanations in matters or in subjects which are connected to each other, if the board believes this will contribute to the clarity of the board of directors' report.

With respect to a corporation which prepares consolidated financial statements, the board of directors' report shall relate to such statements. The board of directors' report shall be approved by the corporation's board of directors simultaneously with the approval of the interim statements, and shall be executed by the chairman of the board of directors, or another director authorised by the board of directors for that purpose, and the general manager or anyone in the corporation fulfilling such position, even if his title is different.

A material valuation applied as a basis for stipulating reported values in a quarterly report, including a stipulation that there is no need to change reported values in the report, should be attached by the corporation to the quarterly report and provisions of Regulation 8B, as stated above, shall apply to the valuation. If the corporation believes that a substantial change in value of property has occurred, as to which a valuation was included in the report, an updated valuation is required. Declarations of company's officers are required to be attached to the annual and interim financial statements and board of directors' report of a public company.

Periodic and Immediate Reports of Foreign Corporation. A foreign (non-Israeli) corporation whose securities are registered for trading on the Stock Exchange in accordance with a listing document, must submit to the Securities Authority and to the Stock Exchange reports or notices in accordance with the rules of double listing, for so long as its securities are publicly held, provided that, immediately prior to the registration for trading, reporting obligations did not apply to it in accordance with the Securities Law.

As determined in the rules of double listing, provisions of Chapter F of the Securities Law, by virtue of which the reporting regulations were enacted, focusing on the periodic and the immediate reporting obligations which have been reviewed above, do not apply to a foreign corporation (subject to certain exceptions).

Reports and notices of a foreign corporation will be drawn up in accordance with the reporting regulations of a foreign corporation[111] and they will be submitted to the Securities Authority and to the Stock Exchange.

In the event that the foreign corporation is obliged to submit a report which it has submitted or published to investors in its securities, listed for trading on a foreign stock exchange, it will submit a copy, containing an original signature of the report which has been submitted or which has been published outside of Israel as mentioned.

Documents which the foreign corporation has originally published or has submitted in English may be submitted in the original language. The reports and the notices will be signed by the corporation. Periodic and interim reports of a foreign corporation will be submitted by way of a reporting document, including, inter alia, the name of the corporation and the details listed below:

- Expanded contact details, the ticker symbol of the securities of the corporation on foreign stock exchange, the name and details of the person in the corporation in charge of maintaining the contacts between the corporation and the entity supervising or enforcing the foreign law, and the name and details of the person in the corporation who performs such function regarding the Authority; and 111 Securities Regulations (Periodic and Immediate Reports of a Foreign Corporation), 5761-2000.

- An annual report, a semiannual report or a quarterly report, as the case may be, which must be submitted or published under the foreign law.

The reporting document will be submitted upon the earlier to occur of (i) prior to a date which is determined for the submission or for the publication of the periodic report, the semi-annual report, or the interim report, as the case may be, in accordance with the foreign law, or (ii) a date it was published or reported to the holders of the corporation's securities listed for trading on a foreign stock exchange.

In the event that the periodic report, the semi-annual report, or the interim report has been submitted or has been published outside of Israel on a Stock Exchange's trading day, it will also be submitted, at the same time, in accordance with the reporting regulations of a foreign corporation, and, in the event that it has been submitted or it has been published on a non-trading day, it will be published not later than 9:30 am on the first day of trading following its submission or its publication outside of Israel.

Financial reports included in corporate reports of a corporation whose securities are listed for trade on the London Stock Exchange shall be compiled according to international accounting standards or according to the United States standards or according to accounting rules as defined under Securities Regulations (Preparation of Annual Financial Reports) 5753-1993.

Immediate reports of a foreign corporation must be submitted as follows:

> The corporation will submit reports on every matter on which it is obliged to carry out immediate reports in accordance with the foreign law and on every matter on which it publishes or reports immediately to the holders of its securities which are registered for trading on the stock exchange abroad, on dates determined under applicable foreign law or on the date it reported to the holders of its securities listed for trading on a foreign stock exchange, whichever is earlier. In the event such report has been published on a Stock Exchange non-trading day, it will be published not later than 9:30 am on the first day of trading thereon following its publication.

Other reports or notices of a foreign corporation must be submitted as follows:

> The foreign corporation will submit every report or notice or other document which it is obliged to submit or to publish in accordance with the foreign law or which it has submitted or it has published to those investing in its securities listed for trading on a stock exchange outside of Israel, and all other information which the corporation has received from its holders with regard to their holdings in the securities of the corporation and which has been published or which it is obligatory to publish in accordance with the foreign law for investors in its securities listed for trading on the stock exchange > outside of Israel. Provisions regulating the filing of an annual report, a semiannual report or a quarterly report, as specified hereinabove, shall apply to such filing, mutatis mutandis

The Authority or an employee so authorised by it is entitled to instruct a foreign corporation, after it has been given the opportunity to make heard its claims, to submit an immediate report which amends a report or a notice which has been given as mentioned above, in the event that the Authority is of an opinion that the details in the report or in the notice which have been submitted by the foreign corporation do not comply with the provisions which are set out above. The Securities Authority may also contact the entity in charge of supervision or enforcement of the foreign law prior to contacting the foreign corporation as stated.

In the event that the Authority or the Chairman of the Authority believes that a particular corporation has been precluded from submitting a report or a notice in accordance with the applicable provisions of the Regulations at the date determined for such purpose, it may extend the period for its submission.

Transition from One Reporting Format to Another. A corporation whose securities are registered for trading on a Stock Exchange and are also registered for trading on a stock exchange outside of Israel and who reports in accordance with the ordinary reporting provisions of the Securities Law (i.e., other than in the framework of the double listing rules) may switch to reporting in accordance with the double listing rules, for so long as its securities are registered for trading on the stock exchange outside of Israel.

A corporation which reports in accordance with the double listing rules is entitled to switch to reporting in accordance with the ordinary provisions of reporting of the Securities Law. Transition from one reporting format to another, as mentioned above, requires the consent of a majority of the corporation's securities holders, with the exception of the controlling shareholders in the corporation, who participate in a vote at the class meetings of the securities' holders, convened by the corporation for this purpose.

Change of Reporting Format. Upon the corporation's transition from one reporting format to another, in accordance with the provisions mentioned above, the corporation will submit to the Authority and to the Stock Exchange and, in the event that it is incorporated in Israel, also to the Registrar of Companies, in accordance with the provisions of the reporting format to which it transferred, the following reports:

- An immediate report with regard to the above matter, within the time prescribed by the Authority;
- A periodic report for the period of the last reporting year preceding the date of the switch; and
- Interim reports following the periodic report of the last reporting year preceding the date of the switch.

Reporting Improvement Project

In 2010 the Authority launched the Reporting Improvement Project (the "Project"), intended to improve the reporting practices of reporting corporations in order to render to the public more relevant and useful information essential for making informed investment decisions.

The Project's key points were published in 2011 and 2012. Certain amendments to the Securities Regulations have begun to be enacted, implementing the Project's principles which are effective as specified hereinafter, and certain other amendments are expected to be drafted in the future, in order to incorporate all the Project's disclosure provisions in the corporations' periodic and interim reports.

Background

During the past few years, Authority staff members examined (i) companies' periodic and quarterly reports and the disclosures contained therein; (ii) the Barnea Committee's[112] recommendations regarding the development of industry-specific disclosure requirements; and (iii) general tendencies in disclosure requirements over the past few years, including the implementation of IFRS on financial reporting in Israel, as well as similar steps taken by other securities' regulators worldwide.

The Authority published its findings in connection with the forgoing, whereby the current disclosure provisions and their application are deficient. The main problem seems to be the excess and immaterial information which is included in the reports, as well as the lack of uniformity and clarity in the application of disclosure requirements, and insufficient business disclosure from management's point of view.

Accordingly, the Project determines, inter alia, the need for (i) modifications to the format of reports such that each chapter shall contain disclosure requirements of similar or identical purpose; (ii) industry specific disclosure requirements; (iii) clarification of the principles of materiality and reporting from the management's point of view; and (iv) establishing extensive disclosure provisions for various aspects of corporate governance.

New Report Format

In General

The new reports' format shall include four major chapters, as follows below.

112 The Committee on the Structure and Content of Annual Reports and Prospectuses, set up by the Authority in order to examine reporting and disclosures.

Management's Discussion and Analysis Report

This report will replace the existing board of directors' report. Its purpose is to review, from management's point of view, the state of the company's affairs and company's strategy. Main modifications therein, in comparison with the board of directors' report, include a requirement to review the state of company's business (with a breakdown among its fields of activities), detailing the impact of changes in the company's economic environment on its business activity and company's actions addressing such changes. The report shall be based on reviewed material information and the discussion and analysis brought before the company's management or conducted by it. The management's report shall also include a disclosure with regard to implementation of forward looking information received in the past. In addition to the signatures of the company's chairman of the board and chief executive officer, the chief operating decision maker, as determined in accordance with applicable accounting standards — as well as the chairman of the financial statements review committee — are also required to execute the report.

Description of Company's Business Report

(a) Industry-specific disclosure chapter — following the recommendations of the Barnea Committee to develop industry-specific disclosure requirements, and following changes in applicable accounting standards, the Authority published specific disclosure requirements for various industries, including investment property, entrepreneurial property, natural gas and oil activities, holding and investments entities as well as biomed companies. Disclosure directives for the investment property industry and the natural gas and oil industry are effective as of the periodic reports for 2011.

(b) Financing and liquidity chapter — creation of a new sub-chapter in the description of the company's business report, which integrates financing and liquidity risk aspects;

(c) Risk chapter — creating a new sub-chapter under the description of the company's business report, which focuses on risk management (including operational and market risks), for the purpose of creating a comprehensive overview of risks and an inclusive, unified approach thereto.

Financial Statements

Although the Project does not directly regulate financial statements, the disclosure requirements in the financial statements are also adjusted due to duplicative requirements of the new and existing regulations in other chapters of the periodic reports.

Corporate Governance Report

An Authority directive from 2012 instructs reporting corporations to incorporate into the periodic report a "designated corporate governance report", as an integral part of annual financial statements, based – inter alia – on the disclosure requirements included in the Securities Regulations, the findings of the Goshen Committee,[113] as well as the provisions of the Companies Law.

The report includes a questionnaire, where an affirmative answer to any question therein constitutes a positive indication for the existence of adequate corporate governance, and vice versa. The questionnaire covers various aspects of corporate governance, including: (a) the board of directors' conduct; (b) the conduct of the audit committee and the financial statements review committee; (c) approval and control processes related to transactions with controlling shareholders; (d) the internal auditor; (e) the independent auditor.

Such standard questionnaire, requiring specific and focused disclosure as aforesaid, is expected to serve as an efficient platform for assessing the quality of corporate governance in companies and for the pricing of their securities. The Authority has recently announced that it shall publish the final form of the questionnaire in the near future and all reporting corporations are required to include it in their 2012 periodic reports.

Effective Provisions Related to Project

Real Estate

A new reporting format, implementing real estate specific disclosure requirements, came into effect, making more extensive use of tables and assisting in processing of periodic reports. Real estate companies shall provide details regarding comparative periods corresponding to those required in the financial statements: consequential data is required for three periods, but balance sheet data is presented for the reporting year and the end of the corresponding period.

The report also must include financial measures which are not based on IFRS, in order to increase comparability for the performance of the same company during different periods, as well as among different companies operating in the same industry. A new reporting format for the investment property industry establishes the use of accepted industry benchmarks, such as same property net operating income and funds from operations (FFO), which are significant and widely used for assessing the results and value of investment property companies. The new format also focuses on the companies' key assets and projects.

Expected Cash-Flow Statement

In November 2010, the Authority enacted disclosure directives pertaining to the preparation of expected cash flow statements by companies exhibiting certain warning signs according to Securities Regulation 10(b)(14) (Periodic and 113 As specified hereinafter in Corporate Governance section.

Immediate Reports) - 1970. The directive was published due to the need and significance of a clear criteria for the presentation of expected cash flow statements, including the assumptions underlying it and the board of directors' notes accompanying the statement.

Natural Gas and Oil Industry

A new reporting format regulates all aspects of reporting for oil and natural gas companies — periodic and interim reports, immediate reports and prospectuses. Reporting on resources and gas and oil reserves shall be made in accordance with the international SPE-PRMS model (Society of Petroleum Engineers — Petroleum Resources Management System). This model constitutes the basis for reporting on reserves and resources in the gas and oil industry in most developed countries, including the US and Canada. The directive also determines additional mechanisms for control over reporting, including the use of independent and qualified professionals, as well as management representation and disclosure mechanisms for the underlying assumptions used in preparation of reports.

Electronic Reporting

In General. Any and all reports and documents, which are required to be filed with the Authority by virtue of the Law and the regulations promulgated thereunder, are required to be filed by means of electronic reporting. The electronic reporting requirements are prescribed mainly within the framework of Chapter G1 of the Law, and within the framework of the Electronic Signature and Reporting Regulations.[114]

Modes of Reporting. A draft prospectus, a prospectus the publication of which has been permitted, a registration document and any report, opinion, or approval which are contained therein, and also any report, notice, or other document which must be submitted to the Authority or to the Stock Exchange in accordance with the Law, shall be submitted solely and exclusively by electronic reporting in accordance with the provisions of the Law and the Electronic Signature and Reporting Regulations.

A document which must be submitted both to the Securities Authority and to the Stock Exchange in accordance with the provisions of the Law and which was reported electronically to the Authority will be transferred by the Authority to the Stock Exchange, and the person that filed the electronic report with the Authority will be deemed to have complied with the requirement of filing with the Stock Exchange.

Security of Information. For the purpose of information security of documents which have been electronically reported to the Authority, the Authority will make use of a reliable software and hardware system which provides, to the Authority's satisfaction, reasonable protection against penetration, disruption, disturbance, or damage to computers or computer material and which provides a reasonable level of availability and reliability.

Electronic Signature. A person whose signature is required on a document which is submitted to the Authority will empower an authorised electronic signatory of the reporting entity[115] to sign on his behalf and to report electronically to the Authority, by attaching the approved electronic signature of the authorised electronic signatory.

If the signature of more than one person is required on that document, all the persons whose signatures are required shall authorise, as detailed above, only one authorised electronic signatory of the reporting entity; such authorisation must be signed by hand by everyone whose signature on the document is required under any law, stating his name and position in the reporting entity or any other connection that he has with the reporting entity, and he shall attach thereto, as an integral part thereof, the text of the document with regard to which the authorisation was given.

Notice to Securities Authority. In the event the wording of a document published via MAGNA[116] is not completely identical to wording submitted to the authorised electronic signatory of the reporting entity, the party who empowered the authorised electronic signatory shall submit to the Authority, no later than three trading days following the publication of the document via MAGNA, a written notice with this regard.

Appointment of Authorized Electronic Signatories. Within the framework of implementation of the electronic reporting, the reporting corporation is required, in accordance with Section 36 of the Securities Law (and including a foreign corporation which reports in accordance with the double listing rules), to appoint at least two senior officers to serve as electronic authorised signatories on its behalf, for the purpose of electronic reporting to the Authority.

The corporation is required to submit a request for approval of its electronic authorised signatories to the Authority.[117] Following such approval, the parties who are 115 "Reporting entity" — a reporting corporation, trustee of certificates of indebtedness, fund manager, fund trustee, fund liquidator, licensed corporation or underwriter.

116 See supra note 36.

117 An authorised electronic signatory of the corporation shall be an individual who serves as senior officer in the corporation and who has been appointed by the corporation to serve as proxy for the purpose of electronic reporting to the Securities Authority. A 'senior officer' for this purpose is a general manager, chief business manager, deputy to the general manager, vice-general manager, any person performing aforesaid functions in the company, director, manager who is directly subservient to the general manager, chairman of the board of directors, an substitute director, the comptroller, the internal auditor, an independent authorized signatory, any person holding any such position even if such person's title is different, a senior officer in a designated to serve as the electronic authorised signatories of the corporation will, within 14 days from the date of this approval, approach the offices of the approver of the electronic signature, and acquire a means of electronic signature and documentation for the purpose of electronic reporting to the Authority.

Cancellation of Appointment of the Authorised Electronic Signatory. In the event that the reporting entity cancels the appointment of the authorised electronic signatory, it will give notice of such cancellation to the Authority and to the approver of the signature who issued the electronic approval to such authorised electronic signatory, not later than at the time at which the cancellation comes into force.

In the event that the authorised electronic signatory ceases to serve as a senior officer of the reporting entity, the reporting entity will give notice to the Authority, by means of electronic reporting, of the cancellation of his services as its electronic authorized signatory, and to the approver of the signature, of the cancellation of the electronic certificate.

Duties of Authorized Electronic Signatory. An authorised electronic signatory will not attach his approved electronic signature to a document and will not electronically report to the Authority, unless he has ensured one of the following:

- He is authorised in accordance with any law to sign the document as the sole signatory in the name of the reporting entity; and
- He has been authorised, as mentioned above, by every party whose signature on the document is required in accordance with any law, to sign the document on his behalf by means of his approved electronic signature, and to report electronically to the Authority, provided that the document to which he attaches his approved electronic signature and which he submits by electronic reporting to the Authority is absolutely identical by its content, structure, and form to the document which has been attached to the said authorisation, which have been delivered to him for the purpose of the electronic reporting to the Authority.

The authorised electronic signatory bears personal liability with regard to his duties specified above and he cannot release himself from such liability by authorising another person to use his means of signature for the purpose of electronic signature or reporting to the Authority.

Newspaper Publication. As of 2008, following enactment of the Securities Regulations (Publication of Newspaper Notices) 2008, the requirement for details in a newspaper publication was changed to include materially less details, replaced by reference to the electronic report published by the corporation on the same matter, which enables to receive more information with respect to the subject event. The regulations require that the following be provided:

- Name of the reporting entity;
- Type of the reported event;
- Reference to an electronic report which enables to receive more information with respect to the subject event;
- Important dates which are essential to the investor;
- The dates of a shareholders meeting; or
- The dates of approving a purchase offer.

An Offeror That Is Not a Reporting Entity. An offeror in a purchase offer under the purchase offer regulations,[118] which is not a reporting corporation, or an offeror which is not an issuer obliged to publish a prospectus in accordance with the Law, and who is not a reporting corporation, will appoint an electronic authorised signatory as specified below:

- In the event that the offeror is a corporation, it will appoint one or more senior officer to serve as an authorised electronic signatory on its behalf for the purpose of electronic reporting to the Authority with regard to the purchase offer; and
- In the event that the party who is offering is an individual, he himself is entitled to serve as an electronic authorized signatory or to appoint an electronic authorized signatory, one or more, on his behalf for the purpose of electronic reporting to the Authority for the matter of the purchase offer.

Corporation Seeking to Offer or to Register Its Securities for First Time. A corporation which seeks to offer its securities for the first time pursuant to a prospectus, or a corporation which seeks to register its securities for the first time for trading on the Stock Exchange pursuant to a prospectus or a registration document, shall appoint at least two senior officers to serve as authorised electronic signatories on its behalf for the purpose of the submission of documents by electronic reporting to the Authority.

An application for registration of electronic authorized signatories on MAGNA, shall be signed on behalf of the corporation by hand by the chairman of its board of directors and its general manager or a director empowered by board of directors to sign the application instead of one of them, stating the names of the signatories and their positions in the corporation; the application will be submitted to the Securities Authority at its office in Jerusalem by hand delivery or by mail.

In the event that securities of the corporation are offered to the public in accordance with a prospectus or they are registered for trading on the Stock Exchange in accordance with a listing document, the corporation will submit to the Authority within one trading day from the day of receipt of the permit for the publication of the prospectus or from the day of the publication of the listing document, as the case may be, by means of electronic reporting, forms of initial data as follows:

- Its documents of incorporation;
- Details of the principal shareholders and their holdings;
- Details of the senior officers;
- Details of the registered shareholders;
- Details of the registered capital, the issued capital, and its additional securities;
- Details of the dormant shares in its capital;
- Details of its auditor; and
- In the event bonds were issued, the deed of trust.

Forms of initial data as mentioned will be submitted in their entirety all at one time. The provisions which are mentioned above, mutatis mutandis, will apply to a corporation which is seeking to offer its securities for the first time or to register its securities for the first time, to an authorised electronic signatory on its behalf, and to every document in their possession which is reported electronically.

Non Electronic reporting. In the event that the Chairman of the Authority believe that exceptional circumstances exist in connection with the activity of MAGNA, he may instruct that, throughout such period as he deems appropriate and which does not exceed the minimum period which is required under the circumstances, the reporting to the Authority and to the stock exchange shall be effected other than by means of electronic reporting, and in such manner as he instructs.

Such provision will be published on the Web site of the Authority, in two daily newspapers, and by means of additional media communication as is deemed to be appropriate. The documents specified below will be submitted to the Authority at its office in Jerusalem only by means of hardcopy reporting:

- Application for exemption from a specific disclosure in the prospectus in accordance with Section 19(a) of the Law and documents in connection therewith; and
- Application for exemption from a specific disclosure in the immediate report in accordance with Section 36c(a) of the Law and documents in connection therewith.

- Within the framework of the Electronic Reporting Regulations, are also included, inter alia, arrangements in relation to the technical aspects of the electronic reporting.

Voting Instruments and Opinion Statements

In General. Within the framework of recent global technological advancements, the issue of remote voting under Israeli law was addressed upon legislation of the Voting Instruments Regulations in 2005, enacted under Section 89 of the Companies Law.

This issue revolutionised the manner in which shareholders vote at general meetings: under the Voting Instruments Regulations, shareholders can vote by means of a voting instrument or via the Internet (if such option is allowed by the company), without the need to physically attend the general meeting, nor nominate a proxy. Voting in these ways allows shareholders to use their voting power more effectively, and promote a democratic corporate regime. The Voting Instruments Regulations apply to general meetings of shareholders, the agenda of which includes one or more of the following issues:

- Appointment and removal of directors;
- Approval of acts or transactions requiring the approval of the general meeting pursuant to the provisions of Sections 255 and 268–275 of the Companies Law;
- Approval of a merger;
- Authorization of the chairman of the board of directors or his relative to hold the position of general manager or to exercise his powers, and authorization of the general manager or his relative to hold the position of the chairman of the board of directors or to exercise his powers, for periods not exceeding 3 years each, provided that one of the following occurs: the majority of votes at the general meeting includes, at least two-thirds of the votes of the shareholders who are not controlling shareholders of the company nor holders of a personal interest in the approval of the resolution participating in the vote, the abstaining votes not being taken into account; or the objecting votes do not exceed two per cent of the voting rights in the company;[119]
- Any other matter in respect of which the articles of association of the corporation provide that resolutions of the general meeting may also be passed by means of a voting instrument; and
- Convening of a meeting in accordance with the provisions of Section 350 of the Companies Law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the provisions of the Voting Instruments Regulations shall not apply in the event the company's controlling shareholder holds on the date of the shareholders' meeting, to the best of company's knowledge, shares of the company amounting to the rate necessary to adopt the resolution on the agenda, assuming all other shareholders shall attend the meeting and vote against the resolution.

119 Companies Law, s 87, 121(c).

According to the Voting Instruments Regulations, an unregistered shareholder, who wishes to vote in a general meeting without attending it and without nominating a proxy, may vote with a voting instrument.

In addition, an unregistered shareholder also may vote through the Internet, provided that the company has so informed its shareholders (and facilitated the required means).

In addition, a registered shareholder who wishes to vote in writing, shall note in the form the manner in which he chooses to vote, and deliver said form to the company or shall mail it to the company by registered mail, together with a photocopy of his identity card or his passport or, in the case of a corporation, its incorporation certificate, so that the voting instrument shall reach the company's registered office at least 72 hours before the date of the general meeting.
